Nothing more strikingly marked the incongruous host that filled the city than the different guards of honour which were mounted at the several hotels where officers and generals of distinction resided. At one door might be seen the tall cuirassier of Austria, his white cloak falling in heavy folds over the flank and haunches of his coal black horse, looking like some Templar of old; at another the plumed bonnet of a Highlander fluttered in the breeze, as some hardy mountaineer paced to and fro, his grey eye and stern look unmoved by the eager and prying gaze of the crowd that stopped to look upon so strange and singular a costume; here was the impatient salmagundi of some Hungarian hussar, pawing the ground with restless eagerness, as his gay doliman, slashed with gold, glittered in the sun. The page from Bohemia—the deadly marksman with the long rifle; the savage Tartar of the Ukraine, devouring his meal on his guard, and turning his dark suspicious eye around him, lest every passer-by might mean some treachery all denoted that some representative of their country dwelt within. Nor were the Austrians less dissimilar. The stately Prussian, with his bell aplomb beneath his elbow; the Cossack, with short stirrups, crouched upon his horse's mane; the English horse-artilleryman powdering along with measure accoutrements and gigantic steed; the Polish light-cavalry soldier, standing high in his stirrups, and turning his restless eye on every side, were all subjects for our curiosity and wonder. The novelty of the spectacle soon, however, to have greatly worn off for the Parisians, who scarcely noticed the strange and uncouth figures that every moment passed before their eyes, and now talked away as unconcernedly amid the scene of tumult and confusion as though nothing new or remarkable was going on about them; their very indifference and insouciance one of the strangest sights we witnessed.—Jack Hinton, the Guardsman.

NOVEL HOUSETRAP.

A day or two ago a mouse, in the village of Kirkcolm, allured by the flavour of one of the far-famed Lochryan oysters, attempted to help itself to the enticing morsel, when the oyster suddenly closing on the rash marauder crushed it to death, and kept its devoted head firmly locked between the valves of its shell.—Dumfries Courier.

INVESTITURE OF A KNIGHT OF ST. PATRICK.

His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, as Grand Master (by command of her Majesty the Queen), held a Chapter of the Most Illustrious Order of St. Patrick, on Nov. 9, at the Viceregal Lodge, Phœnix Park.

The following Knights Companions, in their mantles, stars, and collars, assembled in the robing-room, attended by the officers of the order:—The Earl of Charlemont, the Earl of Leitrim, the Earl of Donoughmore, the Earl of Howth, Lord Viscount Southwell, Marquis of Headfort, the Earl of Milltown, the Earl of Arran, attended by the following officers of the order:—His Grace the Archbishop of Dublin, Chancellor; the Hon. Captain Boyle, Secretary; Sir George Morris, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod; Sir William Betham, Ulster King at Arms; Sheffield Betham, Esq., Dublin Herald.

At half-past six o'clock, P.M., the Knights were called over by Ulster, and then proceeded to the presence of the Grand Master, seated in the chair of state, and, with the usual reverences, they took their respective seats at the table according to their stalls.

His Excellency the Grand Master then commanded Ulster to read her Majesty the Queen's letter, authorising the Chapter to be held, which being done, the Earl of Wicklow was introduced by the Gentleman Usher and Ulster King of Arms, and the noble earl, kneeling, received the honour of Knighthood, whereupon he retired.

THE BANQUET.—After the investiture, his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant gave a dinner to the Knights and Officers of the Order, upon a scale of magnificence rarely equalled, upon which occasion his excellency occupied a seat at the head (nor centre) of the table, and Ulster King at Arms occupied a seat at the foot of the table, and gave out the toasts, according to custom in such cases. The Knights took their seats at the table according to their seniority as Knights.

Among those present we observed her Excellency the Countess De Grey, the Marquis of Headfort, the Earl of Charlemont, the Earl of Leitrim, the Earl of Donoughmore, the Earl of Howth, the Earl of Arran, the Earl of Milltown, Viscount Southwell, the Earl of Wicklow, his Grace the Archbishop of Dublin, the Lord Chancellor, Sir Edward Blakeney, the Earl and Countess Cowper, Lord and Lady Jemima Eliot, Mr. and Lady Mary Vyner, the Honourable Capt. Boyle, the Honourable Capt. Forrester, Sir George Morris; Major Parker, Comptroller of the Household; Captain Willis, Gentleman Usher; Mr. Sheffield Betham, and Mr. Magenis, Private Secretary; and Lord Francis Gordon and Mr. Daly, Aides-de-Camp in Waiting.

The splendid band of the 5th Dragoon Guards attended, and played some of their best airs and pieces of music during the evening.

ST. ANN'S SCHOOLS, BRIXTON-HILL.

We present our readers with an engraving of one of our most useful and interesting public charities, viz., the St. Ann's Society Schools, situate at Brixton.

This noble institution is so peculiar, and yet, we are sorry to say, so little known, that we think it right to add a few of its details, and should rejoice to learn that by so doing we increased the number of its friends and its means of usefulness.

The St. Ann's Society receives into its schools, by half-yearly elections, or by purchase, for a stated sum, the children of parents who have seen better days, educating, clothing, and wholly maintaining them, till of fit age to enter the world; and so much are the children in request, from their mode of training, that scarcely a child leaves the schools unprovided for. This charity is supported wholly by voluntary contributions, and is unlimited in its operations. Receiving its children from all parts of the world, it looks to all for support. Unlike Christ's Hospital, it is no royal foundation, richly endowed; but, originating with a few charitable individuals, it has yet to perform its enormous amount of yearly good with a very uncertain and insufficient income.

To encourage habits of economy, a savings' bank has been established at this asylum; and, though little can be laid up by the society's young charges, they at least learn how to save. To secure the confirmation of the children, but too often forgotten by masters and mistresses, they are invited to return, and proceed to confirmation from their own early home. And, finally, to exercise a wholesome control over those who have gone abroad in the world, there are yearly meetings of those who have been educated in the schools; that for the girls in May; that for the boys in June. At these meetings, which none may attend without a written character, the characters are read out before the assembled company; rewards are presented; and then all, gentle and simple, take tea together. His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury presided at the last meeting of the girls, and the Bishop of Norwich at the boys' meeting.

The charity works well. The education is entirely a plain one, qualifying the boys for trade, or for the counting-house; but, at the same time, laying a good foundation, should a boy's friends be enabled to give him enlarged opportunities on his leaving, at the age of fourteen. The principal care, however, is with the moral training of the children; to teach them that they are moral agents, responsible to a power beyond that of man; to make them trustworthy in any situation "for conscience sake" to any master—"not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward."

It is an extraordinary fact that this charity profits but little by legacies, whilst rich and endowed institutions thus receive almost daily additions to their funds.

For such an institution, surely, we shall not plead in vain with all who are blessed with means, or yet more greatly blessed with the will, thus truly "to visit the fatherless in their affliction," and to give essential succour and assistance to the poor that cry unto them—the children of their less happy fellow-mortals.

THE CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XV.

STEPNEY CHURCH.

By those who delight in Mrs. Gore's pleasant fancies, and participate in her delicate horrors of the undiscovered wilds of Bedford-square, we fear the subject of our present sketch will be voted in terra incognita; but as we have the bump of benevolence extensively developed, and have the good fortune to be versed in oriental lore and localities, we may mention that Stepney is situate in the east end of London, and comprises nearly the whole space between Mile-end-road and the river Thames from Whitechapel to Bow. This fine old church, one of the most ancient, indeed, in the metropolis, is well worthy a visit, and the densely-filled churchyard, perhaps, still more so to those who delight in grave pursuits. We would not by any means recommend too large a dose of Harvey but we envy not the man who could spend an hour in this "silent city,"

"Where the cares of earth are ended, and the weary are at rest," and not find himself a wiser and a better man for the effort. Here, at length, we find the quiet depository of all those tormenting fears and tantalizing hopes, "too strong for words, too deep for tears," which made up the mingled yarn in the web of existence, bringing home to the bosom of the most reckless, as his eye rests on that "writing on the wall," a conviction that

"there twines
O'er mankind's sweetest hopes corruption sure,
To blast their beauty, e'en while most it shines!
'Tis but to teach us there are worlds above,
Where hope fruition finds in endless love!"

The parish church, dedicated to St. Dunstan and All Saints, is a large Gothic structure of the early part of the thirteenth century, consisting of a chancel, nave, and two aisles, separated by clustered columns and pointed arches. At the west end is a square tower, containing a fine tenor bell, the gift of Nicholas Chadworth, date unknown, but renewed by Thos. Marston, in 1386, and recast again in 1764. The windows are various, but for the most part of the architecture which prevailed in the fourteenth century. Those in the north aisle have obtuse arches of a later date. In the south wall of the chancel are two stone stalls with pointed arches. On the north side is a marble monument with a groined elliptical arch, under which stands an altar-tomb to the memory of Sir Henry Colet, Knight, Citizen, and Silkmercer of London. Sir Henry was Lord Mayor in 1486, and again in 1495. He was third son of Robert Colet, Esq., and father of Dr. John Colet, founder of St. Paul's School. This tomb is kept in good repair by the Mercers' Company. On the north wall are several monuments, the most notable of which is that of Sir John Berry, surmounted by a fine bust in white marble of that gallant officer, who, by his daring exploits, gained the distinguished consideration of his Sovereign, the Merry Monarch. On the east wall, among a host of burly citizens, with their kneeling wives and daughters, we perceive the monument, erected in 1622 by the Corporation of the Trinity House, to the good old knight, Sir Thomas Sperl, Comptroller of the Navy to Henry VIII., and first master of that ancient and honourable fraternity. There are also a profusion of monumental memorials on the chancel floor, but none requiring special notice in our brief sketch. The font, which is a genuine antique and of exquisite workmanship, stands on a circular pillar, surrounded by four others of smaller size. Norden mentions, as worthy of note, the tomb of William Chaldnam, erected in 1484; but that, as well as the monument of Lord Darnley, who died in 1545, which Weever mentions as having stood within the chancel, has disappeared. He was elder brother of the Earl of Darnley who married Mary Queen of Scots, and was father of James I. On the outside of the church, over the porch, is a representation of the Crucifixion, rudely carved; and on the west wall an imperfect basso relievo of a figure adoring the infant Jesus.

The above is a very old piece of sculpture on the building, and seems properly to belong to some much more ancient edifice.

In the wall of a small porch there is a stone which thus touchingly moralizeth its travels:—

"Of Carthage wall I was a stone:
O mortals, read with pity!
Time consumes all—it spareth none—
Man, mountain, town, or city.
Therefore, O mortals, now bethink
You whereunto you must,
Since now such stately buildings
Lie buried in the dust."

Here lieth a lady who seems to have done the state some service Mrs. Goodlad, aged 93, with her 20 daughters. And here, also Wolsey's favourite ambassador, Bishop Kyte, found his last resting place, shortly after his return from

"Spayne, where he right joyfullye Combined both princes in pease most amate."

Here lieth, also, a man who made some noise in his day—

"Roger Crab, that feeds on herbs and roots, is here;
But I believe Diogenes had better cheer."
Rara avis in terris.

As a striking instance of mortality, scarcely to be paralleled in the records of any other parish in the kingdom, it appears by the register that 154 persons were buried here on the 11th Sept., 1665, the year of the destructive plague.

We have left much unnoticed of this fine old church, which, notwithstanding all the centuries which have passed over it, still looks

"As if Time had been to it all sunlight and soft dew;
As if upon its freshness the cold rime
Of decay should never fall."

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

VIEW OF ASHTON HALL, LANCASHIRE.

ASHTON HALL, LANCASHIRE.

"A Douglas in his hall."—SCOTT.

THIS fine baronial mansion, one of the seats of his Grace the Duke of Hamilton, is situated about three miles south of Lancaster, and therefore occupies a site which is associated with many memorable transactions in British history ranging from the time when our rude forefathers "cut battle" for their hearths and homes against the invading Romans, through the stirring days of the celebrated John of Gaunt, the bloody wars of the "Roses," the troubles of the Commonwealth, and the misguided rebellion of the "Young Pretender."

Ashton Hall is principally remarkable as the ancient seat of the De Dourcys, out of which family it passed, by marriage, to John De Coupland, the hero of Neville Cross. In 1454 it was possessed by Sir R. Lawrence, Knt., whose son, Sir James, was knighted by Lord Stanley, at Hatton Field, in Scotland. From the Lawrences the manor and hall passed to the Ratcliffs, through the Butlers, and from them, by further marriages, to Sir Gilbert Gerard, ancestor of Lord Gerard of Bromley; and Elizabeth, only daughter and heiress of Digby Lord Gerard, having married James Earl of Arran, created fourth Duke of Hamilton in 1679, it thus came into the present ducal family. Of this nobleman it is related that he made a conspicuous figure during the reigns of Charles II. and James II., from both of whom he was deputed Envoy Extraordinary to the court of France. Besides many other posts of honour that were conferred upon him by the above monarchs, he was made Lord-Lieutenant of the county of Lancaster in 1710; also Admiral of the Sea-coasts; and in December of the same year was sworn into the Privy Council of Queen Anne. In the next year he was created an English peer by the title of Duke of Brandon, in the county of Suffolk. In 1713 he fought a duel with Lord Mohun, and fell in the rencontre; but the second of his antagonist, a General Macartney, was suspected of having slyly stabbed him," and a reward of 500 guineas was offered by the Government, with 300 by the duchess, for his apprehension. Macartney sought refuge in a foreign country, but was taken in Hanover; and, after a trial on a charge of wilful murder in the Court of King's Bench, was only found guilty of manslaughter.

The mansion at Ashton is an oblong building, with square embattled towers to the west; a spacious hall; and other characteristics of an ancient castle. The walls are probably of the fourteenth century; successive alterations and additions, however, have scarcely left any evidences of the origin of the baronial residence, except those exhibited in the turrets; but the primitive character of the hall has been preserved in the more recent reparations and improvements. The park, in which Ashton Hall is erected, contains some of the finest sylvan scenery in Lancashire; it is agreeably diversified with hill and dale; and from some of its eminences grand, interesting, and extensive views may be obtained of a wide sweep of country, skirted by "ocean's dim immensity"—a vast natural panorama of woods and waters, headlands and distant mountains, beautiful and picturesque as the most ardent admirer of Creation's glories could desire. With reference to some of the views which here present themselves, Mrs. Radcliffe has the following descriptive remarks:—"The appearance of the northern fells is ever changing with the weather and shifting lights. Sometimes they resemble those evening clouds on the horizon that catch the last gleams of the sun; at others, wrapt in dark mist, they are only faintly traced and seen like stormy vapours rising from the sea. But, in a bright day, their appearance is beautiful: then their grand outlines are distinctly drawn upon the sky, a vision of Alps; the rugged sides are faintly marked with light and shadow, with wood and rock; and here and there a cluster of white cottages, or farms and hamlets, gleam at their feet along the water's edge. Over the whole landscape is then drawn a softening azure, or sometimes a purple line, exquisitely lovely; while the sea below reflects a brighter tint of blue." Well may the poet exclaim, "Who can paint like Nature?"

The present possessor of the ancient and princely domains of Ashton Hall is Alexander, tenth Duke of Hamilton, whose principal seat is Hamilton Palace, near Glasgow, in Scotland. His grace's only daughter was married, in November 1839, to the Right Hon. the Earl of Lincoln, M.P., and his only son (the heir to the dukedom of Hamilton), the Marquis of Douglas, is to be married during the ensuing month, according to court gossip, to a Princess of Baden.

PRESENTATION OF A MUSIC-STAND TO MR. HULLAH, BY HIS PUPILS.

MUSIC CLASSES, EXETER HALL.

ON Tuesday evening last was an era deserving of remembrance, not only in the history of musical education in this country, but in the history of education generally. The members of the first workmen's singing class at Exeter-hall on that night showed their respect to their teacher, benefactor, and friend, Mr. John Hullah, by presenting him with a superb music-stand, as a testimonial of their respect and esteem, and Lord Warncliffe, the President of the Council, and Chairman of the Committee of Council for National Education, thought it his duty to be present on the occasion, to bear his testimony to the merits of Mr. Hullah, and to take credit to himself for the efforts which he had made to promote the education of the humbler classes in the delightful science of music. It was a proud and a gratifying thing for those who have laboured through evil report and good report in the cause of education—who, in spite of the avowed and active hostility of some, the galling sarcasm of others, and, worst of all, the half support of many who it was a proud and gratifying thing for those who have been the friends of the education of the masses in the worst of times to witness this signal triumph. The doors were opened at six, and the proceedings were advertised to commence at seven. Long before that hour the immense area of Exeter-hall was crammed to suffocation. From the platform it presented the appearance of a sea of human heads. The galleries were crowded, and on the platform it was with great difficulty that even standing room could be obtained. At seven o'clock Mr. Hullah assumed his baton, and the proceedings of the evening commenced. The classes having gone through their sol-fa-ing exercises with a precision which would have done credit to the best-drilled chorus of the most efficiently-conducted theatre in Europe,

"Damn with faint praise, assent with civil leer,
And, though not sneering, teach the rest to sneer"—

Mr. T. H. Headland came forward on the platform, and presented to Mr. Hullah, in the name of the first workmen's singing class of Exeter-hall, a most elegant and elaborately-finished music-stand, as a testimony of the esteem and respect of his pupils belonging to that class. In presenting the stand, Mr. Headland read the following address:—

Sir,—It is with feelings of the greatest interest that we meet you on this gratifying occasion. We greet you as our kind and zealous teacher.

The recollection of the last seven months, during which we have been under your tuition, is full of pleasure.

To win the good opinion of the pupil should surely be an object with the teacher; how far you, sir, have succeeded in this respect, let this testimonial, and this unanimous meeting, in some degree, answer.

Your unwearied zeal and energy, your generous and encouraging kindness, and the hearty interest which we could see that you felt in our improvement and welfare, have warmed our hearts towards you.

So pleasant have been our meetings, that we have always looked forward with delight to the hours appointed for our lessons.

We trust that your experience of us will testify that working men can appreciate the more refined pleasures of life when set before them; and that, although we may present a rough exterior, we are not too dull to learn, nor too cold to feel gratitude to those who, like yourself, have treated us with kindness and confidence.

The importance of making singing a part of education in every elementary school, and of teaching music systematically, with a view of softening the manners, improving the taste, and raising the character of the great body of the people, we hope soon to see fully recognised, and acted upon, as we know from experience that music increases the pleasures of home.

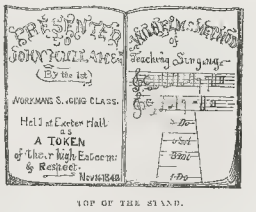
Vocal music is not only an innocent pleasure, but is also a cheap amusement, and therefore likely to be within the reach of even the poorer classes of society; and believe us, sir, it is an event of no small importance when cheap and innocent amusements are brought within the reach of the labouring and industrious man.

The working man must seek relaxation of some kind after the toils of the day: many vicious and demoralizing amusements are offered to him by those who have not his true interest at heart: how important, then, is it that they who are really the friends of the working man should help him to obtain pleasures which, though exhilarating, are innocent and improving; which are of little cost, and may be enjoyed in his own home, and with his own family. Among such pleasures we may now happily class the power which you have given us of singing from written music in parts. This power has a nobler object than social or domestic amusement. An improvement of congregational singing has long been deemed necessary; its inefficiency has probably arisen from the want of a more general acquaintance with the science of music; in consequence of which, this important portion of public worship has commonly been entrusted to the children of elementary schools, from whose little voices, childish apathy, and unconscious irreverence, cannot be obtained those solemn effects of piety which ought to be produced by the multitude of voices engaged in devout sympathy and holy earnestness in singing the praises of Almighty God.

These reasons, among many, sir, induce us to expect that great benefits, not only to the working men, but to society in general, will spring from your labours, and from the introduction of your system of teaching.

And now, sir, I come to the most interesting and pleasing part of my duty—the presentation of this music-stand; which we hope you will accept as a mark of the esteem and admiration in which you are held by the first workmen's singing class. We hope that the method of Wilhem, as adapted and introduced to English use by you, may be fully carried out, to your honour and advantage; that you and yours may enjoy many years of happiness; and that you may long have the satisfaction of reflecting that your exertions in the cause of musical education have promoted the happiness of many thousands of the people of this nation.

THE MUSIC STAND.



TOP OF THE STAND.

The music-stand, of which the above is a faithful engraving, is a most elegant piece of workmanship. The desk is supported by a cherub bearing a palm branch; the whole is elaborately carved and gilded. It originated with, and was proposed to the workmen's class by, Mr. T. Wilson, and by that body adopted enthusiastically. The design is by Messrs. Wilson and Marshall, both of whom are members of the class, and employed in the extensive establishment of Mr. G. J. Morant, 91, Bond-street, decorator to the Queen, &c. Messrs. Wilson and Marshall being wood-carvers have contributed much gratuitous labour to this splendid and unique present, and were entrusted with the chief superintendence of the work, assisted by Messrs. Mouttrie and Waller; other members of the class have also contributed labour in their various departments of trade. The carving was executed by Mr. P. Aube, 51, Clarendon-square; and the gilding by Mr. G. Smith, 3, Eliza-place, St. John-street-road. Both gentlemen have given the greatest satisfaction to the committee by the ability displayed in the execution of the work entrusted to them. The value of this beautiful article is fifty guineas, and affords a pleasing instance of what may be achieved by a few workmen actuated by the laudable desire of testifying, in a substantial form, the respect they entertain for a gentleman from whom they have derived so much of pleasure and instruction.

Mr. Hullah, in acknowledging the gift, expressed a hope that the classes were not going to separate, but would still further pursue their studies. They had come, he said, not to the end of their journey, but to the point where two paths separated, and he trusted they would journey onward with him. He could not yet let them go. (Cheers.) He then alluded to the success which had attended his method of teaching, and expressed a hope that the members of the class had imparted their knowledge of class-singing to their wives and families, for the great object of the illustrious man who had first promulgated the system, M. Wilhem, of Paris, had been to increase the domestic comforts of his fellow-creatures by adding to the stock of innocent amusements. (Cheers.) Having dwelt on the great importance of congregational singing, as adding to the solemnity of religious worship, he concluded by announcing his intention of forming a class of the wives and children of working men. This announcement was received with loud cheers. The classes then performed several pieces of choral music in excellent time and tune. At the conclusion of the proceedings Lord Warncliffe came forward, and said that he could not allow the proceedings to terminate without expressing his high gratification at all that he had witnessed, and his entire concurrence in the sentiments and address which had been put forth on presenting Mr. Hullah with that elegant testimonial of the respect and esteem. There were few men like Mr. Hullah. He had it been his (Lord Warncliffe's) lot to meet with a teacher possessed in such an eminent degree the art of fixing the attention of his pupils. He (Lord Warncliffe) congratulated them on the progress they had made in the delightful science of music. It was delightful to see the working man thus adding to his stock of innocent and intellectual amusements, and he was proud to think that he had contributed to promote their instruction in that most delightful and beautiful science.—His lordship was loudly cheered during the delivery of his speech, and at its conclusion the classes sang "God save the Queen," after which the vast assemblage dispersed.

Great credit is due to the classes for the manner in which they have profited by the instructions given to them. Great credit is due to Mr. Hullah for his unwearied assiduity, his untiring patience, and his lucid clearness in imparting those instructions; but while thus awarding praise to our countryman, who has naturalized, as it were, the system of class-singing among us, let us not forget to award honour where honour is due. Honour to M. Wilhem, the inventor of this method of instruction—honour to M. Wilhem, the musical master of the masses, the friend of the poet Béranger, and the man who, in setting some of the most soul-stirring lyrics of that poet of the people to appropriate melodies, has indeed "married music to immortal verse"! Honour to M. Wilhem, the benefactor of his species!

THE COLOSSEUM PRINT.

We have now to call the attention of our readers and subscribers to the promised prospectus of our Colosseum Print—a superb and original work of art, produced upon the grandest scale—which we pledged ourselves to present to all the readers of the

who should have punctually subscribed to the paper during the first six months of its existence. The great success which we have achieved now enables us to go to an extent of enterprise that we are sure will more than crown the highest expectations of the public.

THE COLOSSEUM PRINT

derived its title, in the first instance, from an intention of presenting a magnificent engraving of LONDON AT ONE VIEW to reflect, as it were, a similar grand picture to that so long exhibited at the Colosseum. The better taste, however, of our artists and advisers reminded us that we should thus exclude that wondrous leviathan of our metropolitan architecture,

ST PAUL'S CATHEDRAL;

and to this important recollection was added a suggestion that a much finer field of what may not inaptly be called "Panoramic glory" was presentable from another lofty eminence of London, which it, however, required official authority to enable us to reach.

TWO SPLENDID VIEWS OF THE METROPOLIS

have been the result of the altered proposition, taken north and south, from the summit of the

by the generous and nobly-granted permission of General Maitland, for himself and his co-trustees, who thus confided to us an exclusive right that stimulated our proprietors to a degree of exertion which they hope will prove worthy of the signal mark of favour they have received. Their

which will really be, in its superb dimensions, what the term "Colossal" is in reference to size, will then present two

ORIGINAL ASPECTS OF LONDON.

The upper or south view will comprise all that magnificent sweep of picturesque objects which stretch from the Surrey shores of the Thames, as far as they are visible on the right, to beyond the Tower of London, with its adjacent forests of shipping on the left. The splendid range of manufactories which skirt the river, grow upward from their far distance to the gazer's eye, until they are closed with, and screened by, the venerable Abbey of Westminster, at once, with its solemn religious grandeur, absorbing mind and sight. But that fine pause of contemplation over, and away travels the eye, using as it were a kind of memory to bring present the old familiar features of the "City of the World." Look at the beautiful series of bridges spanning that river, which, though its waters are but silver, has been designated, for their burthen, the "river of gold." Mark the long lines of streets, the grand public buildings, the spires of old and new churches pointing to the sky, the Monument, the ancient and fort-like Tower, and mid all, and above all, the eternal grandeur of St. Paul's! And these objects are as woven into the picture, that they are not [illegible] of mere mass, but prominent beauties of such a clear and well-defined [illegible] rural panorama as was never before embodied in the forms of art.

THE LOWER OR NORTH VIEW

turns the gaze upon a still more broad and open district of the metropolis. It sweeps over the beautiful Parks; includes the Royal Palaces and mansions of our nobility, involves the finest streets in the world, Regent-street, Piccadilly, Portland-place, Whitehall, Trafalgar-square, and the superb gathering of our first-rate clubs; and, in a word, places in a wide-winged sweep the palatial [illegible] ence of western London to contrast with the staid and solid greatness [illegible] commercial aspect; endless wealth-and-emulation on the one hand, and on the other an expenditure whose lavishness mocks all calculation.

Such are the two sections of the UNRIVALLED PICTURE which we are about to present in all good-will to our readers, and now the only other points connected with it which we wish to impress upon their attention are

ITS UNDOUBTED FIDELITY AND TRUTH

NOTICE.

THE COLOSSEUM PRINT will be ready on New Year's Eve, when all persons will be entitled to receive it who have subscribed for six months from the commencement of the paper, or for six months previous to the publication of the print, or who pay a six months' subscription in advance from the time of the issue of the plate. This is the definite and distinct answer to all correspondents who have addressed us on the subject, and is a general guide to the public at large. The engraving is upon so grand and magnificent a scale, that it cannot be finished and a sufficient number printed before the time appointed for publication. Our subscribers have already so increased that the time requisite for printing becomes most important, and any delay that has arisen is attributable only to the necessity for such careful and deliberate [illegible] angement as will make disappointment next to impossible

We have received a letter from the reverend incumbent of Lower Prover, with many others from numerous subscribers, having reference to a circular addressed by Mr. Clayton to the respective writers upon the subject of subscriptions to the "ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS." The circular in question does not emanate from this office, Mr. Clayton having no connection with our journal. It can only, therefore, be sent by him in his capacity of news agent to his private connexion, and not with the slightest official authority from the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

Those subscribers who are not satisfied with their present channels of receiving the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, can always change them at pleasure, and employ other newsmen. They need only pay for the numbers they have received (unless where money has been already remitted for a positive period), as we never force any newsman, wholesale or retail, to take more papers than he requires for the current week.

OUR FIRST VOLUME.

In reply to many subscribers, and for the information of our readers generally, we may state that our First Volume will be published, with title-page and index complete, and beautifully bound, with gilt letters and edges,

PRICE ONE GUINEA,

On the First of January, 1843.

Separate covers will be obtainable by those who have the numbers filed.

SHAH OF PERSIA.—In our next number we shall present our readers with a faithful portrait of Mahmood, the reigning potentate of Persia, in conference with his Minister of State, which will form a companion print to the group in our 22nd number, of the Sultan and his Vizier.

POPULAR PORTRAITS. The portrait of Lord Aberdeen, Secretary for Foreign Affairs, shall be given in our next.

We shall give, next week, engravings of the wreck of the Reliance Indiaman, off Boulogne, 130 lives lost; view of Deal Castle; view of Dover Castle; the great Waterloo Coursing Match at Liverpool; splendid Testimonial to Sir Moses Montefiore, for his services in the East.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1842.

We this week present to our readers such a variety of illustration of the visit of her Majesty and her illustrious consort to Walmer Castle as, we hope, will tend as much to the gratification of our particular readers as must the event of the visit itself to the general community. Nobody grudges the hero of Waterloo the fresh honour which in the "sere and yellow leaf" of life our kind and discriminating Sovereign is bestowing upon him with so much graceful gratitude and cheerful respect, while all rejoice in the hope that the new scenes and recreations which her Majesty will enjoy at Walmer—the fine sea-breezes and bracing air of her formidable coast of Kent—may tend to invigorate the health and constitution of that interesting lady, whose life and happiness are so dear to all the subjects in her realm. Apart, too, even from the peculiar interest which attaches to the fact of her being the Duke of Wellington's guest, there is good omen in the belief that our Queen may, by occasional visits to the mansions of her high nobility, spread the genial fervor of royalty more lastingly over the land; gladden thousands of her people who would else have never dreamed of the happiness of her presence, and most completely identify herself with the loves and memories of all who are fortunate enough to live within her sphere of travels. Trade, too, is enlivened by these royal journeys, and many classes of the community are benefited the moment the Court is astir. We shall always feel pleasure—and never spare expense in gratifying the public with graphic and copious illustrations of these and similar events; and we are the more urged to do so by the stimulus of past and, we hope, present success, and by the attention which our efforts have commanded from the most leading and influential writers of the day. It is with some pride for ourselves, and much thankfulness to our contemporary, that we (at risk of the imputation of egotism) place before our readers the flattering testimonial of the Times newspaper, passed only during the present week, upon the rapidity and fidelity with which we have been enabled to seize upon and illustrate the immediate topics of the day. The remarks have reference to the last number of our journal:—

The number of this journal just published offers (save our contemporary), probably, the most remarkable specimen of pictorial illustration applied to the passing occurrences of the day which have hitherto appeared. The wood-cuts are very numerous, of more than ordinary merit, and of various interest. Their leading feature is a series of views representing the late grand civic procession of the 9th, the solemnities connected with the inauguration of the Lord Mayor, and the banquet at Guildhall. A scene on the river, with the gorgeous barges sweeping over its waters, whose aspect is particularly well imitated, strikes us as worthy of especial praise. In another part of the paper we have four Chinese views, designed to illustrate the operations of our expedition. The landscapes of Nankin and Whampoa are distinguished for propriety and truth of general effect, and have that lucid and dazzling appearance ch. racteristic of tropical climates. Altogether, this periodical, which presents its readers with sketches that would not discredit publications of a more permanent and expensive kind, and very far superior to any (caricatures excepted) that have been yet seen in a newspaper, is a sign of the times. Public taste in art is evidently improving; and there can be no doubt that, when such is the case, it will not be suffered to remain idle from lack of the means of gratifying its desire.

In quoting this testimony in favour of our last number, we now venture to add a hope that our readers will not think that either the Chinese Empire or the Lord Mayor of London has had the advantage in art-reflex over the homage which in this day's paper we are seeking to pay both to "our public" and our Queen.

There is a subject connected with the labour, we may say with the slave labour, of women in London, with which it was our intention to have occupied, and we are sure interested also, our readers at some length in this day's ILLUSTRATED NEWS. The topic, however, has, since its first mooting, so grown upon the public, that we find ourselves compelled to postpone the discussion which we are determined it shall receive, and confine ourselves to a simple introduction of the grievous question it involves. The inquiry which has so suddenly sprung up, and created so quick and praiseworthy an enthusiasm in the public mind, arose, in the first instance, out of the disclosure of the case of destitution of two ladies of the name of Reynolds, who, from being the daughters of an officer, were reduced to support, or rather starve themselves, upon an occupation, the miseries of which were never before guessed at by the community. The ladies themselves were soon considerably relieved by public benevolence, but, upon the expositions which took place with regard to their daily labour, the business of making shirts, Mr. Norton held it his duty to make observations from the bench which were strong and emphatic in their purport, and immediately spread through the daily press of the metropolis.

Upon the strength of their publicity a meeting has been held, at which one of the speakers made the following deposition confirmatory of the horrors which the magistrate had insinuated were hidden under that extensive branch of the metropolitan trade:—

Mr. W. S. Cumming, surgeon, then stated the object for which this meeting had been called. It appeared that his attention had been first called to the subject from having attended a woman who had taken vitriol for the purpose of destroying herself, and, on inquiring the cause which led her to take such a step, he learned that her husband was a tailor, and that she, not being able to receive any part of his wages in his absence, had endeavoured to earn her subsistence by making sailors' shirts; but finding that, though she worked from six in the morning till eleven at night, and sometimes all night, she could not earn enough to enable her to procure the necessaries of life, she had been induced to pawn the work which she had in hand. To avoid being apprehended she had taken the vitriol; and it was from having attended this woman that his attention had first been called to the subject. He was informed that for making a shirt the workwomen received only one penny, and that out of this penny they were obliged to find thread, which reduced the sum paid for making a shirt to little more than three farthings; and that it took a good hand full two hours to make a shirt of that particular sort. He felt horrified when he found that in this country women worked thirteen hours a-day for about 6d.; and he was assured that there were many thousands employed in this manner who did not earn more than 4½d. a-day each. He asked the women present whether he had not stated the truth.

This is only an inkling of the system which we intend next week to develop. It is enough, however, to prepare the reader's mind, and the statement may well stand of its own force, without further comment of ours, at this juncture of emergency both in time and space.

Not bringing into question the general usefulness of the force employed in the metropolis as a preventive and detective police it yet becomes a duty, at once urgent and imperative, to bring public opinion to bear upon cases where that force is employed in the perpetration of needless cruelty, unnecessary harshness, or gross outrage. Justice dictates, and prudence and expedience require that a peremptory, and, to a certain extent, discretionary power should be placed in the hands of each individual policeman; and composed, as this force must be, of men chosen rather for physical than mental qualifications, the risk must be incurred of occasional want of judgment in the exercise of the power thus delegated to them. Making, however, all requisite deductions for these circumstances, the truth cannot be hidden that, under the screen of authority, the police are often guilty of a series of petty tyrannies, and inflict a succession of minor miseries, loudly calling for the wholesome restraint of openly-expressed public opinion. From time to time the press gives to general scrutiny a case exhibiting some extraordinary circumstances which forced it into prominence—a prominence, giving, as it were, an evidence of the tone and spirit too frequently allowed to run riot amongst those whom the necessity for the preservation of the public peace clothes in a brief authority. Had we space we might well comment upon an instance as occurring during the present week—the case of Caroline Turville, a young married woman, which will be found in our Worship-street report. We leave it, however, after these preliminary observations, to be dealt with by the good sense of our readers.

The transactions, either in money or in trade, during this week in the City, have not in any particular degree been interesting. In the Colonial department of commerce an improved demand has created in various articles, if not higher prices, at all events a steady market; and, in the manufacturing districts, trade generally is assuming a more healthy appearance, and the productive classes are again in full employment at fair wages. At Coventry, and those places wherein silk is the chief article of manufacture, higher prices have already been obtained; and in Leeds, and those places where woollen goods are chiefly made, an alteration for the better has likewise occurred during the last fourteen days. Even in Manchester and Glasgow cotton goods evidently are in greater demand, although, as yet, an advance in their value to any great extent, is not apparent. On the whole, however, the expectation of the home consumption of goods, and of colonial produce being materially increased by the improved circumstances of our great land proprietors and their tenantry, now so very generally entertained amongst merchants and tradesmen, is no bad symptom of the future state of commerce, and will go far to all events to restore public confidence amongst the members of the trading community. We shall watch closely all these departments of industry throughout the British empire, and hope weekly to announce further improvements in every thing at present depressed in value.

Money continues to be extremely abundant amongst our City capitalists, and loans of it can be obtained on very moderate terms by those who have fair convertible securities to offer for it. In this channel, however, it cannot be entirely employed, and the daily application of a portion of this abundance to the public funds has a most beneficial influence on their prices. The Consols cannot be purchased now under 94¾, and when any large investments are attempted in them, the quantity of floating stock in the market is, at present, so limited in its amount that higher prices must be submitted to. It is a most fortunate circumstance for the community, that money is so very plentiful, for, unless some untoward circumstance should occur before the conclusion of the next session of Parliament, it will enable the Chancellor of the Exchequer to convert the Three-and-a-Half per Cent. Stock into Threes, and thereby to reduce the interest now annually payable on the national debt by little less than one million sterling. The great abundance of money has likewise a considerable influence, at the present moment, on the shares of public associations, particularly on those of the leading railroad trunks. Those of the Great Western, the South Western, and London and Birmingham maintain the fair prices, which latterly they have commanded. Of the Blackwall, Greenwich, Croydon, and Brighton, we cannot report so favourably.

In the public securities of foreign nations very little animation at present exists. European Bonds, on which the dividends have been regularly paid, command high prices, even for the investment of money, and they are too high to encourage speculators to deal in them for time settlements. Internal disputes continue to waste the wealth of the Peninsula, and until these disputes be superseded by industrious pursuits, little improvement need be expected in the public finances of those countries, which, under different circumstances, would be really powerful and wealthy communities.

The dishonest conduct of the various banking establishments throughout the United States of North America has entirely destroyed the public credit of that republic. Twenty years of correctness cannot restore confidence in their securities amongst the nations of Europe, for the non-fulfilment of their pecuniary engagements has not originated in any necessity, but is entirely founded on principles of fraud. With the exception of the Brazils, the same remarks are applicable to the bonds of the different new republics in America; but they have in their favour, at all events, some reason for their money deficiency. They expended the principal in liberating themselves from foreign domination, and now that the object has been obtained, every attempt and exertion, no doubt, will be made to rectify themselves in the opinion of European capitalists.

THE QUEEN AT WALMER.

Old Walmer's castellated brow
Bends grandly o'er the sea,
Whose billows pour around its steep
Their winter melody!
The song or half-lulled storm sends up
Its music to the walls,
And voices from the ocean-world
Find echoes in its halls!

They sing of the stern ancient days,
When England's heart was young,
And dared the strength of Cæsar's host—
The threat of Cæsar's tongue!
When Tempest, with a louder wrath,
Stood up beneath its steep,
And, raging, struck a Roman fleet
To ruin on its deep!

Now all the ships that Cæsar camped
That day upon the shore
Rot deep beneath, while Walmer stands
And Walmer a battlemented staff
Bears England's banner high,
Whose conquest-wings, since then, have swept
All seas beneath the sky!

To-day it rears its lion crest
Superbly to the sun,
As when it told from Nelson's mast
Proud tales of battle won!
Now not her buried warrior's fame
It heralds from the wave,
But sweeps the breeze from Walmer's height
O'er Britain's living brave!

Its castle, home of Wellington,
Is stirr'd with glad unrest;
And pride is flush'd on every cheek,
And thrills in every breast!
Impatient expectation pants,
Half joy and half surprise,
And the exulting people wear
Their hearts within their eyes!

Look out! the conqueror has stepp'd forth—
Old Winter greets him there;
Its snow upon his reverend head,
Its silver on his hair!
And ere men wish his life may prove,
Even as his laurels, green,
Shouts ring along his battlements,
"A welcome to the Queen!"

Bursts warm wild loyalty above,
From an admiring crowd!
Booms the deep cannon—thunder-voiced—
Majestically loud!
The young Victoria brings to-day,
—Ere yet his race be run,—
New garlands, twined by England's Queen,
For war-crowned Wellington!

He is the Sovereign's host—his truth
A life is gone to prove!
How noble then this graceful act
Which pays him worthy love;
Crowns honour, and wins proud belief
That England still is blest,
Whose Queen can such a warrior boast,
Whose warrior such a guest!

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE POLISH BALL.

The Guildhall of the city of London, with its brilliant fittings, was once more devoted, on Wednesday night, to the cause of true charity—the increase of the funds for the relief of the Polish exiles; and again was there a most numerous assemblage of beauty and fashion to grace the ball-room with their presence. We cannot pretend to enumerate the whole of those friends of the poor exiles who shared in the gaieties of the night. At one period there could not have been less than 3000 in the hall and council chamber; but amongst them were: The Right Honourable the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress, and family; Mr. Alderman Hooper and Mr. Sheriff Pilcher, and ladies; Le Duc de Guiche; Earl of Chesterfield; Count de Grammont; Earl of Hillsborough; Earl of Portarlington; Lord Foley and the Hon. Misses Foley; Viscount Castlereagh; Lord D. C. Stuart; Lady Mary Berkeley; Lord Fitzgerald; Lieutenant-General Sir Burgess Cuyler, C.B.; Mrs. and Miss Hammersley; Sir Horace St. Paul; T. S. Duncombe, Esq., M.P.; M. Philips, Esq., M.P.; Lieutenant Hunter Blair; Sir Felix Booth, Bart.; Sir J. L. Goldsmidt, Bart., and family; Sir George Carroll; Mr. Alderman John Johnson; Mr. Alderman and Mrs. Thomas Wood; the High Bailiff of Southwark; the Under Sheriffs; William Ward, Esq.; Mr. Deputy Peacock; D. W. Wire, Esq.; Mr. George Cash, the secretary; and other long-tried friends of the charity.

The fête was announced as a fancy dress ball, but most of the visitors most wisely adopted full rather than fancy dresses; where the general rule was departed from the failures were, with two or three exceptions, most manifest. One gentleman dressed bluff King Henry extremely well; his robes were right royal: but there the personation ended, for there was none of the fierce humour and gaiety of the king, who kept the most witty of jesters, and who, in spite of his corpulency, was one of the most winning of men. Two or three very artificial Greeks, a real Turk, a solitary Jager, two fac-simile Highlanders, a fox-hunter with a clean satin lining to his despattered red coat, and three or four nondescripts were lost in the crowd. The great attraction, however, of the evening was an excellent concert given from the gallery at the west end of the hall, to which the following ladies and gentlemen kindly and gratuitously lent their assistance:—Mrs. Alfred Shaw, Miss Rainforth, Miss Bassano, and Miss Maria B. Hawes; Signor Ferrari, Signor Burdini, Mr. Harrison, and Mr. Manvers. Conductor, M. Benedict. The programme presented this popular selection:—

First Part.—Quartett, Miss Bassano, Miss Maria B. Hawes, Mr. Manvers, and Signor Ferrari, "Ecco quel fiero instante" (Costa). Aria, Signor Burdini, "Ecco il pegno," Gemma di Vergi (Donizetti). Ballad, Miss Maria B. Hawes, "Oh childe me not, my mother" (M. B. Hawes). Aria, Miss Bassano, "Io l'udia," Torquato Tasso (Donizetti). Aria, Signor Ferrari (Rossini). Aria, Mrs. Alfred Shaw, "Ah quel giorno," Semiramide (Rossini). New song, Mr. Manvers, "The Star of Poland," the words written expressly for the occasion by H. J. Bradfield, Esq., the music composed by Mr. Reed; trumpet obligato, Mr. Harper. Glee, Miss Bassano, Miss Maria B. Hawes, Mr. Harrison, Signors Ferrari and Burdini, "Blow gentle gales" (Sir H. R. Bishop).

Second Part.—Duet, Mrs. Alfred Shaw and Miss Rainforth, "Dark day of horror," Semiramide (Rossini), charmingly sung, and kindly repeated on an encore. Ballad, Miss Maria B. Hawes, "I'll speak of thee" (M. B. Hawes). Song, Miss Rainforth, "Where tne bee sucks" (Dr. Arne), which was also honoured with an unanimous encore. Barcarole, Mrs. Alfred Shaw, "Il segreto per esser felice," Lucrezia Borgia (Donizetti). Glee, Miss Bassano, Miss Maria B. Hawes, and Signor Ferrari, "Sleep, gentle lady" (Sir H. R. Bishop). Finale, "God save the Queen."

The dancing commenced soon after eight o'clock, and, with the interval of the concert, continued with spirit till a late hour. Refreshments, under the superintendence of Messrs. Bathe and Breach, were served during the whole evening, and there was nothing to detract from the pleasures of an evening which must have been most favourable to the benevolent object for which the entertainment was given.

School for the Indigent Blind.—A general court of the subscribers to this charity, instituted in 1799, was held on Tuesday at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street, for the purpose of electing seven male and four female pupils, Mr. John Richards in the chair. It appeared from the report of the committee, which was laid upon the table, that the pupils were now taught to read by means of printing in raised or embossed letters, according to the plan of Mr. Alston, of Glasgow, who had completed the whole Bible after that system. Since the opening of the institution, 294 persons had been returned to their families, after being enabled to earn from 6*s.* to £1 8*s.* per week. The number of pupils who were clothed, boarded, and instructed, had increased from 75 to 92, most of whom were employed in the manufactory which had lately been established, where they made clothes, shoes, door mats, rugs, and basket work, the proceeds of the sale of which during the past year had amounted to £1718. Several of the pupils were now instructed in music, with a view to their becoming organists and teachers of psalmody. The receipts from 1840 to 1841 were £10,922, and the expenditure £9713, leaving a balance in the hands of the treasurer of £1207. The result of the day's election having been announced, the court, which was numerously attended, broke up.

Insolvent Debtors' Court.—We are enabled to state, that it is now determined upon, that the office of Commissioner of the Insolvent Court, vacant by the death of Mr. Commissioner Bowen, is not to be filled up.

At the sale of Mr. Chalmers' library on Wednesday, a collection of proclamations in the reign of James I., was the most important and valuable lot disposed of, and sold for 71*l.* "Older's Acquittal," stated to be the second book printed in Ireland, and bearing date at Waterford, in 1555, produced only 2*l.* 18*s.*

Prince George of Cambridge has, through his solicitor, Mr. Parkinson, given an unquantified contradiction to the slanderous imputation on the honour of his Royal Highness, and that of the scion of a noble house, which was in circulation some weeks since.

General the Hon. Sir Edward Paget, Bart., Governor of Chelsea Hospital, brother of the Marquis of Anglesey, who has been so seriously ill as to be confined to his bed for some weeks in Cowes Castle, is, we are happy to say, gradually mending, and was on Wednesday able to sit up for a short time, but not able to leave his room. He was considered in so serious a state, that all his children were gathered round him.

The undernamed gentlemen were called to the degree of Barrister at Law by the Honourable Society of Gray's Inn, on Wednesday last, viz.: James William Freshfield, Esq.; Christopher Good, Esq.; and Frederick Cosens, Esq.

The statue of the Duke of Wellington intended for the City is finished, but the committee have not yet decided on the site it is to occupy. The subscription for it is somewhat under £15,000. Mr. C. Wyatt has the West-end statue of the duke confided to him, £23,000 for which have already been subscribed.

Highgate Improvement.—A meeting was held at the Gatehouse, Highgate, on Tuesday evening, the 13th instant, when it was proposed to apply to Parliament for an act to improve this hamlet. The meeting was addressed by several gentlemen, who severally dilated upon the inconvenience they experienced in mounting the hill without the aid of gas lights, and having to pass the banks of the Highgate ponds after dining out. These being the most serious inconveniences which the speakers had to complain of, an amendment was proposed that the meeting be adjourned sine die, and, after a desultory conversation, the amendment was put and carried by a large majority.

Loss of the Waterloo Convict Ship.—It appears, by a reference to Lloyd's Register of Shipping, that the Waterloo stands Æ1, that is a second-rate vessel of the first class; that she had a new deck and large repair in 1833 had her damages repaired in 1836—refitted, doubled, and coppered, in 1839, and sundry repairs in 1842. She was surveyed by the Honourable East India Company's surveyor in April of the present year, and sailed on her ill-fated voyage in June last. By the same register it appears that the Abercrombie Robinson, a vessel lost at the same time and place as the Waterloo, stands on the same letter with scarcely any repairs.

On Wednesday evening last the members and friends of the Licensed Victuallers' Protection Society had their annual festivity at the Crown and Anchor Tavern in the Strand, when upwards of four hundred sat down to dinner. The chair was ably filled by W. Nicholson, Esq. supported by Benjamin Wood Esq., M.P. The object of this society is to protect the trade against those base informers, perfidious policemen, and tyrannical magistrates, and for some years past this manly and independent purpose has been achieved in a manner highly creditable to it.

His Imperial Highness the Archduke of Austria, who is at present making an inspection of everything worthy of observation in the metropolis, visited the Reform Club last week, and was conducted by Mr. Walter Scott (the secretary) through the principal rooms of the building. His Royal Highness entered his name in the subscription book for Mons. Soyer's plan of the Kitchen, and also viewed the paintings by the late Madame Sayer.—[We intend presenting our readers with an engraving of the kitchen department of the Reform Club next week.] On Monday his Imperial Highness visited the Polytechnic Institution; and on Tuesday the Woolwich dockyard. He has also been to the British Museum, and spent several hours in going over the saloons of Roman and Greek antiquities. On Wednesday he dined at the French Embassy.

On Wednesday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when Loftus Wigram, Esq., was unanimously appointed the Company's Standing Counsel, in the room of the late Mr. Sergeant Spankie.

The Times, in reference to the loss of the Convict-ship, Waterloo, had some very severe strictures with regard to the mode of sending out convicts generally, and suggested, on the authority of a colonial paper that in the instance in question the calamitous loss of life had arisen from the unseaworthiness of the vessel. It appears however, that the ship in question was in every respect equal to the Abercrombie Robinson, and, indeed, had been much more recently repaired: a circumstance which has induced the Times to observe, as we think, very properly, that, "whatever imputations may attach to the mode in which the transport service is performed, they do not apply to the Waterloo."

At the Sessions-house, Newington-causeway, last week, T. Judd, a butcher, in Suffolk-street, Newington-causeway, was fined £5 and costs for using a jerry attached to his scales, by which his customers were defrauded to the extent of two ounces in each purchase. The court expressed their regret that they could not fine the defendant in a greater amount.—[Why not have the law altered so as to enable the justices to send these public robbers of the poor to the treadmill without reference to a fine at all? In Constantinople the bakers who endeavour to defraud the public, by giving short weight, are reminded of the impropriety by being nailed by the ears to their own doors.—Cannot some simple remedy of this kind be resorted to in England?]

Fires in the Metropolis.—At a few minutes before ten o'clock on Tuesday morning a fire broke out in the extensive paper warehouse of Messrs. Edwards and Co., No. 5, Little Saint Thomas the Apostle, City. Mr. Edwards, accompanied by his clerks, &c., came from the counting-house at No. 5, and opened the door, upon which the flames burst forth with great fury, and proved to be the extensive stock of paper having spontaneously ignited. The fire was speedily extinguished.—On Monday night a fire broke out about nine o'clock in the house of Mr. Perry, baker, Wellington-place, Back-road, St. George's in the East, and consumed nearly the whole of the household furniture. No portion of the property was insured.—About the same time a fire was discovered in the house of Mr. Hasleworth, Three Herrings-court, Red Cross-street, Cripplegate, but was soon arrested in its progress by the quick arrival of firemen and engines from the Whitecross-street station. A fire also took place about twelve in the work-shed of Mr. Gaskin, leather-stainer, Beech-street, Barbican, and considerable damage done to the stock.

A fourth fire broke out about midnight in the workshops of Mr. Scarlett, wheelwright, Hargrave-terrace, Bermondsey New-road; although the fire was soon extinguished, nearly all the contents of the workshop were destroyed.—On Wednesday morning, about twenty minutes before one o'clock, a fire broke out on the premises of Messrs. Martyn, wholesale tea-dealers, No. 70, Holborn-hill. The different persons in the establishment escaped over the back of the house by means of a portable fire-escape. Several engines were soon on the spot, and the fire was subdued, but not before damage to the amount of nearly £500 was sustained, which will fall upon the West of England Insurance Company. The fire was caused through an escape of gas under the shop.—About two o'clock the same morning a fire broke out in the workshops of Mr. Jaques, brushmaker, Kent-street, Borough. Before the engines could be brought to bear on the flames the contents of the workshops were one burning mass. By half-past two o'clock, through the united exertions of the firemen, the destructive element was subdued, but property to a considerable amount was destroyed, including workmen's tools. The building destroyed had but recently been built, Mr. Jaques having experienced a loss by fire about six months ago. How the fire originated has not been ascertained. The stock only has been insured in the Union Fire-office.

Fatal Freak.—On Sunday evening last as a young man, who, with others, was passing over Waterloo-bridge towards the Strand, he suddenly left his friends, and as he said, "for a lark he would walk over on the stone-work." He mounted the first recess, and was proceeding on his foolhardy exploit, when he overbalanced himself and fell into the water, previous to which he struck his head against the coping-stone. He was picked up in a few minutes afterwards, but life was quite extinct.

Murder of a Woman by her Husband in Milton-street, Cripplegate.—On Saturday last, the utmost excitement prevailed in the above mentioned neighbourhood, in consequence of a report that a woman named Doyle, living in Bell-yard, Milton-street, had been murdered by her husband, who is an Irish labourer. Which, on inquiry, was found to be too true. It appeared that the parties had quarrelled, and the unfortunate woman having refused to give up some money which she had concealed, he dragged her out of bed, beat her, and after stamping on her chest and stomach, went away, leaving her in a state of insensibility. Next day Doyle returned, and begged of her to forgive him. The poor woman told him to make his escape, for she knew the hand of death was on her; he then absconded. She shortly after expired. The poor woman has left two children, one by Doyle and one by a former husband, to deplore her loss.

POSTSCRIPT.

Friday Evening.

The Hon. Fox Maule was on Tuesday elected Lord Rector of the University of Glasgow by a majority in all the nations. His opponent was the Marquis of Bute.

Court-martial on Lieut. Geale.—The Cork Constitution says, it is expected that the charges preferred against Second Lieut. Piers Geale, of the 5th Fusiliers, will not be investigated, as that officer has applied to the Horse Guards for permission to sell out of the army.

Death of the Bishop of Cashel.—The Right Rev. Dr. Sandes, Bishop of Cashel and Waterford, died at his residence in Fitzwilliam-square, Dublin, on Monday. Dr. Sandes had long been a fellow of the University of Dublin, and was elevated to the see of Cashel by the late Government.

Bail Court, Friday. (Before Mr. Justice Patteson.)—Application was made to the learned judge in this court to fix the amount of bail required from Captain Douglas, whose case will be found fully reported elsewhere. His lordship, however, required time for consideration, and the prisoner was removed in a hackney-coach to the Queen's Bench Prison.

FOREIGN.

France.—We have received the Paris journals and our private correspondence dated Wednesday, but there is not much news to communicate. Our correspondent states that a stormy session is anticipated at the meeting of the French Chambers in January, and a change of Cabinet is confidently predicted by the parties who are peculiarly interested to overturn the existing Administration. He also expresses his opinion that a coalition is inevitable. We learn that his Majesty is very discontented with the conduct of the Duke of Nemours, the future Regent of France. He finds him stiff and unbending, deficient in tact, not conciliatory in language, like his late brother. At a family circle lately, after listening to the paternal reproaches for some time, the Duke de Nemours replied in nearly the following terms:—"What can you expect from me? I have received nothing but insults and annoyances since I have been a Prince of a reigning house. The aristocracy in the country regard me with contempt. The Liberals refused me an apanage first, and then a dotation. You forced me to marry the daughter of an Austrian general, and, now that I have a child, I am forced against my will to act as the Regent for my nephew. I do my best to meet your views, but I cannot shake hands fraterer la main was the original expression made use of by the duke) with all the canaille who approach me."

The Constitutionnel has an article on the rupture between the King of Naples and his brother, the Prince of Capua. He denies that the Prince has been deprived of his resources, and left to the munificence of the British Court.

M. Alphonse Rocco, son-in-law of Count de Rambuteau, and last surviving son of M. de Staël, died on Sunday at Paris.

The son of the celebrated Tippoo Saib had just died in Paris.

The Brazils.—Falmouth, Wednesday Night.—Her Majesty's steam-sloop Favorite (of the unfortunate Niger expedition) passed up Channel to-day; and her Majesty's steamer Dee, for the West Indies, still remains here. Her Majesty's brig packet Crane, Lieut. Lewis, commander, arrived this morning from Rio de Janeiro direct, bringing treasure to the amount of £219,000 sterling on merchants' account, and two passengers only, viz.—M. S. Monseoff, Russian Ambassador to the Court of Brazil, and Count Stackelberg, his attaché, on their return home. The province of Minas has been perfectly restored to order, and an immediate revival of trade therewith was anticipated. The Crane left at Rio her Majesty's ships Alfred, Viper, Curlew, and Crescent, and the American ship-of-war Delaware, and the Enterprise schooner. Her Majesty's schooner Viper had brought up the Buenos Ayres mails to Rio de Janeiro. Her Majesty's ship Malabar sailed for Monte Video on the 9th of October; and her Majesty's brig Curlew arrived on the 12th following from a cruise.

VISIT OF HER MAJESTY TO WALMER CASTLE.

On Thursday morning, the 10th inst., at half-past seven o'clock, her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and the Princess Royal, attended by the Dowager Lady Lyttelton, Preceptress to the Princess Royal; Lady Portman, the Lady in Waiting; Viscount Sidney, the Lord in Waiting; Lord Charles Wellesley, the Equerry in Waiting on her Majesty; and Col. Wylde, the Equerry in Waiting on his Royal Highness Prince Albert, left the Castle for Slough.

The royal cortège, which consisted of three carriages and four, escorted by a detachment of the Life Guards, arrived at the Slough station a few minutes before eight. Mr. Saunders, secretary to the Great Western Railway Company, and Mr. Brunel, the company's chief engineer, received her Majesty, and accompanied the train to the terminus at Paddington.

The Hon. C. A. Murray, the Master of the Household, and several others of her Majesty's suite, left Slough as early as half-past six, to enable them to reach their place of destination in time to receive her Majesty and his Royal Highness on their arrival at Walmer Castle.

The royal party were escorted by a body of light cavalry, through Hyde-park, Grosvenor-place, over Vauxhall-bridge, through Camberwell, New-cross, and Deptford, to the Green Man Hotel, Blackheath, where they halted to change horses. It having been confidently reported that the royal cortège would reach Blackheath by half-past eight o'clock, a vast concourse of the élite of the neighbourhood assembled in front of the hotel to evince their loyalty on the occasion. The whole of the front rooms of the hotel were occupied by ladies, and the large assembly-room of the Green Man was crowded by upwards of 400 young persons from the numerous seminaries in the vicinity, who had been invited by Mr. Whitmarsh, the worthy host. On the outside of the hotel there could not have been less than 1500 well-dressed persons, who received her Majesty and the Prince with loud acclamations. Mr. Mallalieu, superintendent, and a body of the R division of police, were on the spot, and preserved excellent order. Mr. Whitmarsh was commanded by her Majesty and Prince Albert to wait upon the Princess Sophia Matilda to express their kind regards, and inform her Royal Highness that her Majesty and family were quite well. The royal cortège, after a stay of about five minutes, departed at half-past nine o'clock precisely, at a rapid pace, for Walmer, by Shooter's-hill, Dartford, Rochester, and Canterbury.

At every stage of her journey her Majesty was met by crowds of persons—on the road-side, or lining the streets and filling the houses in the towns—who all hailed her appearance among them with the most lively demonstrations of regard and attachment.

At more than one town on her route it had been the wish of the authorities, and of the principal inhabitants, to offer her some formal demonstrations of their respect, in the shape of deputations with addresses; but an early communication from Sir James Graham to the authorities of Canterbury put a stop to any such attempts, as her Majesty was particularly desirous to reach Walmer on the evening of the day of her departure from Windsor. For that reason alone it was that her Majesty, through the Secretary of State for the Home Department, intimated her wish to decline receiving any of the proposed addresses.

The absence of all such points of attraction to the inhabitants, however, perhaps only served the more to show that in crowding in such multitudes as they did to see their Queen their motives and feelings were those of personal affection and respect towards herself. The demonstrations of regard made as her Majesty passed through the different towns near to London were so general and uniform as to make it unnecessary to particularise them. At Gravesend, Rochester, Chatham, Sittingbourne—indeed at every available point on the route—the population poured out to a man to welcome her and her illustrious family.

THE QUEEN ENTERING CANTERBURY.

At Canterbury particular preparations were made to greet her, as well by the authorities as by the inhabitants. The presentation of any address being declined, the corporation of the city could not meet her Majesty officially, but they did what the etiquette of the case allowed to welcome her. The Westgate, at the entrance of the city from London, was converted into a triumphal arch, through which her Majesty would pass. It was adorned profusely with evergreens, and surmounted by flags. In the centre were the royal initials emblazoned, and the crown on either side of the arch. A range of seats, in the amphitheatrical form, was raised, on which ladies connected with the different authorities of the town were accommodated. These seats were embellished with flags bearing appropriate devices expressive of loyalty to her Majesty. From this point the whole line which forms the principal street of Canterbury was fitted up with a greater or less degree of taste. There was not a single house in this long range of buildings that was not in some way embellished in order to afford an external symbol of welcome to the Queen. More generally the fronts of the houses were hung with evergreens, but there were at every other house also flags and devices, some very handsome. The mottoes bespoke the feelings of those who put them forward; and blessings and wishes for long life to her Majesty, her consort, and the Prince and Princess were those that predominated. The scene was very animated, quite as much so as a similar one would be in the metropolis. Nor were the numbers wanting that make a royal procession in London so grand a sight. Every window of every house was crowded with anxious faces; and, what made the scene still more striking was, that almost every hand held a small bough of evergreen to wave in welcome to her Majesty. The military stationed at Canterbury lined the way, their glittering arms curiously contrasting with the more peaceful and leafy weapons held by the people. More than one triumphal arch spanned the street, and in many places galleries festooned with drapery, and crowded with beholders, added animation to the scene. It need hardly be added that on every elevated position were clustered groups of eager expectants.

Shortly before three o'clock the royal party was descried approaching the Westgate, and the cheering which ensued speedily announced the event to the opposite extremity of the city. The cortège proceeded slowly along the streets, a royal salute thundering its welcome, and the cheering of the people almost rising above the quick reports of the cannon. The delay of changing horses gave many an opportunity of catching a long-wished-for glimpse of the Queen and her royal consort.

Her Majesty bowed repeatedly to the crowd on either side, as did also Prince Albert. The good people of Canterbury seemed highly delighted at the condescension of the royal pair, but more especially with the two infants. With that considerateness that often marks her Majesty in these public journeys, the nurses were desired each to hold one child to each side of the carriage, so that the people on each side saw either the Prince or the Princess. The royal carriages passed through Canterbury at the rate of about five miles an hour. They changed horses at the Fountain, and, after a delay of a quarter of an hour, proceeded on towards Sandwich, passing through a second triumphal arch, accompanied by the cheers of the people, and also by an immense crowd of persons of all ranks who ran after them.

Her Majesty was escorted to Broughton-hill by a troop of the 8th Dragoons. These were relieved by a troop of the 7th Hussars, now in barracks at Canterbury, who were again relieved by another troop of the same regiment, which proceeded on to Sandwich. There was also a guard of honour of (as we understood) the 51st Infantry.

SECOND TRIUMPHAL ARCH.

The royal cortège proceeded through St. George's-street and Bridge-street, along St. Paul's-street and Longport, on the Deal road, and turned off at the turnpike-gate at Upper Deal.

Although many centuries back this ancient metropolis of the kingdom of Kent could boast of being the residence of its Kings, regal visits within the last century have been seldom; and consequently the progress of the Queen through the city on this occasion could not fail to call forth the loyal feelings of the inhabitants.

The visits of Sovereigns to the city in olden times have supplied the contemporary chroniclers with materials of an amusing description—narrating, with the greatest minuteness, the usages adopted for their reception and entertainment. The most celebrated in the annals of the city were the visit of Henry VI. and his Queen to pay their devotions at the tomb of the martyr (Thomas a'Becket), in 1450; and Edward IV. and Queen Elizabeth, his consort, in 1462, when Archbishop Bouchier is stated by Hasted to have entertained them "very splendidly and nobly" on their pilgrimage to Becket's shrine, and it appears costly presents were given to the King and Queen by the corporation. Richard III. came to Canterbury in 1483, when he was the means of conferring some important benefits on the city charters. The next royal visit on record was that of Henry VIII. and Queen Catherine. Queen Mary passed through the city in 1558, on her way to Sir Thomas Moyle's residence, and was presented by the citizens with a purse of 20 angels (10*l.*) The visits of Queen Elizabeth in 1573 and 1582 are, however, the most brilliant handed down in history. On the first visit of that popular Sovereign she held a Court at the Abbey of St. Augustine, converted into a Palace by Henry VIII., her father, on the dissolution of the monasteries; and on her arrival the corporation presented her with 60 angels (30*l.*) in a "scented" purse, and the heralds, sergeants-at-arms, and the attendants in the royal retinue, were liberally provided with presents by the citizens. It is generally known that Charles I. consummated his marriage with Henrietta of France at St. Augustine, in 1625, and that unfortunate King again visited the city, in 1641. Charles II., at the Restoration, stayed some days at St. Augustine's Palace, and at the time he went through the city to Dover, with his Queen, a banquet was provided by the then mayor. William III. was sumptuously banqueted in 1690, and in 1695, when on his way to the Continent. George I. and George II. also made visits to the city.

Everywhere along the line of road her Majesty's progress was hailed with the most enthusiastic demonstrations of affectionate regard, which at intervals appeared considerably to affect the royal pair.

HER MAJESTY PASSING THROUGH ASH.

At Deal the occasion was observed as a general holiday, every shop being closed, in order to give all classes and persons an opportunity of participating in the general happiness of receiving their beloved Queen.

Shortly after two o'clock the mayor, aldermen, and town-council, and several hundred of the inhabitants, met at the Town-hall, whence a procession was marshalled to proceed to Upper Deal, to receive her Majesty at the confines of the borough.

Numerous boatmen, bearing the flags of all nations, preceded by the royal standard.
The children of the Deal Charity Schools, two and two.
Band of music.
The mace bearer.
The mayor.
The Rev. Mr. Buckhouse.
Aldermen of the borough.
Town-councillors.
The inhabitants of Deal, consisting of several hundred, four deep.
The Deal pilots.
The Deal boatmen.

CANTERBURY CATHEDRAL.

Upon the arrival of the procession at the triumphal arch at Sheldon, which had been erected across the road leading from Sandwich to Deal, the mayor and corporation, with the clergy of the neighbourhood and the civil authorities, stationed themselves near the park gates of Mr. Igguldon, where they awaited the arrival of their Sovereign.

TRIUMPHAL ARCH AT SHELDEN.

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON MEETING THE QUEEN AT SANDWICH.

The officers of the dockyard, and the officers of the custom-house, and the whole of the fellowship pilots, ranged themselves on the opposite side.

Upwards of 1000 of the inhabitants lined the road for a considerable distance on either side.

The boatmen of Deal were stationed along the road in detachments of six each, every other man bearing, alternately, a flag and a torch.

Amongst those who awaited the arrival of the royal cortège at this point of her Majesty's route was the "observed of all observers"—the hero of a hundred battles—his Grace the Duke of Wellington himself. The venerable warrior had that morning personally inspected the whole of the arrangements and alterations, which had been finally completed, for the reception of her Majesty at Walmer Castle; and having subsequently visited his illustrious relatives, the Earl and Countess of Mornington, at Deal Castle, now presented himself on the boundary of his jurisdiction as Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, to pay fealty and homage to his youthful Sovereign and guest.

On the arrival of the royal carriage his grace approached, and was received by the Queen and her royal consort with marked cordiality, who also invited him to take a seat in the royal carriage; but his grace, with true nobility of manner, courteously declined the honour. Instantly on the Queen's carriage resuming its route to Walmer, the noble and gallant duke galloped off by a different road to the castle, in order to receive the Queen on her arrival.

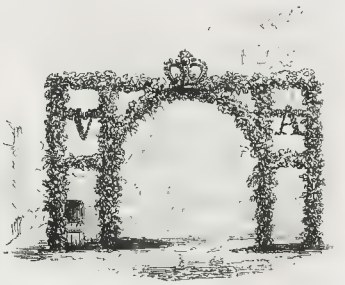
Nothing could exceed the joyous welcome given to her Majesty and his Royal Highness by the loyal inhabitants of this part of the country, who had assembled from the neighbouring towns and villages for several miles round. There was scarcely a house but what exhibited some appropriate emblem or device. The royal ensign, flags of every hue and nation, were suspended from the public buildings, across the streets, and from the windows of many of the principal houses; and the vessels along the coast were also decked out in their gayest colours.

Precisely at five minutes past four o'clock the royal party reached Walmer Castle, and were received at the entrance by the Duke of Wellington, who had preceded their arrival by a few minutes. The guard of honour was drawn up at the entrance and received her Majesty, who appeared in excellent health and spirits, with a royal salute.

The troops, consisting of 130 men, with Captains Purvis and Brownrigg and Lieutenant Lord Hinton, under the command of Colonel Paget, were drawn up in line, at the southern extremity of the drawbridge, and also received the Queen with a royal salute.

The saluting battery at the castle consisted of six guns, which are mounted outside of the moat, a very short distance from the castle. These cannon, and indeed the eight guns on the ramparts, are a portion of those which were captured from the French on the "glorious 1st of June, 1794," by the English fleet under the command of Lord Howe.

The flooring of a long, stone-paved, wide, open avenue, leading from the drawbridge, through the archway, to the principal entrance to the interior of the castle, had, for her Majesty's reception, been boarded over, and a carpet laid down throughout the whole distance The whole of this passage had been enclosed with the furniture of the celebrated tent of Tippoo Saib, and formed an avenue of eight feet in height, and of about the same width.



ARCH AT TOLLHAR.

This passage, as well as a great portion of the long passage in the interior, had been warmed by means of hot air from a large stove of a peculiar construction, erected, out of sight, behind the awning of the tent.

The Duke of Wellington, after receiving her Majesty and the Prince, took his departure for Dover Castle. Captain Watts, as Captain of Walmer Castle, was deputed to act in his official capacity during his grace's absence.

Shortly after the arrival of her Majesty and his Royal Highness the Queen and Prince went out to look upon the sea, but only for about five minutes, the wind being rather cold.

The royal dinner circle was confined to the distinguished personages who accompanied her Majesty and his Royal Highness from town.

It may be here observed, that nothing has been neglected to be done which could in the slightest degree tend to add to the comfort of her Majesty and her illustrious consort during the visit of the Court to this ancient fortress.

ARCH IN FRONT OF PRIVATE HOUSE AT WALMER.

The following description of the interior arrangements, however, may not be uninteresting to our readers. It will be remembered that, a fortnight since, we gave a view of the castle, with a brief description of it:—

The rooms selected for the use of the Court are 20 in number, the greater portion of them facing the eastward, looking towards the French coast, and affording, in fine clear weather, uninterrupted views, even with the naked eye, of the lighthouse at Calais, the mill on the French heights, the spire of Calais Church, and other prominent objects on the opposite shore.

The duke's dining-room and an adjoining bedroom (the principal sleeping apartment at the castle) have been thrown into one for the dormitory of her Majesty and the Prince. There are two convenient dressing-rooms leading from either end of this apartment, for the Queen and his Royal Highness. The dining-room portion of this apartment is ornamented with several rare old prints of various English and foreign ports.

The duke's drawing-room, an apartment of very convenient dimensions, has been converted into a drawing-room for the Queen. This room, which is elegantly yet neatly furnished (partaking in many respects of the well-known plainness and simplicity of his grace), contains numerous framed engravings of several illustrious Sovereigns and statesmen, amongst which we observed the Emperor Nicholas I. of Russia; the late George IV., from Northcote's picture; the duke's own portrait, by Lucas; the Marquis of Londonderry, from Sir Thomas Lawrence; the duke, when Sir Arthur Wellesley, from Hoppner, &c. There are likewise engravings from the whole of Raphael's Cartoons. This apartment, and an ante-room adjoining, face the east, looking across the Straits towards the French coast.

Another sitting-room, formerly used by the duke as his small dining-room, facing the south-east, contains the portraits of Lord Nelson, Lord North, William Pitt, George IV., Lord Thurlow, George II., Lord Liverpool, the Earl of Mansfield, Lord Hawkesbury, and several other distinguished persons.

The prevailing colour of the hangings and furniture of the whole of these apartments (the same as at Apsley House) is yellow.

The portion of the fortress appropriated for the exclusive use of their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal, the Dowager Lady Lyttelton, and the attendants upon the Prince and Princess, are the outworks, or the north tower, with the windows facing a northerly direction. Four rooms have thus been set apart for the department of the royal nursery.

Three or four additional sleeping rooms, and a sitting and ante room for the occupation of the Lord and Lady in Waiting, the Hon. C. A. Murray, the Master of the Household, &c., have been prepared in other convenient portions of the castle.

A large house, about three-quarters of a mile from the fortress, has been engaged by Mr. Saunders, the inspector of palaces, for the accommodation of the Lord, Groom, and Equerry in Waiting, and other members of the royal household, the rooms at the castle not being sufficiently numerous to afford sleeping apartments for the whole of her Majesty's and Prince Albert's suites.

The following revenue cutters lay off Walmer Castle the whole of Thursday evening week, with their masts and rigging brilliantly illuminated with an immense number of blue lights, which had a very pleasing effect from the shore:—The Ranger, Lieutenant Baker, commander; the Lady Flora, Lieutenant Batt; and the Sea Lark, Mr. Quested, commander.

The illuminations on Thursday se'nnight, throughout the extensive

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

PORTSMOUTH.—The Pique frigate, Capt. Stopford, is hourly expected from Quebec, with detachments of the Guards. All sorts of reports have been circulated during the past week, owing to her non-arrival, the last of which was that she had foundered, and all hands perished, and that the allotment money had been stopped from the wives of the seamen at the pay-office.—The appointment of commander-in-chief of this port has at last taken place, Admiral Sir E. Codrington having on Thursday last received an official notification from the Board of Admiralty that Admiral Sir Charles Rowley, G.C.B., was to relieve him of his duties at the expiration of the present month. Captain R. F. Rowley, son of the gallant admiral, will be his flag-captain, and Mr. W. White (2), master of the flag-ship, and Mr. R. Haig, secretary.—The Vindictive frigate, Capt. Sir Nicholas Lockyer, bearing the flag of Rear-Admiral Sir T. Cochrane, arrived at Hong Kong on the 19th of June, after a remarkable voyage of four months only from England, and having been less than eighty days under sail. Sir Thomas Cochrane had shifted his flag to the Meanoo steamer, and proceeded up the Canton river, to join the squadron, in company with the Nimrod, Cruiser, and Wolverine.

GIBRALTAR, Nov. 3.—Her Majesty's ships Rodney and Cambridge arrived yesterday from Malta; the former to relieve the Formidable, ordered up, and the latter to proceed to Portsmouth, to be paid off. Sir A. Woodford, late Governor of Gibraltar, with his family and suite, embarked on board her Majesty's ship Warspite, Lord John Hay, and was received with the customary salutes, the ships of war manning their yards as the same time. Sir R. Wilson had been sworn in as governor of the fortress on the 31st ult. Sir Alexander and family, at half-past five, removed to her Majesty's mail steam-packet Roy Tarleton, and at six sailed for Falmouth, to wait the arrival of the Warspite, in which he is to proceed to England.

THIRD COURT-MARTIAL ON LIEUTENANT GEALE.—For the trial of Second Lieutenant Piers Geale, of the Northumberland Fusiliers, the following officers composing the court-martial were ordered to assemble on the 9th in the garrison of Cork:—Major-Gen. D'Aguilar, C.B., commanding British district, President: Lieut.-Col. E. Mounin, (89th); Lieut.-Col. J. Clarke, 76th; Major M. Evans, Royal Artillery; Major J. C. Wallington, 10th Hussars; Major G. Goodal; 2nd Battalion list of Royal Regiment; Major J. Gordon, 35th; Major T. Reed, 76th; Major R. F. Martin, 76th Regiment; four captains and two lieutenants. David Walker, Esq., Deputy Judge Advocate-General. The assembling of the court is postponed for a few days. The charges are:—1st, For having, at Kilkenny, on or about the 28th day of September, 1842, falsely asserted to several officers of the depot, that a false and libellous paragraph, which appeared in the Kilkenny Journal of the 24th of that month, denied, "A case for the United Service Gazette," reflecting on his commanding officer and the officers of the regiment to which he, Second Lieutenant Geale, belongs, was not false, but perfectly true. 2d, For having continued to assert, both with the above and several editor of the Kilkenny Journal, after the false and libellous paragraph, referred to in the first charge, had been published in that newspaper, more especially considerable manner in which Second Lieut. Geale's name was introduced into that paragraph. 3d, For having, at Kilkenny, on or about the 27th day of September, 1842, when asked by his commanding officer, in the presence of the next senior officer and the Depot Adjutant, if he, Second Lieut. Geale, still adhered to his previously-expressed determination to prefer the society of the author of the false and calumnious paragraphs and articles that had appeared in the Kilkenny Journal, reflecting on the officers of the depot, to that of his brother officers, deliberately repeat that he did all such conduct on the part of Second Lieut. Geale being unbecoming the character of an officer and a gentleman, subversive of the harmony and good feeling which ought to subsist between officers of the same corps, and to the serious injury of her Majesty's service.

MALTA, Nov. 6.—Under this head we have little to add to our communications by the overland (India) mail of the 30th and Great Liverpool's mail of the 31st ult., our movements since having been confined to the arrival, on the 1st inst., of the Locust steam-tender from Tripoli, bringing nothing of interest, and the Hellene corvette, the Amalia, from Patras; and the departure, on the 3rd, of the Indus ship of the line for Smyrna, but whose subsequent will not, it is reported, exceed six weeks. The Acteon steam-packet left for the Ionian Islands and Patras on the 1st, and the Devastation war steamer for Tripoli and Tunis on the 2nd. The news of the rising of the Arabs against the French is confirmed; it is stated, that, up to the 31st ult; the loss of the French, in officers alone, already amounted to 26 The news from Syria has opened the eyes of our naval commander-in-chief to the necessity of having a force in the East. The Hecate bomb, three-decker, bearing the flag of Rear-Admiral Sir F. Mason, puts to sea to-morrow, for Salamis. The Inconstant (inspected on the 8th by Sir F. Mason) follows immediately, but her destination is said to be Beyrout; and the Vanguard, ship of the line, for the same quarter, is fitting with all despatch. All these vessels have completed five months' provisions.

SHIPS IN PORT.—Queen, 110 (bearing the flag of Vice-Admiral Sir E. W. C. Rich Owen, K.C.B., G.C.B.); Howe, 120 (bearing the flag of Rear-Admiral Sir F. Mason, K.C.B.); Ceylon, 6 (bearing the flag of Rear-Admiral Sir John Louis, Bart.); Impregnable, 104; Monarch, 84; Vanguard, 80; Inconstant frigate, 34; Snake brig, 10; Prometheus and Firebrand steam-packets; Stork, Naiad, and Antelope yachts; Mentor, Sesostris, and Euroclydon French steam-packets; and the Amalia, Greek corvette.

CHATHAM.—On Wednesday morning, at five o'clock, the second division, comprising three companies of the 97th Regiment, marched from Chatham Barracks to Gravesend, where they embarked on board a Gravesend steamer for London-bridge. The strength of the division consists of 344 rank and file, 13 sergeants, 14 corporals, and 4 drummers, with 16 women, and 37 children, under the command of Captain Neville, with Captain Muskit; Lieut. Hutton, Paymaster; Lieut. Brasazon, Lieut.-Adjutant Bruce, Lieut. Burton, Ensign Ferres, Quartermaster-Ensign Harence, Ensign Keily, and Staff Assistant-Surgeon M'Gregor. This division will proceed from the terminus of the Southampton Railway, at Vauxhall, for Winchester Barracks, where it is expected they will remain until January next, when they will embark from Portsmouth for Corfu.

The Cambridge, 74, is hourly expected from the Mediterranean to be paid off.

The Warspite, 50, will not be home for a few days; she is to bring home Sir A. Woodfull, the late Governor of Gibraltar; but his excellency, with his family, left Gibraltar in a steamer to spend a formal visit for a few days with the Spanish Governor of Cadiz, and the Warspite is to call at that city for him.

Her Majesty's ship Curacoa is arrived safe at Portsmouth with her valuable freight of specie, amounting to one million seven hundred thousand dollars. She sailed last from Rio Janeiro on the 20th September; consequently her dates are only one day later than those brought by the packet on Monday last.

NAVAL PROMOTIONS, &c.—Commander W. Griffin, late Ganges, to the rank of Captain. Mates A. T. Kynaston (1837), of the Royal George, G. R. Moyle, of the Excellent (1836), and G. H. Gardner (1835), of the Curacoa, to be Lieutenants. Lieutenants A. Cumming and C. R. Reed, to the Erebus. G. Oldmixon, to the Meggera; W. Winnicott, to the William and Mary yacht, for the service of the Lightning, vice Snell. Master W. C. Triphook, to the Frolic. Surgeon John Eatley, to the Hazard. Purser T. Middleton, to the Frolic. Assistant-Surgeons F. Negus, to the Frolic; W. Bateman, to the St. Vincent, vice Banks; W. M'Crae, to the Rhadamanthus. Chaplain the Rev. T. J. Mayo, Professor of Royal Naval College, to the Excellent. Midshipman E. Scrogg, to the S. Vincent. Clerk E. B. Robins, to the Victory. Volunteers, 1st class, C. S. Seaman, to the Bittern; W. H. Cannon, to the Frolic; Thomas Greed and C. S. Guthrie, to the Thunderer. Naval Instructor, P. Samweil, to the Queen

The embarkation of the 45th Regiment for foreign service has been countermanded. The two battalions are to be consolidated, and to continue on home duty until further orders.

The head-quarters of the 97th (Lieut.-Colonel Lockyer) embarked at Zante on the 16th ult. for Corfu. The 81st Regiment, lately quartered at Antigua on the 21st of September, and expected to be assembled in Barbadoes in December, previous to proceeding to Canada, on being relieved by the 77th, from Corfu, early in the spring of 1843. The 77th replace the 81st in Antigua, and the 46th proceed to Demerara

Last week the depot of the 19th Regiment, consisting of 200 men and 11 officers, marched through Hythe for Dover.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

THE LATE DREADFUL SHIPWRECKS IN TABLE BAY.

We last week gave a brief account of the loss of two large vessels, the Abercrombie Robinson and the Waterloo, which went on shore on Sunday, the 28th of August, on the south-eastern beach at the bottom of Table Bay. By the papers since received from Cape Town we are put in possession of the following particulars, which will be found to be of an exceedingly lamentable and heart-rending description

Both vessels were engaged as transports by the British Government. The Abercrombie Robinson had on board, besides her crew and several passengers, 301 soldiers, with their officers. She was a large ship, of nearly 1500 tons burden. After grounding near the shore she stood upright, and no lives have been lost. She will probably, or rather certainly, be a total wreck.

The Waterloo, a ship of 414 tons, bound to Van Diemen's Land, had on board, besides her crew, 219 male convicts, Dr. Helsell, in charge, Lieutenant Hext, Ensign Leigh, 30 men of her Majesty's 99th Regiment, 5 women, and 13 children. She took the ground between seven and twelve o'clock in the forenoon, and in fifteen or twenty minutes became a mass of rubbish; and now ensued a most piteous massacre. In about two hours and a half, amidst the crumbling heaps of their perilous prison, of men, women, and children, 194 were crushed, smashed, and drowned.

There was no preparation for saving life made on board or on shore. No life-buoys, no coils of rope lashed to casks, nor any apparatus for establishing a communication with the shore from the ship. On the shore there was no life-boat, no apparatus for throwing ropes over stranded vessels, nor anything, in short, to show that the Government or people here had ever before heard of such a thing as a shipwreck. We stood amongst thousands on the beach, within 150 yards of the dissolving fabric, looking on the agonized faces of our fellow-creatures as they sank in dozens, battered, and bruised, and suffocated: useless as children, or idiots, or wild Caffres.

The ship, it appears, was built twenty-seven years ago at Bristol. No longer fit to carry logs, she is fitted up, like other whilt d sepulchres, stuffed with a living cargo by a contractor, and despatched to the shores of the earth—a distance of more than 20,000 miles. No doubt a "survey of professional men" will "find" that there was no fault anywhere; that the Waterloo was a sound ship, thoroughly repaired, and in every way seaworthy; that she had on board all the equipments requisite for such a voyage and such a consignment; that the officers of the ship did all that human strength, directed by skill and animated by humanity could do; and that the accident must be ascribed entirely to a hurricane, a mountainous sea, and a remarkably hard beach

With respect to the appearance and mountainous sea, it is enough to observe, that there were twenty other vessels at anchor in the bay besides the Waterloo and the Abercrombie Robinson, and none of them parted from their anchors, or dragged them in any perceptible extent. The wind was blowing a gale, but by no means a violent one, and it was partly off shore. The sea was not running unusually high. Without ropes in their hands, or any precaution, men walked into the water up to their shoulders to drag out the bodies of the dead and dying, without the slightest risk. This could not have been done had the surf been such as gale causes on an open beach. These are facts to which thousands can bear witness.

With respect to the bottom or ground where the ship struck, some say it is rock, others that it is sand, like the rest of the beach. As soon as the weather is fine the Government will have the most convenient places marked for the method of disembarking her Majesty's troops or convicts. For some years back such "accidents" have been ascribed to the insufficiency of the lighthouse at the point of Green Point. That fault has just been remedied. The old lighthouse is now properly attended to, and the new one is so well placed, and so brilliant, that no man dare pretend to miss it, or to mistake it for anything else. Three, and some further improvements in this department, still in progress, were forced on Government by the remonstrances of the public, and particularly of the mercantile body. When the Helen was lost at the entrance of Table Bay, some months ago, the merchants' committee very properly inquired into the cause, and found, on the testimony of numerous witnesses, that the lights on that particular night were defective, and had thus misled the master of the vessel. This they represented to Government, and a remedy was it stantly found.

We recommend the same course in the present case. The committee cannot compel witnesses to attend or give evidence, but they can invite them; and, if interested parties disregard such invitations, that fact will not be without meaning

In the midst of unbecoming condemnation on some points, and charges of guilt on others, we have to mention that two unofficial spectator. Mr. Molteno and Mr. Still—procured the assistance of a common boat belonging to a Malay, which reached the Waterloo just as she was going to pieces and brought off two men; and, on a second trip, fastened a rope to the wreck. After this a large boat, belonging to Messrs. Sinclair, was brought from the Abercrombie Robinson, and, moving backwards and forwards along the rope, saved a good many lives. This shows what might have been done by a lifeboat, used in time

The South African Commercial Advertiser asks, in reference to this melancholy catastrophe, "Is it not strange that we should hear such lamentations from what is called the shipping interest, as if no employment could be had for their new built, fine-weather, copper-bottomed vessels, while, for the most important of all services, the transport, namely, of troops and of persons under judicial sentences, such vessels as the Waterloo find ready acceptance in the 27th year of their age?"

The same paper goes on to say that "the committee of the commercial body have instituted an inquiry into the circumstances attending this horrible event, as well as to the loss of the Abercrombie Robinson on the same occasion. The attention of the Government and of the Admiralty has been fixed on these two accidents; the public and the parties concerned may, therefore, expect that all the facts will be properly ascertained and made known."

The loss of life by the ruin of the Waterloo is, we learn, as follows:—convicts, 143; soldiers, 13; crew, 6; women and children, 14: total, 176.

So great a loss of life has not happened in Table Bay since the year 1799. On the 5th of November of that year his Majesty's ship Scepire, Captain Edwards, and the Dutch East Indiaman, the Waterloo, immediately went to pieces, being an accursed old hulk, on her way home to be broken up. A few hours after she struck not a vestige of her was to be seen, but the fragments of the vessel and the bodies of upwards of 400 pieces, not a single plank remaining whole, nor two attached together. Captain Edwards, his son, ten other officers, and near 300 seamen and marines perished.

On the same day the body of a drowned officer, among the rest a Danish man-of-war, of 64 guns. But their crews were all saved in the case of the Abercrombie Robinson on the present occasi

Taking advantage of this melancholy event, funds have been raised, and measures are taken for constructing life boats, and for having a rocket apparatus always in readiness in this bay, for rendering assistance to vessels driven on the shore by strong gales. But something more is required. A coroner's court must be established, through which a competent magistrate, with a jury, may at once ascertain the manner in which any unknown dead body has been washed ashore from a wreck. The propriety of adding such a court to our judicial establishment has been suggested to Government, and we feel confident that the suggestion will be acted upon without unnecessary delay. In the absence of such a court we feel constrained, by a regard to truth and plain dealing, to send home along with the account of these two shipwrecks our protest on behalf of Table Bay. The weather, the water, and the bottom are blameless.

LOSS OF THE RELIANCE EAST INDIAMAN.

It is with feelings of the most poignant regret we feel ourselves called upon to add to our list of catastrophes at sea this week the loss of the Reliance East Indiaman, at Etaples, near Boulogne, on Saturday last, by which 110 persons lost their lives, besides the sacrifice of property to an immense amount. The loss of 110 persons out of the 116 on board has cast a gloom of the most melancholy description among the merchants connected with the East India trade. Her last place of departure was St. Helena, and the parties interested in her fate were therefore in expectation every day of hearing of her safe arrival. It appears that of the crew and passengers, numbering the amount of persons already stated, there were saved only four, as described to be the ship's carpenter, and five Lascars, who reached the shore in one of the boats of the vessel. The Reliance was an old ship on this trading station, and had on board a cargo of an extraordinarily valuable description, consisting of tea and silk. Unfortunately for the insurance offices and underwriters in this country, their risks upon this vessel do not include more than from £15,000 to £20,000 for which it is said she is insured, the Indian offices—that is to say, the insurance offices of Calcutta and Bombay—being responsible for at least £150,000 to £180,000 of the entire amount. This ensures, with those reported from the Cape of Good Hope on Saturday, and others which have occurred on the coast of the late severe weather, have, in a material degree, depressed the feelings of parties connected with our shipping interest. The London insurance-offices, and also the underwriters, have suffered by the loss of the Abercrombie Robinson and the Waterloo, but, we are assured, not to any serious extent.

The following letters were received at Lloyd's from their agents at Boulogne-sur-Mer:

To William Dobson, Esq., Secretary, Lloyd's.

Nov. 12, 1842.

SIR, It is our painful duty to apprise you of the total loss of the Reliance, 1500 tons burthen, Thomas Green, commander, which vessel came on the coast of Merlimont last night, and went to pieces this morning: she left Canton on the 7th May, with a cargo of tea. We regret to add that only about eight or ten persons out of 122, composing the crew and passengers, have been saved. The last accounts we received from the coast does not give much information respecting the survivors; we only know that the ship's carpenter is saved, and it is from him that the ship's name was ascertained. The other survivors are men of colour. The English Consul has just gone round to the spot. The number of persons on board was—75 Englishmen, 37 Chinese, and 30 Dutchmen; total, 122

Nov. 13.—By advices just received from the coast we are informed that the names of the survivors are Robert Dixon, the carpenter; W. O'Neill, of Kingstown, Ireland; Johan Anderson, of Laurvig, Norway; Charles Butts, of Dantzic; and Silas Maisye. The body of Captain Green has been identified by the carpenter, also that of the fourth mate, and they are buried. Their remains will be conveyed here, where they will receive the rites of Christian burial. Captain Tucker, late commander of her Majesty's ship Iris, is among the drowned. Every thing has been done for the benefit of the owners of the vessel. The services received from the horse soldiers are in every way efficient.—We are, &c.,

[We understand that Griffin, who was the fourth mate, would have succeeded to a property of £12,000 by the decease of his mother. She had for some time been anxiously looking for his arrival, but died about eight days ago. One of the survivors states that Captain Green, who was an experienced seaman, mistook the French lights on the coast for some others, as one of them had been changed since he left England, about twelve months ago.]

Out of 27,000 boxes of tea on board only 1336 have been saved, but these are all more or less damaged. The captain and the fourth mate are among the bodies washed on shore. Captain Tucker, R.N., late of the Iris, and who embarked at St. Helena, is among the six passengers drowned, none of whose bodies have been yet discovered.

On Sunday the shore was crowded by the inhabitants from Etaples, and, with some soldiers that had been ordered by the French authorities to the wreck, were indefatigable in their exertions to recover the bodies of the unfortunate, but were washed ashore, and in endeavouring to restore animation; but, in most cases, their efforts proved fruitless. The six persons who are saved have not yet given any account (or none has transpired) of what they were; but, it is generally supposed that the light near this port was mistaken for that of the Ness

The Reliance appears to have had a boisterous voyage from China. On the 4th inst. the Apollo, of Newburyport, from Boston and the United States to Rotterdam, met with her in lat. 41 50, long. 14 00, and supplied her with provisions and water, the Reliance being nearly out of both. The value of the ship and cargo is estimated nearly at £230,000. It is reported that there were only six passengers on board the Reliance.

It is said that another vessel was lost on Saturday night in the Baie d'Authie, when four of her crew perished. She was laden with wine.

A Russian vessel, the Iris, had a narrow escape on Sunday. She, as it is supposed the Reliance did, mistook the Boulogne light for that of Dungeness, and, in the very dense fog, with the wind blowing tremendously from the NW., was standing on until nearly on the Boulogne Pier. On perceiving their danger they attempted to avoid it; but the ship missed stays, and they were saved only by the wind suddenly veering and the holding of their anchors.

A number of persons were on the pier when the Magnet, Captain Stock, the General Steam Navigation Company's steamer, came in, and great fears for her safety were entertained; but, although it had been buried by successive seas, she came bravely over the bar, and moored in security.

SHIPWRECKS.—To the many losses of valuable ships lately reported in our columns has now to be added the Middlesex, bound from Sydney for London. She was driven on shore near Maceio, to the southward of Pernambuco, and soon became almost a total wreck. The crew and passengers were saved, and are now on their passage to England in the abandoned boat the Columbus, which sailed from Pernambuco on the 6th ult.—About two o'clock on Thursday morning a seek the smack Diligence, of Portsmouth, of about 300 tons burthen, bound to Southampton from Guernsey, laden with potatoes, came on shore on Chisel Beach, near Portland, in a squall of wind from the S.S.W. One poor fellow, about twenty years of age, we could not learn his name, met with a watery grave just as the vessel struck. On Wednesday morning week, between three and four o'clock, the ship William, Captain Houston, white on her passage from Gloucester to Greenock, was totally wrecked at Kilchattan Bay, Isle of Bute, while in the act of weaning, during a heavy storm. When the vessel struck, her owner, Mr. T. Hamlin, a gentleman of extensive nautical experience, told the alarmed crew to keep calm and collected. The advice was attended to by the major part of the crew, but two of them, in spite of every remonstrance, lowered themselves overboard on what seemed from the ship to be ury rocks; but by this step they only met the fate they sought to shun, the boisterous surge into which they dropped having washed them back, and carried them under the ship's bottom, where no assistance could be rendered them by those on the wreck. The rest of the crew, after remaining on board with great difficulty till the morning broke, the sea during the night washing over them, and the ship rapidly going to pieces, were enabled to land on the receding of the tide. The severity of the gale may be judged by the fact that she was blown from Pladda to Ardrossan, a distance of twenty-one miles, under bare poles, in somewhat less than two hours.

PORT MADOC, Nov. 13.—The Harulla, Livingstone, from Demerara to Glasgow, struck on the bar of this port yesterday morning, and has become a total wreck

PORTSMOUTH, Nov. 14.—Arrived the Norham Castle, from Odessa, with loss of bulwarks, &c.

STRONNESS, Nov. 10.—The Romley, Lea, from Liverpool to Aberdeen, in making this harbour yesterday during a gale at W. struck on Brecknese, and went to pieces; master and three men drowned; mate and a boy, and part of cargo, saved

HULL, Nov. 12. The Unicorn, from London to this port, ashore at Saltfleet-haven, has been got off, after discharging part of her cargo, and arrived here. A bark was discovered in the morning, sunk off Spurlee, with her lower masts standing; crew supposed to have got on board another vessel

YARMOUTH, Nov. 14.—The schooner Elbe, of North Shields, foundered yesterday afternoon, having been in contact with the Robert Noonan, of Sunderland; crew saved; the Robert is coming into the harbour, with loss of bulwarks, &c.

The Duchess of Buccleuch, from Jamaica to Hannah, was totally lost on the Caistard Sands (Cuba), March 14; crew saved. The Po, from Philadelphia to Monte Video, has been condemned at Leer.

OFF DARTMOUTH, Nov. 14. Marsden, Potts, from Havannah for Rotterdam (arrived 18 days), with loss of bulwarks, short of provision, and one man overboard

LIMERICK, Nov. 14.—The Governor, Gorman, arrived here from Quebec, lost two men overboard in a heavy gale, 8th inst.

HULL, Nov. 18 The vessel, got off Saltfleet, 12th inst., is supposed to be the Northern Conference, Jude, from Shields to London.

Loss by the Foundering (East Indiaman). Extract of a letter received at Lloyd's from their agent at Boulogne, under date Nov. 13:—

"SIR, We beg to inform you that, by advices received this morning from [illegible], there are now about 200 cases of tea saved, but all more or less [illegible]. We are, Sir, your obedient servants, "A. ADAMS and Co.

"To WM. DOBSON, Esq., Secretary, Lloyd's."

[illegible] has at length reached New York. A great many of the passengers stuck to her through all her difficulties, and have, after having been for nearly a month knocked about, reached their destination.

The General Steam Navigation Company's steam-ship Rainbow, that left London on Sunday, arrived, notwithstanding the boisterous state of the weather, at Antwerp, at her usual time on Monday morning.

ANOTHER SHIPWRECK, AND LOSS OF SEVEN LIVES.—Information was on Wednesday morning received at Lloyd's, and by the owners, of the total loss of the Hamilton, a fine brig of 300 tons, Bradbury, master, on the Gunfleet Sands, near Harwich, on the morning of Tuesday, together with eleven of her crew. The Hamilton belonged to Mr. Mageary, of Love-lane, coal-merchant, and was on her voyage from Shields to London, laden with coal.

LITERATURE.

A POPULAR HISTORY OF BRITISH INDIA, COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE WITH CHINA, AND THE INSULAR POSSESSIONS OF ENGLAND IN THE EASTERN SEAS. By W. COOKE TAYLOR, LL.D. Madden and Co., 8, Leadenhall-street.

It is now nearly two centuries and a half since the first East India Company was incorporated by a royal charter of Queen Elizabeth. The terms of this charter gave the nomination of the first Governor (Thomas Smythe), and twenty-four Directors, to the Crown, but vested in the body of proprietors the power of electing a Deputy-Governor, as well as the Governor and other members for the future. Little did the merchant-adventurers of those days think, when they wished "God speed" to their stout little squadron of five keels, on its long and perilous voyage, that it was to be the parent of the greatest commercial navy the world ever saw, from which again should spring that military-naval power which raised their country from her solitary bed in the ocean, and realized in their posterity's regard the lines of the poet:—

Where'er the breezes blow, the billows foam;
Survey our empire, and behold our home!"

Little did Asia, little did Europe, then think that a few short years after this seemingly trifling expedition had arrived safely in the roads of Achen, and that the hardy handful of Englishmen had been allowed by the court of Delhi to occupy a few humble specks on the map of India, those specks were in the course of time to swell and increase till they formed that dark cloud which overshadowed the fairest portion of the East, and involved the overthrow of tribes and states and monarchies, and its horrors only passed away with the final establishment and acknowledgment of the British empire in India.

The progress of those early adventurers and their successors for many long years, the hardships they had to encounter, the opposition they had to combat, the intrigues they had to counteract, the hostility of the native powers, the jealousy of the French, the Dutch, and the Portuguese, the neglect, the imbecility, and the profligacy of their own Governments, during successive reigns at home, all these are matters of deep interest; and, to those who judge of them according to the ordinary probability of human power, it must be matter of astonishment how ordinary men, so few in number, could cope with and conquer, from time to time, such fearful, such almost overwhelming odds, moral as well as physical, as were arrayed against them.

An English squadron, under the command of Sir Henry Middleton, had chastised the Portuguese on more than one occasion, in the Indian seas, in return for various attacks on their merchant shipping by armed vessels of that nation. This pulling down of Portuguese pride, and putting an end to the prestige of their valour (for they had been deemed invincible in that quarter of the globe—was of course of great gratification to the Emperor of Delhi, who, in consequence, gave every encouragement in his power to his new allies; and, amongst other favours extended to them, received for the first time an English ambassador (Sir Thomas Roe) at his court. Factories were erected, and settlements were formed; with which successful progress of our fortunes the Dutch grew naturally jealous, thinking that an interference would, in all probability, follow with the monopoly of their spice trade. Negotiations were set on foot in Europe to accommodate the rival interests of the merchants of both countries, and appeals to both Governments were made to prevent a collision; but James I. of England is said to have "deliberately sacrificed the rights of his subjects and the best interests of the nations over which he unworthily ruled to the bribes that were offered to him by the merchants of Amsterdam." Independently, however, of their Government, the English Company, by their bravery and perseverance, brought about a treaty between their body and the Dutch East India Company.

Such, however (observes Dr. Taylor, in the history before us), was the cowardice of the Dutch in the mercenary stupidity of the English monarch, that the negotiations had been scarcely concluded when every article of the treaty was atrociously violated. At length, under the pretence that the English had stimulated the natives to insurrection, all the company's agents in Amboyna were arrested, and subjected to the most horrible tortures in order to force them to confession. They were then put to death in the most barbarous manner, and their destruction was followed by a series of the regorging and thanksgivings.

All that James did in revenge of this massacre was to curse the Dutch. Charles the First was too deeply and too unhappily involved with his subjects at home to attend to the national honour abroad. It remained for the stout-hearted Oliver Cromwell to demand and obtain satisfaction, as well as to restore our trade with India, which was at a very low ebb from James the First's time to the end of the great civil war. By the treaty extorted from it by the Protector the humiliated nation of Holland had to pay, amongst other sums, £83,000 to the English East India Company, besides remunerating the families of its victims at Amboyna. In Charles the Second's time the aspect of our Indian affairs improved for a while, and were again in the descendant. The Company had ceded to them the island of Bombay, which formed a portion of the dowry of the Queen of Charles obtained with the Princess of Portugal. "The merry monarch," however, laid an embargo, and finally prevented an expedition of the Company from sailing to retake Bantam from the Dutch, in consequence of a large bribe which he was offered, and which, no doubt, he received, from the latter, for money he wanted and money he must have had to gratify his minions and his mistresses. "James the second," says our history, "the last of the Stuarts, was the best of them so far as trade and commerce were concerned;" an observation which can scarcely be contradicted; and yet, with all his good intention to serve the Company, the local administration of Sir John Child brought their affairs almost to the verge of ruin.

In consequence of this state of things, in the last, an attempt was made at home to open the trade with India and China, or to form a new company on a more extensive basis. The following passages in the history mayn[illegible] reference to this project show that monopolists in all ages have stood by [illegible], whilst many of those who figure in history as flaming patriots have much less title to be considered friends of the people than those who have done a small amount of good, but still something towards the public cause, and have gone to their graves "unwept, unhonoured, and unsung":

"The matter was brought before the convention parliament, which was assembled on the abdication of James II., and formed one of the many hopeful projects which the authors of the revolution sacrificed to base and mercenary motives. The directors of the company found the patriots and statesmen of the day ready to break their pledges to the nation for a share in the wages of iniquity; perhaps, indeed, there never was a parliament in which party was more loudly professed, [illegible] more openly practised, than in that which conferred the crown upon William III. Bribes inflamed the danger by which the company was threatened for three years, but at length the increasing discontent of the commercial and mercantile interests compelled the House of [illegible] address was presented to the king, praying that the company might be dissolved and its charter revoked. William referred the matter to his privy council, the directors lavishly distributed bribes among its members, and an order for renewing and extending the charter was obtained. The House of Commons then under discussion a bill for imposing taxes on several joint stocks, they inserted a clause, that any company not paying the tax within a specified time should forfeit its charter. The East India directors were so much alarmed as to neglect the first quarterly payment, whereby their charter became void, and new arguments for dissolving the company were furnished to their adversaries. The matter was again referred to the privy council; on the one side were the petitions from the merchants of London and the manufacturers of the west of England; on the other were the ready bribes of the directors, and the latter of course prevailed. Great were the astonishment and indignation of the public; the task of inquiry was forced upon the House of Commons, and it appeared from the books of the company that the sum expended for secret services in one year had amounted to about one hundred thousand pounds, which was confessed to have been spent in "gratifications." It is mortifying to add that the parliamentary investigations stopped at this point; a further prosecution of it would have involved many persons of the highest rank and influence, including the most flaming patriots of the day. The necessities of the government rendered it necessary to raise a loan of two millions; a new association of merchants offered to procure that sum, and in consequence they obtained a charter by which they were incorporated as a New East India Company. The two companies spent a few years in mutual attempts to damage each other, but they soon found that their common interests were thus injured, and they at length formed a coalition. Little attention was now paid to East India affairs; the nation was involved in an ardu[illegible]s war with France, to restrain the unprincipled ambition of Louis XIV., and the readiness with which the united company negotiated loans recommended them so strongly to the ministry and the parliament, that very large additions were made to their privileges.

In 1683 a charter was granted to the Company for the establishment of a Mayor's Court in each of the three presidencies of India, Madras, Bombay, and Calcutta, with a full civil jurisdiction. Criminal cases, except [illegible] treason, were to be tried at the Quarter Sessions, with the President and Council for a Court of Appeal. In 1753 this charter was enlarged, and the English judicial authority was ultimately recognised.

In 1720 our East India Company began to look with jealousy on the flourishing colony of the French at Pondicherry, and the important advances which that nation was making in its trade with the East Indies. Shortly after the war broke out between the two countries in 1743 we suffered a reverse in the Indian seas, [illegible] to the disgraceful conduct of one of our petty naval commanders, who sheered off after a shabby engagement with the French Admiral Labourdonnais, who afterwards took Madras. This occurred in 1746. In 1751 we hear of Clive, who was then but a captain, taking Arcot at the head of two hundred Europeans and three hundred Sepoys, with which small force, and but three field-pieces, he attacked this strong place amid a fearful storm. "Thunder, lightning, and rain more terrific than is usual, even in India, seemed to render further advance impracticable, but Clive, aware of the impression that such hardihood would produce on Oriental minds, pushed forward in spite of the elemental strife."

The more important and eventful war between the French and English in India which broke out in 1756 (the year of the Calcutta Black Hole) displayed the genius, the bravery, and the vices of Clive. It also brought on the tapis a most distinguished and gallant officer on the side of the French, of whom the history makes brief but handsome mention:—

The Count de Lally was appointed to the chief command; he was descended from one of the Irish families, which had been compelled to emigrate at the revolution in consequence of their having adhered to the cause of the Stuarts, and he was therefore animated by a bitter hatred of British ascendancy, which had crushed both his country and his creed. At the battle of Fontenoy he took several English officers prisoners with his own hand, and was raised to the rank of colonel by King Louis himself on the field of battle. He was accompanied to India by its own Irish regiments, composed of the best troops in the service of France, by fifty of the royal artillery, and by several officers of great distinction.

The fatal termination of the East Indian campaign of the French, under Count de Lally, is well known. They lost Pondicherry in January, 1761; and the conclusion of the chapter which describes the total annihilation of the French empire in India, the melancholy fate of the brave but unfortunate Lally is also given:—

On his arrival in Europe he was seized and thrown into the Bastille, from whence, as a place too honourable for him, he was removed to the common prison. He was granted the mockery of a trial before the parliament of Paris, convicted, and sentenced to an ignominious death. With indecent precipitation he was executed that very day. He was dragged through the streets of Paris in a common dung cart, and, to prevent him from addressing the people, a gag was forced into his mouth, so large that it projected beyond his lips. At a later period, full justice was done to the memory of this calumniated victim; his persecutors denied little advantage from the crime—the French East India Company did not long survive this last display of imbecility and injustice.

In taking a review of our Indian affairs, which occupied a much larger space in subsequent and more stirring times, how much have we to dwell upon in the further career of Clive and the civil government of Warren Hastings. Then the war with Hyder Ali, and the long series of bloody conflicts with his son, Tippoo Saib, including the brilliant administration of the Marquis Wellesley and the early campaigns of his illustrious brother, how full of interest is this portion of our Indian history! How much matter does it afford for reflection, and not the least of our reflections those suggested by the fortunes of the two brothers thus mentioned? It is not detracting from the acknowledged merits of the first warrior of the age to say that he owed not a little of his success in India, as well as in Spain, to the plans and efficient support of his elder brother; and, whether it be the fault of the latter, one of the most accomplished and successful diplomatists of modern times, that he, too, did not enjoy, in the decline of his days, the golden rewards of his labours as well as having reached the pinnacle of fame, the East India Company, into whose coffers he put millions upon millions of money, can best tell.

The Marquis Cornwallis commenced his government something after the un-English style which Lord Ellenborough seems to have at first adopted the other day. Very fortunately, however, for the honour of the British name, the British general, Lord Lake, acted in the same spirited manner against the Mahrattas as General Pollock has recently exhibited in a similar difficulty against the Affghans.

Next came the short governments of Sir George Barlow and Lord Minto, followed by the eventful ten years' administration of the Marquis of Hastings, which terminated with the annihilation of the Mahratta power in India, and a great enlargement of the Company's territories. During the marquis's administration the history truly states that

> The supreme authority of the company had been established over the entire peninsula of India; but the British dominions were thus placed nearly in close contact with the frontiers of the Affghans, the Sikhs, the Chinese, and the Burmese nations, requiring great tact and delicacy of management, and much might expect, in case of a war, to be favoured by the insurrections of the discontented throughout the interior of India. On this account, and also because the empire possessed by the company had already acquired an inconvenient size, the Marquis of Hastings earnestly deprecated any war beyond the frontiers of India, which was not absolutely necessary to the maintenance of British supremacy within the peninsula itself.

This brings us down to 1823, when the Marquis of Hastings returned to England, and was succeeded by Earl Amherst, during whose administration was carried on the celebrated and sanguinary war with the Burmese, which ended with the storming of Bhurtpore by the British forces under Lord Combermere. This chapter equals, if not excels, in interest and variety the campaign in Mysore against Tippoo Sultan. It is by far the best written one also in Dr. Taylor's book.

We have gone into the history of our Indian empire so far and thus fully, as our attention at this quarter of the globe are rife with the deepest interest since the breaking out of our wars with China and Affghan.

AN EASY INTRODUCTION TO CHEMISTRY. By GEORGE SPARKES. Whittaker and Co.

The author of this neat little manual is evidently fitted for the duties he has undertaken, namely, to teach the very first principles of chemical science. Instead of adopting the synthetical mode of teaching mathematics, and thus wearying the pupil by dry details, apparently without application, he has proceeded upon the plan recommended by Whateley, and has commenced with the examination of common and familiar substances, and then gradually proceeds to the development of the more recondite elements. This plan is not merely useful but philosophic, for the student thus follows the same course which the science did in its infancy, and by which alone in the present day all new truths must be discovered. The author modestly admits he has no claims to originality, but what he has done he has done well, and we regret he did not carry out his views a little further. In the present day chemistry is perhaps the most popular of the sciences, all classes are alive to the necessity of its cultivation, and we regard with rigid scrutiny all books intended as guides to the student.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THAT IS THE ROAD SHE WENT.*

BY J. A. WADE, ESQ.

That is the road she went!
For ever for ever from me!
I gaz'd on her less'ning form
Till tears would not let me see!
A white speck linger'd still
A moment—the pathway wound—
My heart felt an icy chill:
Would it were death it found!

That is the road she went!
Methought that her step was slow—
Alas! that where first she came
Should be whence she last did go!
'Twas there, 'neath a hawthorn-tree,
With words more sweet than its bloom,
She whispered her heart to me—
That heart must be now a tomb!

That is the road she went!
She lov'd me—aye! well did she;
And loves me yet, though the crime
Must bid in her bondage be!
Oh! if from the heart's young grave
Affection may back return,
How purely our loves may yet
In hers and this bosom burn!

* That is the road she went! is the name of a singularly wild and beautiful Irish melody, not, it is to be regretted, sufficiently vocal to be united with the sentiments which its associations have here awakened.

MUSIC. ORIGINAL PAPERS.

PURCELL.

Decus et honos Angliæ.

It is the fortune of most geniuses who devancent leur siècle, to be little or not at all appreciated in their own time. Prejudice, envy, and a certain unwillingness to confess the inferiority of methods, styles, tastes, and manners of knowledge, which have already cost us pains to acquire all, somehow or other, militate against the most obvious pretensions or improvements of an original, who, in nine cases out of ten, obtains during his life no higher praise than that equivocal applause, eccentricity! (as most particularly in the early inroads of Beethoven) and must content himself with the consciousness of bequeathing an immortal name to posterity, in the place of enjoying the love and admiration of his contemporaries. That Henry Purcell was not greatly admired in his day is not meant to be asserted here; for he was high in favour both at court and with the public. But at the same time many inferior composers enjoyed similar patronage, in consequence of their being skilful musicians; still, for the just appreciation of the poetry of Purcell's music, we must look to posthumous praise, a kind of late generosity, a sort of tardy justice, which even malice renders to the illustrious dead when they are as insensible to applause or censure as they were once indifferent. Dr. Burney observes that, "if a parallel were to be drawn between Purcell and any popular composer of a different country, reasons might be assigned for supposing him superior to any other great and favourite contemporary musician in Europe." However, although in his own country he was not in his own lifetime at the pinnacle of all English musicians, a traditionary anecdote (with which the writer of this article was made acquainted in Italy) will sufficiently show that his fame had spread to the Continent, and procured him the most extravagant admiration on the part of one whose opinion was "worth a whole theatre of others!" Corelli, having seen some of Purcell's trios in the possession of an English nobleman then travelling through Italy, was so struck by them, that he conceived the romantic idea of visiting their author in his native land (a journey by no means so facile or pleasant en route in those days), where he unfortunately arrived three days after the death of our Orpheus. Single-hearted and single-minded in the object of his journey, Corelli exclaimed, "Henry Purcell dead! then I have no further business in this land;" and, turning on his heel, departed for his home.

Many compositions have been ascribed after his death to Purcell (for instance, "Mad Tom," of which celebrated scena the chief and best portions were in existence before he was born); while, on the other hand, it is to be feared that he has been defrauded of many others which bear internal evidence of his masterly hand. Notwithstanding all that has been said in favour of Locke's pretensions to the music in Macbeth, the suspicion that Purcell had more than a little to do with it is still strong and supportable. But this is not a place for a controversy of the kind. Henry Purcell was born in 1658, and died in 1695; consequently was about thirty-seven years of age, a term of existence which has, to a curious extent, awaited many a glorious genius. Purcell excels all other musicians (not even excepting his mighty follower, Handel) in the rigid application of his music to the sense of the words; for which reason we regret to see his Te Deum laid aside for even the grand Dettingen. In the passage, "Holy, holy," &c., nothing can surpass the devotional grandeur and simplicity of his treatment of the sublime words. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, where a monument was raised to his memory.

The following humorous rebus, in Latin rhymes, was written in praise of Purcell by a person named Tomlinson, and an English version of it set to music in the old popular catch style, by a composer of the name of Lenton. We subjoin the original and translation:—

> Galli marita, par tritico segges,
> Pronomen est ejus, dat chirunatis leges;
> Intrat cognomen pandit is cati,
> Est eremi in cubibus stati:
> [illegible]
> Quid merent poetæ? id cer[illegible]

> A mate to a cock, and corn tall as wheat,
> Is his christian name, who in music's complete;
> His surname begins with the grace of a cat,
> And concludes with the house of a hermit; note that.
> His skill and performance each auditor wins,
> But the poet deserves a good kick on the shins!

This last line is severe, and evidently points at some individual poet; and in candour we must say that, if by this passage an allusion be made to "glorious John," it is perfectly just; for King Arthur, with its chivalrous and romantic subject, has been scurvily treated by Dryden. [In our next number we shall give a splendid scene from this drama.]

"THE GRACES" OF RAFFAELLE.—A lithographic drawing of great delicacy and high finish, executed by L. Sebbers, after this exquisite gem of Raffaelle, in which he followed pretty closely an antique original, has just been published by Moore, of West-street, St. Martin's-lane, and has fair claims to be held as a rival to the plate in line of the same subject, already known to the circles of art.

ENTRANCE TO THE VILLAGE OF WALMER.

neighbourhoods of Deal and Walmer, in honour of her Majesty's arrival, were certainly most brilliant, and proved, as far as "lighting up" could prove, the extreme loyalty of the inhabitants. Numerous rockets were let foff during the evening from the three revenue cutters in the roads. Several rockets were likewise discharged by the Fellowship of Pilots from the Pilot-house in Beech-street, Deal.

On Friday se'nnight, at sunrise, the royal standard was hoisted on the tower of Walmer Castle, announcing the presence of the Sovereign. At nine the Thunderer line-of-battle ship, under command of Captain Pring, manned the yards, and saluted her Majesty with a discharge of one-and-twenty guns. The Queen and Prince Albert rose at their usual early hour, and breakfasted at half-past eight. At half-past nine her Majesty and the Prince, unattended, walked on the Wellington Beach upwards of half an hour, notwithstanding there was a stiff gale blowing S.S.W. Several heavy showers came on in the afternoon, which prevented her Majesty and Prince Albert from taking a carriage airing. The Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal, who were in excellent health, did not leave the castle during the day, in consequence of the unfavourable state of the weather.

The addresses of the Mayor and other authorities of Deal to her Majesty and the Prince were forwarded, by direction of the Lord in Waiting, to the Secretary of State.

During the day a number of the nobility and gentry residing in the neighbourhood left their names at the castle. The royal dinner party in the evening was very select, it being her Majesty's wish to be as retired as possible during her stay at Walmer.

The annual Harbour Sessions were held at Dover on Friday week, at which the Duke of Wellington presided.

On Saturday morning, soon after ten o'clock, the Queen and the Prince left the castle for the beach, and walked along the shore for upwards of an hour unattended. The wind was "blowing great guns" at the time. Her Majesty appeared in the highest spirits, and delighted with the animated scene, there being between 100 and 200 sail of vessels in the Downs, driven in for shelter during the previous night's gale.

The royal pair walked towards Deal, and, although their previous trip on Friday week was reported to have set the inhabitants on the qui vive, their privacy was uninterrupted by any individual. A storm of rain again coming on obliged the Queen and Prince to make a hasty retreat to the castle, but before the entrance was gained the sun shone out, and the walk was extended towards Dover cliffs. The wind was very high, and a little inconvenient to the Queen, but both her Majesty and the Prince seemed to enjoy the breeze very much; and, after viewing with much apparent interest the waves dashing on the beach, they returned to the castle a little before twelve o'clock. During the walk a poor man who has in his possession a very curious dog, saved a few weeks ago by the Deal boatmen from the wreck of a Russian timber-ship, was accosted by the Queen, who desired to know what kind of animal it was? The poor fellow related its history, and appeared well gratified by the result. Her Majesty's known partiality for canine pets will elucidate this fact, which might otherwise appear somewhat singular.

Shortly after midday the clouds cleared off, and the sun shone out brightly.

Her Majesty's carriage and four, with outriders, was ordered to be in waiting at the castle at a quarter past three o'clock, but a slight shower prevented the Queen's departure for nearly half an hour, when her Majesty entered the open carriage attended by Lady Portman, amidst the cheering of many of the inhabitants of Walmer and Deal, who had congregated in the immediate locality of the drawbridge, where they obtained an excellent view of their Sovereign.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert accompanied the Queen on horseback, with the usual attendants.

Her Majesty drove down the Walmer-road into Deal, proceeding through Prospect-place and Lower-street (which is the principal street in the town), up St. George's-place, through West-street, to Upper Deal, upon the Sandwich-road; and returning to the castle by the water-works, along the Walmer-road. Her Majesty and Prince Albert returned to the beach in the evening about four o'clock, and walked a considerable distance along the strand, but the wind was so high that it was with the greatest difficulty she could stand against it.

THE "THUNDERER" FIRING A SALUTE ON THE NIGHT OF HER MAJESTY'S ARRIVAL.

LANDING OF THE MAILS.

Her Majesty could not possibly have selected a more favourable season for witnessing the varied and magnificent effect of the ocean when lashed into fury by the storm. The violence of the wind prevented either of the French mail-packets from entering Dover harbour, and shortly before nine o'clock they were seen, in company with a French passage-boat, beating their way down the Channel towards Deal, where, after laying-to for some time, the bags were landed by the boatmen of that port. Her Majesty, who was at breakfast when the mails passed, sent out to Captain Lane, the superintending governor of the castle, to learn their name and destination. The packet which should have reached Dover on Friday night week was also compelled to put into Ramsgate harbour.

Prince Albert, after returning from the beach, walked to Walmer in company with Colonel Murray; and her Majesty, in company with Viscount Sidney and Lady Portman, spent some time in the galleries of the castle. The Hon. George Anson arrived at Walmer on Friday night, in company with the Hon. Miss Devereux, from Herne Bay, to which place they had proceeded by steamer.

The royal dinner party in the evening consisted only of those who dined with her Majesty and the Prince on Thursday week. During the gale a French fishing-boat of considerable burden was brought-to at a very short distance from the shore, opposite Walmer Castle. Its extraordinary appearance attracted the attention of her Majesty, and the character of the vessel was explained to her. There is a law against French fishing-boats coming within three miles of our coast, while our Gallic neighbours have forbidden English fishermen to appear within three leagues. The infraction of such an enactment under the eye and observation of the Sovereign would have been the acme of impudence; but it is due to the captain of the boat to say that no such illegality was attempted.

The Thunderer was still lying off, but the wind obliged Captain Pring to keep her "taut," and the top-gallant-masts, which were lowered on Friday week, had not been again raised.

It was strongly feared that seven of the Deal boatmen were drowned by the upsetting of their boat a few miles from the shore. They were signalled in the morning to go on board a steamer, weather-bound in the roads, and it is feared that the rolling of the steamer capsized their craft. Some of their oars have been washed ashore, and a boat was seen floating in the Downs, bottom upwards, by a Deal boatman, who made the land about three o'clock in the afternoon.

On Sunday the extremely rough and boisterous state of the weather prevented her Majesty and the royal infants leaving the castle. Her Majesty was enabled only once or twice in the morning to walk upon the ramparts, and then for only a few minutes between the storms.

At 12 o'clock her Majesty and Prince Albert, with the whole of the royal suite, attended divine worship in the large drawing-room, which had been appropriately fitted up as a private chapel, with reading-desk, &c. The service was performed by the Rev. Mr. Wilberforce, the rector of Walmer, who preached an excellent sermon from the 27th and 28th verses of the 24th chapter of the Gospel according to St. Matthew, "For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west, so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be. For wheresoever the carcase is there will the eagles be gathered together."

In the afternoon, between three and four o'clock, and during the pelting down of the rain in torrents, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by the Hon. C. A. Murray (and afterwards by Mr. G. E. Anson, who subsequently joined his Royal Highness), left the castle for the beach, where the Prince remained for nearly half an hour.

In addition to the royal dinner party of Friday week Lady Caroline Cocks, the Hon. Frances Devereux, and Mr. G. E. and the Hon. Mrs. Anson had the honour of joining the dinner party, which was precisely the same as on the previous day. Numerous visitors called at the castle and left their names.

On Sunday night, about eight o'clock, the wind shifted into the west-north-west, and in the course of the night the sea became calm. On Monday morning her Majesty enjoyed the magnificent sight of upwards of an hundred sail in the Downs lying at anchor.

Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert walked on the beach for a considerable time, and the royal children were taken out by their nurses and attendants.

PRINCE ALBERT GOING ON BOARD THE "THUNDERER."

At twelve o'clock his Royal Highness Prince Albert went on board the Thunderer, being steered by Captain Westbrook, in his galley. His Royal Highness was attended by Colonel Wylde and Dr. Pretorius, and remained on board nearly an hour, inspecting the beautiful arrangements of the vessel, with which his Royal Highness expressed himself highly delighted. His Royal Highness's visit was unexpected, and Captain Pring and Captain Bullock, who were ashore, immediately put off to meet the Prince.

His Royal Highness, on landing, was saluted by Sir William Curtis's yacht, which was anchored off the castle. The Government steamer Fearless, Captain Bullock, which is also stationed in a line with the Thunderer, dressed her colours.

At half-past one o'clock her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by the Hon. Mrs. Anson, left the castle in a carriage and four, and proceeded to Dover Castle. Lord C. Wellesley and Colonel Wylde, the Equerries, were in attendance on horseback. The Queen and the Prince were received at the castle by Colonel Jenkinson, Governor, and a guard of honour, composed of the 19th Foot. The royal party, after remaining at the castle upwards of three-quarters of an hour, inspecting every object of interest, proceeded to Dover, driving through the principal streets to the beach, and returning to Walmer at a quarter past four o'clock. Although no intimation had been given of the Royal visit beyond an express sent to the Governor by Lord Sydney about an hour previous, the inhabitants were on the alert, anxiously expecting that honour would be paid them the first fine day, and they were not disappointed. Both sides of the road from the castle to the town were lined with people, and the streets through which the royal cortege passed were densely crowded. On going and returning her Majesty was greeted with a right loyal and hearty welcome.

During the whole of the afternoon, and until seven o'clock in the evening, the greatest anxiety was manifested by the inhabitants of Deal and Walmer respecting the fate of the crew of the galley which was observed from the coast suddenly to disappear, just as she had rescued the Lisbon steamer, at the time of the heavy gale the previous afternoon. The circumstance being made known at Walmer Castle, her Majesty was most anxious in her inquiries.

About seven o'clock the welcome news arrived that every man had been picked up through the activity and praiseworthy conduct of those on board the steamer. The news was instantly conveyed to Walmer Castle, and the providential result relieved her Majesty from the greatest anxiety. On Monday, after her Majesty's return from Dover, she entertained Lord and Lady Mahon to dinner.

On Monday a number of the neighbouring gentry, together with mayors of the surrounding towns, called at the castle. Sir Edward Knatchbull, Mr. Edward Rice, of Dane Court, Admiral Brown, and Capt. Harvey were among the number. Sir Edward was invited to lunch with the Lord in Waiting.

On Tuesday morning there was a recurrence of Sunday's weather, to wit, a pelting rain and a tempestuous gale of south-east wind. It cleared away a little by nine o'clock, and about half-past nine her Majesty and the Prince promenaded in front of the castle for an hour.

Her Majesty continues to enjoy her marine resort exceedingly, despite of the weather; and as for Prince Albert, he is quite delighted with it. Blow high, blow low, wet or dry, the Prince may be seen on the beach or elsewhere.

The Queen sent to Deal to ascertain the circumstances of the poor fellows (the Deal boatmen) who lost their boat on Sunday last, in attempting to reach a steamer passing that place, and who narrowly escaped with their lives. Her Majesty, with her wonted benevolence and liberality, gave £20 towards the purchase of a new boat.

On Wednesday morning, at eight o'clock, the Hyacinth, 18-gun sloop, from the West Indies, while proceeding to the river, came into the Downs, and dropped anchor abreast of Walmer Castle. On the instant the sails were furled, and the yards manned as if by magic. She then fired a royal salute in honour of the Queen, up anchor, set sail in a trice, and proceeded under the pressure of a stiffish breeze, and at a rapid rate, towards the Thames. Her Majesty and Prince Albert were at the window of the breakfast-room at the time.

At half-past nine her Majesty and Prince Albert left the castle on foot, and unattended by any members of the royal establishment, except three Scotch terriers and one of the Prince's hounds.

The royal pair went towards Kingsdown, about half-way to which they stopped at the cottage of Thomas Edrige, the old fisherman, and talked with his daughter Rachel. The Queen inquired of that young woman if she knew what vessel had just anchored in the Downs and fired a salute. Rachel Edrige replied that she had been told it was a French frigate. At this her Majesty smiled.

The Prince and the Queen then proceeded onward, climbed the hill immediately under the village of Kingsdown, passed round the ancient landmark on the top of the cliff, descended again to the beach, and returned to the castle, having been absent nearly an hour. The road traversed by the Queen and the Prince was about two miles, and an exceedingly rough one in some parts. Her Majesty, however, is an excellent and rapid walker, and does not mind passing through a ploughed field when it comes in the way.

On reaching the castle her Majesty presented the very picture of blooming health, her colour being wonderfully heightened by the exercise and the healthful breeze of easterly wind that blew right in her face as she approached the castle.

Her Majesty and the Prince took an airing (on foot, and by the same route) at half-past three in the afternoon. On this occasion they were absent from the castle about a similar length of time to what they were in the morning.

Covers were laid at the castle for twelve, being three over the usual number of the royal dinner party.

DOVER, Nov. 15.—Last night, in celebration of the royal visit to Dover, a number of the inhabitants illuminated their houses. Transparencies of the most loyal description were displayed by some of the citizens. On the premises of Mr. Bennett, at the corner of Benchstreet, were displayed the royal initials, with a star in the centre, in brilliant gas jets; which had a fine effect, and various other of the inhabitants exhibited their loyalty in a way very creditable to them.

SCENE FROM THE DRAMA OF "IN OLD WOMAN."

We have here a scene from the popular Haymarket trifle entitled My Old Woman, and a little below it we give a portrait of Mrs. Fitzwilliam representing the character of Countess Xenia upon a larger and broader scale. This delightful actress is most welcome to us after her transatlantic trip. Following in the wake of authors, actors, and diplomatists, Mrs. Fitzwilliam braved the terrors of the Atlantic, and paid a visit to Brother Jonathan. Scorched and quizzed in the Broadway, steamed on the Hudson, guessed at in boarding-houses, and encored in theatres, she yet returns safe to the Haymarket with a store of notions and some inklings of character in no way calculated to lessen her ability for personation, or abate our amount of Thespian fun and wholesome laughter. Upon her first appearance she received a hearty English welcome in the burletta of My Little Adopted, whilst the succeeding monopolylogue (an ugly word that for a play-bill) afforded an opportunity for some sketches of the broadly humorous, which drew an abundant response of applause.

In this she personates half a dozen of the motley occupants of a Yankee hotel. First, a young English lady, who, bitten by a theatric furor, aspires to the post of prima donna and première danseuse, trusts to fortune and an Italian vocalist, and wends her way to America. Next, she plays an elderly north-country lady, who strives to rival Mrs. Trollope in travel-writing. Then, again, she is an Irish maid of all work, singing snatches of songs Hey! Presto, change! and we find her a fat French figurante, emulous of Taglioni, but inclining rather to Daniel Lambert. Next, an Italian candidate for operatic honours. And, lastly—strangest of all—a Yankee in love! Through all these she wound a rapid and amusing progress—the changes quick and perfect, and the fun complete. Her style, as displayed in the Irish and Italian personages, had all the gay freshness which gained for it long since a most pleasing reputation. Her acting still retains the same fascinating and wonderful versatility, never more abundantly exemplified than in the monopolylogue we have described, in the new duodrama, by Buckstone, produced on Monday with so much success, and we may add in the rôle of Countess Xenia, in which she is here introduced to the reader, and in whose person she makes her curtsey to all and sundry the patrons of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

MRS. FITZWILLIAM AS THE COUNTESS XENIA.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

At length, on Wednesday last, the long-promised King Arthur made its appearance at this house with a splendour that throws into utter darkness all former scenic representations. To use the words of a contemporary, "If the splendid last scenes of all the gorgeous spectacles were brought together in one piece, that piece would be decorated like King Arthur!" This is perfectly true; and we would say (reversing the words of one of the songs in the piece "Oh, sight! the mother of desires!") that the eye never was before fed to such satiety by as in this magnificent operatic drama. To enumerate—to follow the quick succession of the magic scenes (each "more exquisite still" than the last),—to describe the costumes—the scenery—the artistical and effective picturesque groupings throughout—to tell in words the delight experienced by the coup d'œil of the ensemble, were at once vain to those who have not, and useless to those who have, witnessed the grandest spectacle that was ever put upon any stage.

With the exception of Comus, English music has never been "married to immortal verse" of such a poet as the author of King Arthur, and yet we have (in it) but an unsettled, unsatisfactory performance of Dryden's conception of the subject. His best design was to write an epic poem, a design which it is to be regretted he ever abandoned, and subsequently he unwisely produced a forerunner of his greater intention, under the title of Albion and Albanius, the music to which was composed by an obscure musician of the name of Grabut. Whether it proved successful or not, its scenic life was soon brought to a close by the breaking forth of the Duke of Monmouth's rebellion.

In 1691 he produced King Arthur, in conjunction with Purcell, of whose superior genius he was at length so much convinced that he employed him also to write the music to his (per?) version of The Tempest.

In his preface to King Arthur our "great translator" says:—"There is nothing better than what I intended but the music, which has since arrived to a greater perfection in England than ever formerly, especially passing through the artful hands of Mr. Purcell, who has composed it with so great a genius that he has nothing to fear but an ignorant, ill-judging audience." We agree with Sir W. Scott that this passage (particularly the lines we have italicised) is but a tardy amende for the applauses he had previously bestowed upon the insignificant Grabut. In 1770 Garrick revived the piece at Drury Lane, and in 1784 Kemble brought it forth again at the same house, but no great success attended either revivals. In 1819 it was produced at Covent Garden, and in 1827 at the English Opera House. but still poor Arthur was a pilgrim for the fame which has at last been gloriously shed around him by the splendid resuscitations at Old Drury, where there was no "ignorant, ill-judging audience," but one ready with national energy to vindicate the claims of their fatherland to the sweetest of all arts.

"Le genie du musicien soumet l'univers entier à son Art," says Rousseau, and never was there a greater musical enchanter than Henry Purcell. There are magnificent thoughts realized by the simplest means of vocal and orchestral combinations in this opera, and (although perhaps unnecessary) it was not without some emotion of displeasure that we heard the music of any other composer, however great, interpolated amongst the massive harmonies and graceful melodies of the undoubted first master of his age, and who now is acknowledged to be, not for his age, but for ours and all future time. The libretto of King Arthur is very unevenly written, but there are some sweetly poetical passages throughout. The following has a pretty simplicity in it:—

Arthur.—Oh! artless love, where the soul moves the tongue,
And only nature speaks what nature thinks!
Had she but eyes!
Emmeline.—Just now you said I had:
I see them—I have two.
Arthur.—But neither see.
Emmeline.—I'm sure they hear you then.
What can your eyes do more
Arthur —They see your beauties.
I view the lovely blushes of your face,
Your lips' carnation, your dark-shaded eyebrows—
Black eyes and snow-white forehead; all the colours
That make your beauty and pardon my love'
Emmeline —Nay, then, you do not love on equal terms;—
I love you dearly without all these helps;

Read this, ye translating compilers of modern operas, and be ashamed.

Mr. Anderson was admirable as Arthur; he played and sang with great skill and taste; and Mrs. Nisbett was charming as Emmeline, although it was difficult to suppose for a moment that such eyes could not see. The scene with which she concluded her "own sweet face" in the mirror, on being restored to sight, was warmly applauded by the audience. Miss Romer, as Cupid, sang delightfully, particularly her solos in the 'Frost Scene,' her duet with Miss Webster, 'Two daughters of this aged stream,' and the song of 'Fairest Isle,' which, as Venus in the pageant, she terminates the piece. Miss P. Horton, as Philidel, sang with her usual tact and knowledge of pretty effects; and Mr. Phillips, as the enchanter Osmond, particularly in 'Ye twice ten thousand deities,' was magnificent. The choruses were superb. We never recollect to have heard 'Britons strike home,' or indeed any other composition, produce such an electrical effect upon an audience. The word "strike," with its condensation of vocal power, reminded us of Handel's "fixed" in the celebrated chorus of "Fixed in his everlasting seat," but has the merit of being anterior to the German's treatment of a similar idea.

Mr. Macready was most vociferously called for at the fall of the curtain, and, after some delay, finally appeared to receive the loudest demonstrations of applause from an audience almost frenzied by enthusiasm. If King Arthur does not long and successful run, then adieu to every thing classical and beautiful.

THE HAYMARKET.

On Monday evening a most numerous and fashionable audience attended this house, the principal attraction being Madame Vestris in the part of Lo!i Ten!—a character more entirely suited to reception bestowed on a public favourite. It was evident that the recent misunderstanding between that lady and a certain noble lord gave an additional impetus to the applause which her fascinating performances always command; and it may not be unpleasing, too much, that the part itself, by no means her best, was selected for certain assertions of female independence, all of which were given with "due emphasis" by the lady, and applauded to the echo by her stanch admirers. With some trifling exceptions, the cast of the other characters was as usual at this house, and the whole comedy went off with the greatest eclat. To The School for Scandal succeeded a new duo-drama (as the author, Mr. Buckstone, pleases to style it), entitled, Snapping Turtles; or Matrimonial Masquerading. It is an improbable extravaganza, drawing upon the credulity of the spectator, but abounding with the usual farcical fun of the writer. It kept the audience in laughter.

OLYMPIC.

A new piece from the fertile pen of Mr. Leman Rede has been produced at this house of merriment with the most complete success. Indeed, when did any production of this prolific writer fail? And why not? The cause is evident. He is one of our few national dramatists who are content with the sphere of contemplation which the various scenes, vicissitudes, and varieties of life in their native simplicity present for consideration, and who know that even to glean in the field where the arch-reaper Shakspeare had been is far better task than to bind the scanty produce of their neighbours, and pass it off as the harvest of their own industry or ability. The consequence is, we see man as a citoyen du monde portrayed in his dramatic pictures—we see drawings of human nature unaided by factitious peculiarities of costume or clime—they are naked cartoons (if we may be allowed the expression) of society in its various phases of deformity or beauty, all converging to an interesting moral eye or centre. Englishmen at once detect the originals in Mr. Rede's portraits; and, if by chance his shrewd discernment have laid hold of a character which may have escaped the careless attention of the multitude, they are forced to exclaim "how graphic and like!" as we often feel inclined to say on gazing at a picture of a Gainsborough or a Reynolds, riveted by an internal evidence of its truth, although unacquainted with its prototype! This is the secret of real dramatism; and no one of his contemporaries possesses it in a more independent spirit than Mr. Leman Rede. His new production is entitled Life's a Lottery, or Jolly Dick the Lamplighter, a homely baptism, truly, in the opinion (?) of those whose ears have not yet ceased to vibrate to the awful nomenclature of the Minerva Press title-pages; and who, like old Astley, notwithstanding the Prophet of Avon, had "fixed his canon" against it, and stuck to the importance of "a name!" The piece was admirably played throughout, and was aided by some very artistical scenery. The whole reflects the highest credit on the spirited lessee, and will, no doubt, win him "golden opinions" from all parties. It was announced for repetition amidst vociferous applause.

THE SURREY.

On Monday a new piece, called The Black Law of Martinique; or Zamba, the Fugitive, was produced at this house, and it is most triumphantly successful. It is a translation from the French of the inexhaustible Scribe, and abounds with the melo-dramatic interest with which he knows so well how to invest all his productions. It has been capitally adapted to the English stage, and afforded Mr. Henry Wing, particularly, some fine opportunities of exhibiting her judgment and feeling as an actress.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.—WEDNESDAY.

(sittings in Banco.)

IN RE CAPTAIN DOUGLAS

In this case a habeas corpus had been obtained to bring up the body of Captain Douglas, who was in the custody of Lieutenant-Colonel Hay, at Chatham, on the charge of having deserted from his regiment in India. The return to the habeas corpus was read. It set out that Captain Douglas had been charged before J. Hardwicke, Esq., one of the justices of the peace for the county of Middlesex, with having deserted from the 49th Regiment of Native Infantry, of the forces of the East India Company; that on such charge he had been committed by the said justice to the custody of the gaoler of Tothill fields Bridewell, and that since such committal, the Secretary at War had issued his order to Lieutenant-Colonel Hay, the commander of the East India Company's forces at Chatham, to receive the body of Captain Douglas from the gaoler of Tothill fields Bridewell, and keep him safely until he could be conveyed to Madras. The captain denied that he was a deserter, as he had leave of absence till March, 1843. The order contained a statement of the charge of desertion, which was made on the ground that the leave of absence only applied to the Neuagherry hills. Mr. Kelly (who, with Mr. Rogers and Mr Montagu Chambers, appeared for Captain Douglas) moved that he be ordered to be discharged. It proposed to put in an affidavit made by the prisoner, which was, however, objected to by the Attorney-General (who, with Sir W. Follett and Mr. Clarkson, appeared for the East India Company.) A long discussion ensued, which ended in the court refusing to admit the document.—Mr. Kelly then said he should move that Captain Douglas be discharged out of custody. Captain Douglas had some years ago attained the rank of captain in the East India Company's service, and held a commission as captain in the 49th Regiment of Madras Native Infantry. He was with his regiment in the East Indies, and it ought this did not appear on the return, it might without impropriety be suggested as a hypothesis that Captain Douglas had obtained leave of absence, and, having done so, was at liberty to dispose of his person as he thought fit during the continuance of that leave. With the belief that he had the right thus freely to dispose of himself, he came to this country. In the early part of October Captain Douglas was apprehended and carried before a magistrate, and he was then committed to custody, as now appeared on the face of the return. The complaint of Captain Douglas, therefore, was that not having committed any offence he has yet been charged with one, and imprisoned on that charge. He denied the alleged fact of his being a deserter, and he declared that, in law, his case neither fell within the rules of the common law nor of the statute, and he insisted that he was entitled to his discharge, as the return was bad. He (Mr. Kelly) then read the affidavit of the prisoner, in which he stated that, in June, 1839, he was appointed by the Secretary at War to a lieutenancy in the 49th Regiment of Madras Native Infantry, and that he was duly gazetted to that rank. He was then stationed at Bangalore, in the East Indies, and he continued to do duty with his regiment until the 1st of March, 1842, when he obtained leave of absence for twelve months, to enable him to proceed to Europe. He then left India, and arrived in this country in the month of October last. He was not aware that he had not no attention to them, and pulled her along as he would have done a dog. The defendant did not offer the slightest provocation to justify the ill treatment she received. Two young men, named Rowe and Cohen, corroborated the evidence of the last witness in every particular. — Mr Broughton said that he was glad to put some questions to the inspector who took the charge, and desired that he might be sent for.— Inspector Shackell soon afterwards arrived in court, and, on being sworn, stated that both the defendant and the officer assaulted each other, but only when they arrived at the station house. The defendant's hand was bleeding profusely from a slight cut which she alleged had been caused by the officer's violence. On her accusing the officer of having gone several times into Mr. Smith's house for the purpose of drinking, witness questioned him on the subject, and he admitted having gone once into the house to receive instructions, but denied most positively having drunk anything. He released the defendant upon half the latter's fine being offered.—Mr. Broughton said that the inspector had acted most properly in liberating her as soon as possible, and he had no doubt that if the matter had been correctly represented to him he would not have entertained it at all. The defendant had called three witnesses, whose evidence was in direct contradiction to that of the policeman, and the latter had told an untruth to the inspector respecting the hour at which he had got went out to perform his duty at that court. He was of opinion that the alleged assault amounted to a mere struggle, which it was natural for the defendant, acting in her an indignant sense of wrong, to have resisted, as under the circumstances she was a respectable married woman to be dragged from her home and family without being conscious of her having done anything to justify it. Even if it were true that she had assaulted the policeman, he should consider, under the circumstances, that she had been sufficiently punished, and all that he could now do was to discharge her.—The satisfaction of the audience at the decision was manifested by a clapping of hands, which was instantly checked by the ushers.

CORONERS' INQUESTS.

On Tuesday Mr. Wakley, M.P., held an inquest at the House of Correction, Coldbath-fields, on the body of Jane Brown, aged thirty-four, a prisoner in the above gaol. From the evidence it appeared that the deceased was convicted at the last sessions of the Central Criminal Court of having stolen a silk pocket handkerchief from a gentleman in a public house, for which she was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment and hard labour in the above prison; but after her admission it was discovered that she was affected with dropsy, and she was accordingly removed to the infirmary, where every attention was paid by the house surgeon, but she died on Saturday last. Her legs were swollen to the fullest size. Verdict, "Died from natural causes." There are at present 1100 prisoners in the gaol.

FATAL PUNCTURE OF A LADY'S FINGER.—Mr. Carter, the coroner for Surrey, held an inquest on Wednesday at the Hero of Waterloo, Waterloo-road, on the body of Sarah Fuller, a maiden lady, aged sixty-five. It was stated that the deceased resided at No. 108, Stamford-street, Blackfriars, and died on Saturday week last. It was proved by Caroline Gray, of the same house, that the deceased had purchased a turkey, and while she was carving it, with a skewer, the third finger of the right hand. The wound soon became exceedingly painful, the finger and hand began to swell, and in consequence a surgeon was called in on the day following. Mr Pratt, surgeon, of Adelaide-street, Strand, said that he visited the deceased on Sunday week, and found her greatly exhausted. The right arm of deceased was swollen from the hand to the shoulder, and he found upon examination that the joints of the punctured finger were deadened. Gangrenous mortification, no doubt the result of the puncture, rapidly attacked the whole of the injured arm, and caused death on Wednesday last. Verdict, "Accidental death."

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, Nov. 14, 1842.

Mon cher Monsieur, Since my last communication but few changes have taken place in our fashionable world; nevertheless, you must not suppose us stationary. On the contrary, the artellers of our leading modistes have never been witnesses of greater activity than reigns amongst them at the present moment. Every thing that luxury can require, or taste or intelligence invent, may be found in full development in Paris; and even in the interval between my former and present letter I have observed several elegant innovations in our established fashions, amongst the principal of which I may class the very pretty Armenian manteaus, mentioned in my last, and which are now to be seen in velvets of various colours, with exquisite ornaments of passementerie. This, unquestionably, is the prettiest promenade costume that we are likely to see this winter. Amongst the materials for dresses most in favour at present we may place the Pekin. We see it used in every form, trimmed with lace of every new and elegant description, and, when accompanied with those long and beautiful scarfs, or with those immense pelerines, formed out of a single piece of lace, we know few things more striking. The brocatelle is also greatly used for pelisses and redingotes, and few things answer better for promenade or home evening costumes, as the strength of the stuff renders it extremely durable, whilst its extreme flexibility prevents its fraying. The Manchester levantine has had a great success here as an article for dress aprons; as also the gitana for negligé robes, and plaids for fancy costumes. The royal cloth, for riding-habits, is really as much an article of necessity with our belles as the riding-habit itself. I should tell you that passementerie is still more fashionable than ever, especially if the choice of it be tastily made. We see it used here to ornament manteaus and bournous of black velvet, to which it forms a most delicious addition. I have also seen another very pretty thing in the shape of a little Armenian scarf in fine black network, embroidered in needlework with silk of various shades so as to imitate gold. This worn as a head-dress was really very effective. I understand that similar descriptions of ornament are used to surround the borders of tunics and robes of white crêpe, and, when full dressed, an Armenian scarf twined tastefully around the bust, and with the ends floating loose, on either side, has a very beautiful and elegant appearance. One of our most distinguished elegantes has latterly sported another description of trimming which is very becoming; it is a sort of large frill in black or grey chenille. The head-dress made of the same material, and with frills and sleeves trimmed with the same, are a magnificent accompaniment to a velvet or black satin robe. Similar trimmings in rose-coloured or in silver pearl chenille have been attached to a rose crêpe robe. At this moment also casual scarfs with lace frills are in great vogue, and are an article of indispensable necessity with our fashionables.

FLORICULTURE.

THE TOBACCO PLANT.
Nicotiana Tabacum.

Though this plant cannot be said to be a rare one, seeing that, in one shape or another, it is in everybody's mouth, yet its physical characters, in the living state, are by no means popularly known; and, in the absence of anything decidedly new, we have this week selected it for illustration. Popular ignorance, in reference to the plants which furnish tobacco and tea, is nearly as extensive as their use. This ignorance in both these cases, as well as in every other worthy of attention, it forms a main part of our purpose to remove. The plant under present consideration is an annual, and a native of America. The illustration represents the species of it which is principally imported into this country as a luxury, or, it might be said, as a necessary of life, for such habit has constituted it in many cases. The immense revenue derived from the duty on tobacco has literally given rise to such prohibitory laws as effectually prevent the growth of the plant on a scale scarcely more extensive than is necessary to produce it as an ornament or an object of curiosity; but wherever it is grown in this country it is found to bloom till the end of September, though in its native soil it flowers in July. All parts of the plant are downy and clammy to the touch, and give out a fœtid odour. The stem is erect and round, branching towards the top, and rises to the height of four or five feet. The leaves are not unlike those of the foxglove, and are alternate on the stem, without heave stalks, oblong, pointed, not cut, and of a dull green colour. The lower leaves are often two feet long, and from four to five inches broad; but they become narrower and smaller as they approach to the top of the stem. The general inflorescence is as represented in our cut. The calyx is bell-shaped, and divided into five segments; the corolla consists of one petal, twice the length of the calyx, of a pale green colour at the tubular part, swelling into an oblong cup, which expands into five pointed plated segments, of a delicate rose colour; the filaments are the length of the corolla, and surmounted by oblong compressed anthers, the germanis oval, and supports a long slender style, terminated by a roundish bilobed stigma. The stamens are inserted into the tube of the corolla; an ovate capsule, containing many small kidney-shaped seeds, and bursting at its apex, makes its appearance when the flower falls off. The generic name "Nicotiana" was given to this plant in honour of Jean Nicot, Ambassador of Francis II. in Portugal, who brought some tobacco from Lisbon, and presented it to Catherine de Medici as a valuable herb; hence also it was called Queen's herb. Some say that the name Tobacco was derived from Tabaco, a province of Yucatan, where the Spaniards first found it; others derive it from the island of Tobago; and Humboldt asserts that the word belongs to the ancient language of St. Domingo, and that it applies, not to the herb, but the tube through which it is smoked. It is generally supposed that the plant was brought either from Virginia or South America. Humboldt, however, is of opinion that it was brought from Yucatan about the year 1559. The cultivation of tobacco preceded that of the potato by nearly 140 years. When Sir Walter Raleigh brought it from Virginia in 1585, fields of it were already in cultivation in Portugal; and so rapidly did the practice of smoking spread, that about the end of the same century bitter complaints were made in England of the imitation of the habits of of savage people. Camden says—"Ex illo sane tempore tabacum usu capit ises crebrrrime in Anglise et magno pretio, dum quamplurimi graveolentem illius fumum per tubulum testaceum hauriant et nox a naribus effant adeo at Anglorum corpora in barbarorum naturam degenerasse videantur quum iidem ac barbari delectentur." From this passage it appears that, after imbibing the smoke through a clay tube in the modern manner, they expelled it through the nostrils. In 1634 loss of the nose was the penalty incurred by smoking. Twenty years after a council of one of the Swiss cantons summoned all smokers before them, and innkeepers were directed to inform against all persons found smoking on their premises In the laws of Bern the prohibition of smoking followed the law against adultery. The Sultan Amurath IV. punished the crime of smoking with death; and Pope Urban VIII. anathematised all who used it in places of worship, it being a species of burnt offering which did not meet with his approval. Most people have heard of the "Counterblaste to Tobacco," attributed to King James I., who, not content with writing against it, made laws against it also; which, having pretty much the same effect as his literary efforts, he directed, in 1619, that no Virginian planter should cultivate more than 100lbs. The "juice of cursed hebanon," by which, according to Shakspere, the King of Denmark was poisoned, is supposed to have been the essential oil of tobacco:—

"Upon my secure hour thy uncle stole
With juice of cursed hebanon in a vial,
And in the porches of mine ear did pour
The leperous distilment."

Dr. Gray thinks that the word hebanon is used by a metathesis for henbane; and Gerde states that tobacco was commonly called Hyoscamus Peruvianus, or henbane of Peru. It is not at all unlikely that the immortal William, who could play the courtier betimes as well as another, finding the use of the "weed" not approved of in high places, gave a helping voice to its condemnation by enduing it with powers of no ordinary malignity. The essential oil of tobacco would be pretty certain to produce fatal consequences which no preparation of henbane would (at we know of, at least, in a concentrated shape; and, if any such preparation ever existed, it is not probable that we would have lost all traces of it so completely. There are four species of tobacco cultivated in Europe. Of these, N. rustica was the one with which Sir Walter Raleigh solaced himself when in the Tower. Tobacco belongs to the fifth class and first order of the Linnæan system, and the natural family Solanæ.

SWORD FISH.

The above sketch represents a sword-fish of extraordinary size, which was taken off Deal a few days since, and which measures sixteen feet in length, five feet in girth, and above 200lbs. in weight. The fisherman by whom it was caught sent it to London, and it was bought by Mr. Sweeting, of 159, Cheapside, whose shop was for several days besieged by an anxious crowd, for the purpose of seeing this wonderful specimen of the finny tribe. The sword is more than five feet long, of apparently a metallic substance, and capable (even without the aid of muscular power) of being wielded with deadly effect. A most curious fact in the formation of this large and powerfully muscular fish is, that the only vent from the body is not larger than that of a herring, and its gills have eight folds. Mr. Sweeting has offered this specimen to the British Museum for twenty guineas (having purchased the fish at Billingsgate for £5), with the understanding that the "fortunate fisherman" who captured this marine giant shall receive one-half of the purchase money.

The Baron de Gerando, member of the Chamber of Peers, and author of several works on education, social economy, &c., has just died in Paris.

TREES BY POST.—Among the numerous novelties of conveyance by post which the new system has given rise to, we have to record, as the most singular instance that has recently come under our observation, the transmission of a willow-tree by a friend of ours at Redditch to a lady at Norwich. The tree in question is a genuine descendant from the far-famed Napoleon willow at St. Helena. Some ten years since we noticed in the Herald the circumstance that a shoot from the willow-tree at Napoleon's grave had been presented to Dr. Davenport, the venerable vicar of Stratford-on-Avon, by whom it was planted in the vicarage garden. That shoot has grown and become a tree; and from this tree a branch was presented by the present respected vicar of Stratford, the Rev. J. Clayton, to our friend at Redditch, who has raised from this branch three trees, one of which he transmitted by post, as before stated, to a lady at Norwich. His fair correspondent acknowledged, per return of post, the receipt and safe arrival of the interesting relic, and stated it to be in as fresh and flourishing a state as if just removed from its native soil.—Worcester Herald.

There is a great novelty at present at the Waterloo Saw-mills, in the Commercial-road, Lambeth, for which a patent has been obtained, for the planeing of deals. Its construction is simple in the extreme, the result being produced by revolving knives worked by steam. The deals thus planed are not only most rapidly turned out of hand, but possess a smoothness and quality not to be acquired by the ordinary means; and, moreover, the edges are "ploughed" and "toned" at the same time as the surface.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Since our last report the arrivals of wheat up to this market from our own coast, as well as by land carriage, have been very limited, yet the demand for all descriptions has fallen off to a material extent, and, when sales have been effected, the factors have been compelled to give way in their demands quite 1s per quarter. In foreign wheat, both free and in bond, exceedingly little has been passing. The finest qualities have maintained their previous rates, but the middling and inferior kinds have had a downward tendency. Barley and malt have been very dull sale, yet we cannot alter our quotations. Owing to the large supply of oats on the market, that article has declined 6d to 1s per quarter. Beans, peas, and flour as last noted.

ARRIVALS.—English: wheat, 4110; barley, 9870; oats, 2260; and malt, 3050 quarters; flour, 5990 sacks. Irish: oats, 1770 quarters. Foreign: wheat, 6170; and barley, 630 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 46s to 55s; ditto white, 54s to 63s Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 49s to 57s; do. white, 51s to 58s; rye, 34s to 38s; grinding barley, 27s to 29s; malting do., 30s to 32s; Chevalier, 32s to 34s; Suffolk and Norfolk malt, 56s to 62s; brown do., 50s to 54s; Kingston and Ware, 56s to 62s; Chevalier, 63s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 23. to 24s; potato do., 25s to 26s; Youghal and Cork, black, 17s to 18s; do. white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, new, 34s to 36s; do. old, 34s to 38s; grey peas, 36s to 38s; maple, 33s to 34s; white, 30s to 32s; boilers, 32s to 37s; per quarter. Town-made flour, 46s to 47s; Suffolk, 38s to 40s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 36s to 38s; per 280 lbs. Foreign.—Free wheat, 50s to 62s. In Bond.—Barley, 20s; oats, new, 12s to 17s; do. feed, 14s to 16s; beans, 20s to 26s; peas, 23s to 27s; per quarter. Flour, America, 22s to 24s; Baltic 22s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—Linseed and rapeseed go off with some degree of briskness at full prices, but in other kinds of seeds exceedingly little is doing.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 48s to 57s; Baltic, crushing, 42s to 45s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 45s to 46s; hempseed, 38s to 46s; per quarter; coriander, 10s to 18s per cwt.; brown mustard seed, 10s to 11s; white do., 10s to 10s 6d; tares, 5s 6d to 6s 0d per bushel; English rapeseed, new, 30l to 33l per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, 10l to 10l 10s; do. foreign, 7l to 7l 10s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, 5l 5s to 6l per ton.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 48s 8d; barley, 27s 11d; Oats, 17s 9d; rye, 32s 2d; beans, 31s 8d; peas, 33s 2d.

Imperial Averages of Six Weeks which govern Duty.—Wheat, 50s 0d; Barley, 28s 6d; Oats, 18s 0d; Rye, 31s 4d; Beans, 32s 2d; Peas, 33s 8d per quarter.

Duty on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s 0d; Barley, 9s 0d; Oats, 8s 0d. Rye, 10s 6d; Beans, 10s 6d; Peas, 9s 6d.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 6d to 7d for the 4lb loaf.

Tea.—The deliveries from the warehouses this week have been large Holders are firm to full prices. For Monday next upwards of 56,000 packages are announced for public competition.

Sugar.—This market has ruled rather inactive, and, in some cases, not withstanding the limited supplies brought forward, the prices have declined from 6d to 1s per cwt.

Coffee.—The demand is quiet for this article, at about late rates.

Rice.—We have a firm sale for Bengal, at from 10s to 12s per cwt.

Saltpetre.—There has been a fair business done, and at public sale 800 bags Calcutta went at 28s 6d, being full prices.

Fruit.—The demand for fruit is still limited for the time of year, with large arrivals.

Tallow.—There has been only a moderate business transacted, at 48s 6d on the spot and 48s 9d for delivery in the spring months.

Provisions.—The Irish butter market is still very dull, at barely the late depression, but foreign parcels are quite as dear. Hams and all other kinds of provisions move off slowly, at about late rates.

Wools.—The large approaching public sales, at which nearly 16,000 packages will be brought forward, are now attracting much attention; hence we have had very little doing by private contract.

Hops.—The inquiry for hops still rules dull, but we have no variation to notice in figures.

Oils.—We have a steady inquiry for oils, but without alteration in figures

Potatoes.—The imports of potatoes this week have been about 1600 tons, while the demand is slow, at from 80s to 70s per ton.

Smithfield.—The supplies of stock having exhibited a slight falling off, the trade has become somewhat firmer than of late. Beef has sold at from 3s 2d to 4s 4d; mutton, 3s 4d to 4s 4d; veal, 3s 6d to 4s 6d; and pork, 3s 6d to 4s 6d per 8lbs., to sink the offal.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—In consequence of the large quantities of slaughtered meat on offer the general demand is slow, at the annexed rates:—Beef, from 3s 8d to 4s 4d; mutton, 3s 4d to 4s; veal, 3s 6d to 4s; and pork, 4s to 4s 6d per 8lbs., by the carcase.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

[No. 29. FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1842. [SIXPENCE.

OFFICE, 198, STRAND.

OUR ENGLISH TRIUMPHS IN THE EAST.

Our journal of to-day affords another record of the indomitable spirit of British energy and valour—the glorious rebound from temporary adversity into glowing victory and success, which has vindicated the prowess of our arms, and flashed upon our country from her fiery eastern empire with something like the suddenness of its simoom, and the splendour of its sun. It is not long since that, in proclaiming a miserable category of disasters which had befallen our troops—in recording histories of treachery, carnage, and havoc in our Indian army—we took occasion to assert the necessity of teaching the fanatic and merciless Affghans one of those fearful lessons of retribution which, in the field of war and conquest, should stamp the greatness and the terror of the English name. We then disapproved of the contest which we had undertaken in India, against the religion, the prejudices, and perhaps the rights of fierce hordes of hardy and unrelenting natives, in the midst of a country that had danger stirring on every mountain, and difficulty lurking in every pass. We advanced, too, some arguments of justice, reason, and humanity, against the initiative principle of the desperate task we had set ourselves in the Eastern World; but when the die of war seemed cast for ever in the mould of Akbar Khan's brutal and barbarian treachery and murder—when the hand of crime, in its most crimson deformity, was fairly wielding the sword of treason in our teeth—when our representative was cut down in the very act of peaceful parley—when our troops were massacred without quarter, our women imprisoned, and our arms defied—then, indeed, we did not hesitate to listen to the outcries of national honour, and to proclaim the principle that England was bound to hold strenuously upon her course, to effect a stern and teaching retribution, and to plant her lion-banner on the Balla Hissar height, a symbol of the imperishable dignity of our country, and the achieving spirit of our noble and devoted troops. And yet, while this purpose has been written down with unrelenting hostility by some of our contemporaries—while upon its principle the Herald has hissed its milk and water, and the Chronicle squirted its gall—it has been boldly, perseveringly, gloriously consummated by our own brave British soldiers, under such commanders as have been the pillars of our army in every enterprise of war. What signifies now the petty revilings of party from one quarter, or the maudlin whinings of a half-morbid humanity from another? Our generals and men have done their duty nobly—avenged the wrongs of their chiefs and comrades, and silenced the prating arguments of satirists and sentimentalists alike, by pointing through the open field of victory a path to the Temple of Peace. Peace is, of course, the ultimate bourne aspired to by every honourable mind, and now we may soon attain it with credit, and stamp it with the endurance which it will gather from the terror and triumphs of our arms.

Never did the wings of steam waft over eternal ocean a more gratifying flood of intelligence than our last mail has brought us from the seat of the Indian war. A few terse sentences will tell the tale:—

> Ghuznee is destroyed, and its Affghan governor routed in the field by General Nott. 327 Sepoys and a large part of the English prisoners are already rescued from the hands of the enemy. Akbar Khan, with 16,000 men, is utterly defeated at Tezeen (the scene of our own past disasters) by General Pollock; and our two gallant commanders have met in quiet occupation of Cabul.

Our first impulse upon perusing this heart-stirring news is to pay the tribute of gratitude and admiration to our brave and generous army, and its skilful and victorious leaders. The names of Nott, and Pollock, and Sale, will henceforth form part of the brightness of the scutcheon of England—the lustre which her chivalrous history sheds along the stream of time. To them, and to their dauntless companions in arms, the justice of a grateful nation will award something more than the meed of conquest they have gained; and the warmth of the hearts of their countrymen may be taught, by their own valour, to equal that of the glowing climate in which they have erected their renown. It is pleasing, too, to reflect that in the instance of General Sale his laurels are not now likely to have been won at the expense of domestic happiness; for, although his heroic lady is not among those prisoners who have been actually recovered, yet she was near at hand, at Bameean, and Sir Richard Shakespear, with 700 kuzzilbashes, had been sent to secure her reprisal. The next intelligence will, doubtless, afford us the pleasure of learning that she is safely returned to her distinguished husband.*

The next aspect in which we are bound to contemplate these conquests of our arms is that of the guarantee which they afford us of a return to permanent and advantageous peace. This the Governor-General of India proclaimed as his dearest object at the very outset of his mission, and his despatch now proves that, if his anxiety in this direction be half be really equal to his means, the desirable end will be speedily and happily achieved. It is thus that Lord Ellenborough records the effect of the new success:—

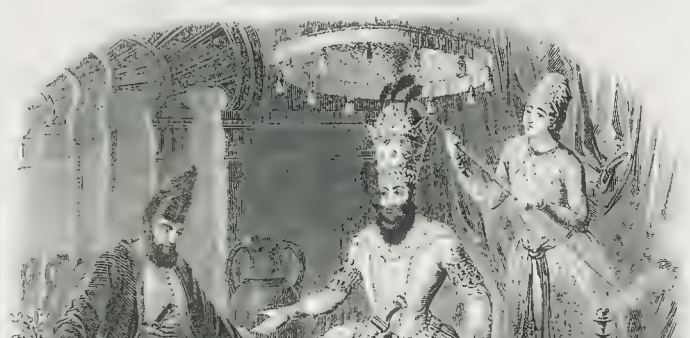
> The British flag waves in triumph from the highest point of the Balla Hissar. Thus have all past disasters been retrieved and avenged on every scene on which they were sustained; and repeated victories in the field, and the capture of the cities and citadels of Ghuznee and Cabul, have advanced the glory and established the accustomed superiority of the British arms.

Here, then, England would seem to have almost accomplished enough. It now becomes a question whether, after the complete restoration of her power in the Affghan district, it will be either just or prudent to push the war into an act of territorial aggrandisement, and allow tyrannical aggression to interpose a bloody barrier to peace. We may now redeem the past with the olive branch as honourably as we have done it with the sword. We have quelled the barbarian among his own mountains, and silenced the lion in his den. We have leaped over or borne down the natural barriers of his country, and made his gloomy defiles send up the echoes of our victories among the rocks and forests of his everlasting hills. We have taught his warriors that we can lay bare the bosom of treachery to an avenging sword, and that the power of England is stronger than the protection of the Affghan god. We have extinguished in his bosom the hope of the chances of war; and the despairful remembrance of a stern, perfect, and crushing defeat will surely strengthen the reasons for his submission, and make the endurance of peace probable in the proportion in which the humiliation that imposes it is subduing and complete. Let Great Britain, then, now assume in conquest the mantle of moderation, and achieve the wisdom of knowing where to stop.

There is a second burst of intelligence from the East, which has brought with it more records of satisfying success, although not of a nature to excite an exultation similar to that which stirs us at the recital of our Affghan triumphs. It is, however, of boundless importance in its commercial relations, and is, moreover, a further confirmation of our resistlessness in teaching nations the lesson of our power and our pride. WE ARE AT PEACE WITH CHINA. The Celestial Emperor has at last concluded terms with our Queen's Plenipotentiary, and the brother to the Sun and Moon has accepted the dictation of a treaty from the daughter of the Duke of Kent! This treaty is in all respects satisfactory. It secures us a few round millions of dollars, and no end of very refreshing tea. It gives an impetus to trade, and leaves us in possession of very pleasant Chinese territory, until master Emperor begins to ratify his bargain with some cash down. It cedes us one island in perpetuity, and, in short, puts that sort of climax to the war which satisfies our interests more than our vanity, and rather gives over glory a preponderance to gain.

In other columns of our paper will be found ample details of the two fortunate events which we have thus felt it our duty to make the subject of our opening articles. They have created a great sensation, and cannot but be deemed of most happy issue to the existing Government. Without one thought of party, we heartily congratulate the Ministers and society at large upon the success of our arms and negotiations; and we turn with a more devout and humble thankfulness to that guardian Power which has thus blessed with a divine influence and protection the fortunes and destinies of England, and shed new lustre over the young sway of a Sovereign whom we trust ever to see happy in her devotion to the honour and happiness of her people, and the worship and glory of her GOD.

* Since this article was written intelligence has arrived of the recovery of Lady Sale and all the other prisoners but Captain Bygrave.



MAHMOUD SHAH, THE PRESENT KING OF PERSIA

We gave, some weeks since, portraits of the Sultan and his Vizier, and we now add the "counterpart presentment" of another important eastern potentate, the reigning sovereign of Persia, and his chief minister of state. Our engraving affords a faithful insight into the interior of the royal chamber of audience, where, surrounded by the aids and appliances of Asiatic life, the Shah Mahmoud gives ear to the high officers admitted to the royal presence.

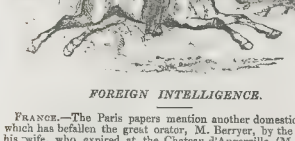
With the word Persia is associated the memory of that early time when it was the seat of one of the most powerful Asiatic monarchies—a kingdom connecting Eastern with Western Asia. In the vicinity of its early rule were the great monarchies of Assyria and Babylon, and with Persia are connected the names of Alexander and Darius—the manly virtues which animated the followers of Cyrus, sapped by luxury and effeminacy, overthrown by the hardy, disciplined troops of Macedon, and a monarch

"deserted in his utmost need,
By those his former bounties fed."

But it is not alone upon historical associations that Persia just now claims attention or excites interest. The importance of the English possessions in the East has, for a long time past, directed European attention to those countries lying between our Indian empire and the dominions of the Russian. Were this the place for such discussion, we might enter into explanations which would show that the timid and half-informed politicians who talk of the Northern Autocrat attacking our possessions in Hindostan are quite innocent of authentic information as to the difficulties of such an undertaking. To cross Persia, and the other intervening countries, competent military authority has shown that more than one or two campaigns would be necessary, and that, if crossed at all, it must be with a small army and without artillery. The army must be small because Persia could not, however willing she might be, support a large one; and no efficient artillery could be taken on account of the badness, nay, the entire absence of available, roads. Napoleon made friendly overtures to Persia, as Russia is supposed now to do, regarding it as the road to the eastern possessions of the English; but the late acute and avaricious Shah knew and appreciated the real condition of his country as adapted to the transit of troops. That vigilant prince was fully aware that no European could march through his dominions, and he gratified his avarice and kept his kingdom secure, by steadily refusing to improve its communications. "No, no," he replied to the solicitations of Abbas Meerza's favourite and singularly dextrous agent; "we Persians can move as our fathers did; but the Infidels walk only in straight ways." He made no roads.

Recent events invest Persia and her ruler with additional interest, particularly the expedition against Herat, a tributary city of the Shah, and the operations in Affghanistan. The Affghans, against whom our troops have been contending, and of whose country and appearance we have so recently given pictorial illustrations—these same Affghans in the last century desolated Persia, carrying fire and sword to her remotest extremities and reducing her cities to ashes. These wrongs were avenged by Nadir Shah, who, under the name of Kouli Khan, carried the arms of Persia victoriously into India. His death without any regular successor led to a series of struggles, and the claims of various chiefs involved the country in a civil war, almost as destructive as the inroads of the Affghans. One of Nadir's lieutenants succeeded in securing the crown, and was followed by Aga Mahommed, an eunuch, who did much towards restoring the country and institutions.

The Persian monarchy is more deficient even than other Oriental states of all that belongs to a constitutional system. The sword alone reigns. Those strict laws for which she was anciently celebrated have been by successive revolutions entirely obliterated, and the present Shah Mahmoud, whose portrait we this week present to our readers, is a despotic monarch in the fullest sense. His will is law. The principle inculcated by the Koran, by which the Sovereign exercises a divine right over the lives and properties of his subjects, is fully recognised in Persia. The resources of Oriental exaggeration are exhausted in the lofty epithets by which the Shah is addressed. Amongst other titles he claims those of King of Kings, and Asylum of the Faith. Shah Mahmoud is in the prime of life, and, like all Persians, dextrous in the management of the horse, and expert in the use of weapons. He takes great pride in his army.



FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—The Paris papers mention another domestic affliction which has befallen the great orator, M. Berryer, by the decease of his wife, who expired at the Chateau d'Augerville (M. Berryer's seat near Malesherbes), last week, after a short illness. Madame Berryer was fifty years of age, and was the charm of her domestic circle by her kind disposition, her elegant and pleasing manners, and her great capacity. She was a sincere, zealous, and devoted Royalist, and was one of the few remaining examples of the lady of the ancien régime, affable and candid, and yet dignified and religious.

The important news from China occupied the columns of our French contemporaries at great length previous to the arrival of the Indian intelligence, and appeared to have created no little disappointment and vexation.

The Royalist France says:—"The English have made peace with China; they have obtained the commercial point to satisfy their ambition, and large compensation for the cost and sacrifice of the war. The British star, dim in the Indian wars, is radiant in China. This peace is an important event. English power will know how to derive the natural advantages from it, for it never stops. The East is agitated, and is dissolving, to be reconstituted by the powerful hand of Russia. England and Russia find new elements of force and grandeur, while France is isolating herself more and more, and is declining."

The Courrier Français says:—"If English commerce be admitted in China, it is impossible to reject that of other nations. It will be for the French Government to cause the rights of France to prevail; and it has not sent, doubtless, two French ships-of-war in the Chinese seas to countersign, by their presence, a concession in which our trade would take no share for the future."

The National thinks the Chinese treaty will not be long respected. Let whatever may be its duration, public opinion in Europe will regard the war as one of the most odious of the numerous odious wars undertaken by England.

The royal family of Belgium and the persons belonging to the Court of Brussels ceased, on the 17th instant, to wear mourning for the death of the Duke of Orleans, which had been ordered for the period of four months. The Queen, however, continues to wear half-mourning.

The late Odean Mahamud, Prince of Mysore, the second son of Tippoo Saib, whose death we have mentioned, was living in Paris, on a pension from the East India Company. He was buried at Père la Chaise, and was followed to the ground by several English persons of distinction. A Mussulman priest read over the tomb the prayers appointed for that purpose by the Prophet.

The Moniteur Parisien states that a letter has been received from Zante with information that a serious quarrel has taken place between the inhabitants and the English garrison. The military detachment, which occupied the barracks, has been sent to Corfu, and two companies of a Scotch regiment, quartered in the last-named island, were sent to replace it.

RAISING THE TELEMAQUE.—This vessel, which is supposed to contain a vast amount of treasure, has been raised right on her beam ends, with her port-side uppermost. The authorities are keeping a good look out, and a number of douaniers are appointed to watch the wreck night and day.

SPAIN.—The following appeared in our Monday's edition:—

REVOLUTION AT BARCELONA.

We have received by extraordinary express, from our correspondent at Paris, the following important intelligence:—

PARIS, SATURDAY EVENING, Nov. 19.

The Government papers of this evening, the Messager and Moniteur Parisien, contain the following intelligence, which, though not given as telegraphic despatches, cannot have been received in any other manner:—

"MADRID, Nov. 15.

"M. Olozaga has been appointed President of the Council by a majority of 82 voices to 41 against Acuna, the former president, proposed by the Ministry.

"M. Cartina has been named Vice-President by 40 votes."

PERPIGNAN, Nov. 19.

A letter from Barcelona, written by an officer of cavalry, arrived by express on the 18th, at La Jonquiera, says:—

"After a sanguinary contest we have been compelled to evacuate the town.

"The inhabitants have seized the artillery; we bivouacked for two days at the foot of the ramparts. The Gates of the Angels was the first carried by the national guard. The women were armed with lances. Detachments of troops of the line occupied still Atarzanas Mont-prieh-le-Port.

"We are assured that the insurrection has spread to Solsona and Lerida."

The following particulars explain the origin of this untoward occurrence:—

"On the evening of the 13th thirty workmen attempted to introduce through one of the gates some casks of wine without payment of duty. The populace took part with them, the guard was disarmed, and a soldier was killed. Reinforcements having arrived, twelve persons were arrested. The editor of the Republicano was thrown into prison. On the 14th the workmen quitted their work, and paraded through the city (10,000 of them belong to the national guard). At five o'clock in the evening the approaches to the Town-hall were guarded by the national guards, who refused to allow the regular troops to replace them. A regiment of the line was drawn up in order of battle on the Rambla with six pieces of cannon. All the troops were under arms. On the 16th no carriages or travellers arrived at Figueras from Barcelona. The gates were closed. The cavalry and infantry in garrison at La Jonquiera had left for Barcelona; orderly soldiers were constantly moving between Barcelona and Figueras with despatches. A person who left Mataro on the morning of the 16th reported that at Figueras no news had arrived from Barcelona, where the gates were closed. At Mataro the noise of cannonading was heard."

Martial law was proclaimed on the 15th in Barcelona, and from the firing, which was heard at a great distance, it was presumed that a serious conflict was going on, although no official information had at that time reached the Spanish consul at Perpignan.

The state of the weather in France prevented the working of the telegraph, so that on Wednesday they were without later news from Madrid and Barcelona at Paris than that published in our columns last Monday.

The following intelligence reached London on Thursday morning:—

"PERPIGNAN, Nov. 19.

"A courier which left Barcelona the day before yesterday has just arrived. The diligence of Barcelona had not reached Figueras. The evacuation of Barcelona by the troops is confirmed. The General Zavala is in the hands of the insurgents. They speak of 3 officers and 500 men having been killed.

"A popular junta had been installed. It is composed of men but little known. The president is Don Juan Manual Corsy. It has published a proclamation which recommends to the workmen "union and constancy," and does not say one word of the Queen, Espartero, Don Carlos, or of the aim of the insurrection.

"Montjuic, occupied by the troops, fires upon the town continually. The citadel is in the power of the rioters. They write on the 17th from Valencia that troops have been sent for the Messetrarz.

"BARCELONA, Nov. 17

"The troops were engaged in the streets on the 15th, at eight in the morning. After three hours fighting and a loss of 500 men killed and wounded, the captain-general, seeing that the windows and terraces of the houses were occupied in all the city, by the armed national guard, retired into the citadel with his staff and two regiments. The other regiment and the Artillery have gone to Atarzanas. The remainder of the day was employed in making preparations on one side and the other.

The Moniteur of Thursday publishes the following telegraphic despatches:—

"MADRID, 20TH.—Rodil, after having announced to the Congress the events of Barcelona up to the 16th, stated that the Regent would set out on the next day for Catalonia, with his escort and three battalions. The Congress immediately voted an address to the Regent, promising its support against the revolutionists. Madrid was tranquil."

The other despatch is from "Barcelona, the 19th. The headquarters of Van Halen is at San Feliz, two hours from Barcelona. He keeps his communications free with the fort of Montjuich. Hostilities are suspended with the town."

The proclamation of the insurgent Junta states that the provincial Junta was anxious to withdraw from its functions, but was forced by public clamour to become a governing Junta; that it would appoint an auxiliary consultative Junta. The bases of its policy would be independence of Madrid until a Liberal Government was formed, protection of industry and the labouring classes, and the union of all Liberals. It denounces no one—avoids anything more than a distant allusion to the Regent—deprecates dissension and bloodshed—and seems to place its prospects of success on the manifestations of other towns.

There were twelve battalions in Barcelona, from 800 to 900 strong, besides cavalry and artillery. The cavalry, knowing nothing of what was taking place, was surprised in Barcelonetta, and its horses and arms taken. Most of the artillery was lost in the same way. But Van Halen writes that he has 10,000 men on the Llobregat.

A later telegraphic despatch from Barcelona shows that the Junta was progressing from mild to violent measures.

The despatch is as follows:—

"Barcelona, Nov. 19.

"The programme just published by the Provisional Directing Junta is as follows:—

"1. Down with Espartero and his Government.

"2. The convoking of constituent Cortes.

"3. In case of regency, that there are to be more regents than one.

"1. That the Queen must marry a Spaniard.

"5. Protection of national industry.

"The Junta is trying to get the most respectable citizens of all opinions to form a consultative Junta, but this meets with great difficulty."

The Imparcial of Barcelona, of the 18th inst., says:—"The troops of the quarter of the artillery and the fort of Atarazanas have capitulated honourably. Montjuich alone holds out. Generals Zapano and Van Halen are at Sarria, and manifest a desire to enter Montjuich, with the intention of attacking the city. It appears that the provisional and directing Junta, on learning that General Van Halen was preparing to bombard the city from the fort of Montjuich, assembled with the provisional deputation and the French and British consuls, and came to an understanding for the prevention of so horrible a catastrophe. A deputation has been sent to General Van Halen, composed of the consuls, a member of the provincial deputation, and one of the junta. To morrow we shall be able to communicate the result.—P.S. General Van Halen, with the troops under his command at Sarria and its environs, has commenced his march for St. Pelrce de Llobregat. Our city is tranquil. We hear no other noise than the 'All's well' of the sentinels."

TELEGRAPHIC DESPATCHES.

Bayonne, Nov. 21.

THE GENERAL COMMANDING TO THE MINISTER OF WAR.

Three projects of laws have been presented to the Cortes:—

1. A loan of 500,000,000 reals guaranteed by the entire revenue of the State.

2. Capitalization into Three per Cent. Stock of all the interest on the home active debt due or to become due to the 1st of May, 1843, included.

3. Liquidation, by means of bons dits de l'arrière, of all interest which is due or shall be due from the 1st of January, 1835, to the 31st of December, 1842.

Nov. 22.

THE LIEUTENANT-GENERAL COMMANDING TO THE MINISTER OF WAR.

On the 20th the Regent announced to the Cortes the events which had occurred at Barcelona, and that he would leave Madrid for that city on the following day.

Madrid was tranquil. It was said that two regiments had revolted at Arragon.

The mail from Saragossa has not arrived.

Our Madrid letters of the 17th have come to hand. They make no mention of disturbances at Madrid, such as had been rumoured in Paris, nor had the French Government received any such intelligence up to four o'clock on Wednesday.

Senor Mendizabal proposes to take off all duty on cotton twist, and thus, delivering the material to the manufacturers of Catalonia, they will try for two years what they can do. Thus, ceding nothing, Senor Mendizabal expects England, in return for this nothing, to guarantee a loan of a thousand millions of reals, half of which is to be employed in opening roads in the interior of Spain! England is also to remove all tobacco depôts from Gibraltar, and to lower the duties on sherry one-third.

THE HAGUE, Nov. 20.—A letter from Haerlem says that the works of the circumvallation for draining the lake on the east side, where they cross the marshes and low grounds, have been remarkably facilitated by the long drought of this summer, and there is reason to hope, from the progress that has already been made, that the works on this side will be entirely completed in the course of next year.

AMSTERDAM, Nov. 21.—The two celebrated portraits by Rembrandt, belonging to the late Mistress Van de Poll, relict of M. Jan Van de Poll, have been sold here to-day by auction; they were purchased by M. Nieuwenhuys, of Brussels, for 32,500 florins, which, with the expenses of 7½ per cent., make 35,045 florins. A cry of "Bravo" congratulated that gentleman, who is well known by his numerous purchases of pictures of the highest class. It is, however, to be regretted that these two gems will not remain in this country.

BRUSSELS.—DREADFUL ASSASSINATION.—We find the following in the Independant of Brussels of Sunday:—"Last night, at eleven o'clock (some say this morning at one), a tragical event occurred at the residence of Mdlle. Heinefetter, the prima donna of our theatre. M. Caumartin, whose father was member of the Chamber of Deputies in France, was at Mdlle. Heinefetter's with M. Aime Sirey, the author of a celebrated law work, and whose father was an avocât of the Court of Cassation. A violent dispute arose between them. M. Caumartin, who had had with him a sword-cane, stabbed M. Sirey, and he died upon the sofa. We are assured that M. Caumartin, after having committed this crime, fled in M. Sirey's carriage. The police were apprised of what had taken place about a quarter of an hour afterwards. The most active search was made for the murderer, and this morning all the gates of the city were closely watched." The Watchman says—"M. Sirey, who had come to Brussels for a week, had accompanied Mdlle. Heinefetter to a concert, and returned home with her to supper when the concert was over. M. Caumartin, his fellow-countryman, supped with them. Whilst they were taking their wine a violent dispute arose, and M. Caumartin having suddenly plunged the sword of his cane into the body of M. Sirey, who had contradicted something that he had said. M. Sirey was only able to exclaim, "Je suis frappé," and died instantly, the instrument having traversed the region of the heart. M. Caumartin proceeded immediately to Dr. Allard, and entreated him to attend the unfortunate Sirey, but it was too late. He was cold when the doctor arrived. On learning this fact, M. Caumartin fled, and it is not known what is become of him. It is said that a third guest, who received M. Sirey in his arms when he was stabbed, was so affected that this morning he was unable to utter a word." In another account it is stated that M. Sirey, who was twenty-nine years of age, was married, and the father of a family. He resided in Paris, in the rue Lafitte.

CONSTANTINOPLE FORTIFICATIONS.—A letter from Constantinople, in the Augsburg Gazette, states that a report was current there of its being intended to surround the city with fortifications, like those of Paris.

NEAPOLITAN NEWS.—The King of Naples arrived at Palermo on the 4th inst., accompanied by his brother, Prince Louis. He was attended by his staff, but no member of the Council of State, or the Civil Administration, was in his suite. The ordinance for the reduction of the duty on the export of raw sulphur, from eight to two tari per quintal, was to be published at Palermo on the 5th inst.

AFFAIRS OF SERVIA.—The Augsburg Gazette has a letter of the 7th inst. from Belgrade:—"The solemn investiture of Prince Alexander Georgewitsch took place to-day, and he enters upon the full exercise of his government. Emin Effendi is preparing for his departure Prince Michael has, it is said, received advices from Vienna and St. Petersburg to remain quiet for the present. This, no doubt, has induced him o decide upon taking an excursion into the Bannat. Before he left Semlin he delivered into the hands of the Austrian General, De Havre all the orders he had received from the Sultan."

CRACOW.—A letter from St. Petersburg, of the 10th instant, in a Berlin journal, has the following:—"For about the period of ten years there have resided in the town of Cracow several Russians and Poles who became naturalised there in 1836, but without ceasing to be subjects of the Russian empire. Upon this the Emperor Nicholas has lately issued the following ordonnance:—'In conformity with the laws of the free town of Cracow, all natives of the empire are the kingdom of Poland who have, previous to the 25th of November, 1836, passed over to Cracow, and shall declare their wish to be considered as inhabitants, shall no longer be considered as Russian subjects; with the exception of such persons as form part of the Russian army, and such as are amenable to the criminal laws of the empire. This authority for becoming a subject of the state of Cracow is not to extend in any case to Russians or Poles who have established themselves at Cracow since the 25th of November, 1836. Such Russians and Poles who wish to settle at Cracow, as possess estates in the empire or kingdom, must sell them within the space of two years."

THE LEVANT.—We have received Malta papers to the 13th instant, inclusively. There is no political news of importance from the Levant. It is stated from Alexandria that Sami Pacha has received instructions from Mehemet Ali to negotiate a marriage between Said Pacha, one of the sons of the Viceroy, and a sister of the Sultan. We learn also from Alexandria that the rising of the Nile had caused great inconvenience to the establishment of Mr. Waghorn, several passengers being detained from the want of boats of burden. Many houses are stated to have been washed away, and several lives lost. A serious inundation at Bergamos is mentioned in the letters from Smyrna. Eighty persons had lost their lives, and much property was destroyed. From Constantinople we learn that a severe gale of wind had been experienced at Trebisonde. Numerous Turkish vessels were wrecked, but no mention is made of any disaster to English vessels.

MADRAS.—An address, agreed to at a public meeting of the European committee, was presented to Lord Elphinstone on his retirement from the presidency, to which his lordship returned a suitable reply. His lordship left on the 29th September on his return to Europe. We regret to state that Ensign William Blagden, of the Madras establishment, who arrived from England in the ship Seringapatam, was found drowned in the trench of the garrison. We also regret to announce the death, at Cuddilore, on the 29th ult., of Lieutenant-Colonel G. B. Tolson, the 10th Regiment Native Infantry. This casualty promotes Major C. St. John Grant, of the 52nd Native

Infantry, to Lieutenant-Colonel; Captain R. Dowell to Major; Lieutenant and Brevet Captain T. P. Walsh to Captain; and Ensign T. Crofton to Lieutenant. We learn that her Majesty's 50th Foot, proceeding by water from Chinsurah to Cawnpore, had met with bad weather, and experienced considerable loss of life and property, twenty-eight men having died on the way by sickness or accident.

AMERICA.—The packet ship Oxford, Captain Rathbone, from New York, which arrived at Liverpool on Wednesday, brought one day's later news from America than that already published, but it is altogether unimportant.

FOREIGN POLITICS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, NOV. 22.

The position of France at this moment occupies serious diplomatic attention. In 1840 she was isolated on account of the Eastern question. The great powers, out of regard for the peace of Europe, permitted her to re-enter the concert of nations, by the convention of July, 1841, relative to the straits of the Dardanelles and Bosphorus. The French Cabinet is desirous of action to give some éclat, after the Eastern questions being settled despite of France. M. Guizot finds in the Foreign-office records of the unceasing endeavours of French statesmen to extend the provisions of the slave suppression treaties of 1831 and 1833, executed up to 1841, without the slightest misunderstanding between France and England. M. Guizot then, taking the bases already existing when he came into office, proposes the accession of the northern powers to the treaties of humanity. The propositions of the French Ministry are accepted, and the treaty of December 1841 is signed. It differs only from former conventions by the extension of the zones of operation; and the reciprocal right of search, instead of being confined to England and France, was extended to Russia, Austria, and Prussia. France had then signed a treaty of five instead of her former treaties of two powers. Immediately grasped at the question, and an unceasing agitation caused the non-ratification of the 1841 treaty; but the other contracting powers keep to their engagements, and France is again isolated. Faction, however, is not yet satisfied; and, after signing a treaty considered as France's own request, refusing to ratify it, another scandal is contemplated of annulling old and existing treaties. Diplomacy is, therefore, justly alarmed at this state of things, and it almost regrets that the enormous concession was made to France of allowing her to creep out of the ratification without putting on record a solemn condemnation of such an abandonment of the rights of nations. Lord Aberdeen, it must be admitted, has acted with great firmness. He has officially signified to France that if she attempts to abrogate the treaties of 1831 and 1833 the British ambassador will be withdrawn from Paris, and all diplomatic intercourse shall cease. The Ministry here has no intention of annulling these treaties, but it fears the feeling of the Chambers as to the right-of-search principle; and it is anticipated that a motion to place that question between France and England on the same footing as between the latter power and the United States will be carried by a large majority of deputies. There has been, nevertheless, a striking change remarked amongst the latter who are now in Paris within the last twenty-four hours. The news of the peace with China and of our Cabul successes has diminished French confidence as to the failing fortunes of Great Britain, and the Conservatives see that we are not a power, with all our difficulties, to be trifled with. This salutary reaction, there is reason to suppose, will soon be felt at the Council of the Ministry of the Commodore, and it is hoped that the Keeper of the Privy Seal, by the exercise of his usual tact, will be able to convince the majority that faith in treaties must be preserved if France is to be ranked at all amongst civilised nations.

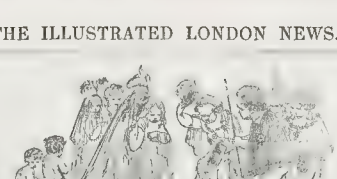
In commercial and manufacturing affairs a slow, but gradual, improvement is evidently in progress; and in a short period now, we confidently expect that, to all departments of industry, general activity will be restored. This must be the natural consequence of the enterprising spirit which is possessed, in an eminent manner, by the merchants of the United Kingdom, added to the immense wealth which has been embarked in the trade arising out their operations in commerce. Last week we had the satisfaction of communicating to our readers the, in the present state of British society, important fact of more cheering appearances in the state of trade generally, and, during this week, it is equally satisfactory to us to announce that this improvement has again considerably increased. The important news from China has given an impulse to our cotton manufactures which must speedily be attended by the most salutary effects to that great department of our industry; for, throughout the Chinese empire, with the important places for trade now opened to us by the terms of the peace lately made, happy consolidated, almost boundless channels are opened for the consumption of our cotton goods. But it is not to this article alone that these markets are then widely open, for the woollen cloth manufacturers will likewise enjoy their full share of the advantages which eventually must result from again opening, and further increasing, the facilities to trade with the richest and populous empire of China. Rest assured, our manufacturers in both, Europe taken together, in so far as the payments for the goods shipped by us for Chinese consumption will be made in articles which our climate presents us from producing, and not in grain, or in provisions, which we can grow in the greatest abundance at home, but which the states of Europe annually now throw into our markets, to the injury of the agricultural interest, and to the injury likewise of our manufactures, in so far as the home consumption of goods is affected in a very material degree by these foreign importations of food. In the home markets, likewise, an increased consumption of manufactures is this week very comfortably perceivable in British-made shawls, in tartans, and in all descriptions of fancy goods. In the corn markets generally, however, similar improvements cannot this week be noted. The home supplies have, at the same time, not been large; but, with the quantity of foreign wheat brought forward for sale, they have for the time sufficiently satisfied the consumption of the millers; and, although in the intrinsic value of wheat no decrease has taken place, still prices are noted as cheaper for each quarter, occasioned by the quality having been inferior this week to that previously received. On the colonial markets a more healthy appearance is gradually arising. Wools are in demand rather at the full rates of the London and Liverpool sale-rooms, which must be again quoted rather higher. It is, on the whole, a pleasant task to report so favourably on our future prospects in commerce.

Letters from Hamburg mention the failure of the old and respectable firm of P. C. Kunsden, at Copenhagen.

During the recent visit of the King and Queen of Greece to the Island of Mycona, the English Vice-Consul, Mr. Kordia, requested the King to accept a vineyard belonging to him, and in which is a beautiful temple of Neptune, with many inscriptions. The present was accepted by his Majesty.

Letters from Paris announce that the new Post Office treaty between France and England had been signed, as well as a treaty for regulating the cod fisheries of the two countries.

It is stated by a letter in a Frankfort journal, from Sweden, that all the brandy distilleries in that country have been abolished, and that a law has been passed ordering that the names of all persons who get intoxicated shall be posted on the door of the parish church, and that the clergyman shall put up prayers for their reformation.



THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

We regret to state that an accident lately happened to Lord Hatherton which might have been attended with serious consequences. His lordship was struck a little above the eye with a shot from the gun of John Mott, Esq., of Lichfield. Considerable hæmorrhage ensued, and the shot has not been found; but we are happy to state that the eye has escaped injury, and that the wound is better.

His Excellency the Russian Minister, and Baroness Brunnow, had the honour of receiving his Imperial Highness the Archduke Frederick of Austria at a sumptuous banquet at the Russian embassy. The entertainment was of the most recherché character, and the other arrangements were on a scale of splendour every way becoming the visit of his Imperial Highness.

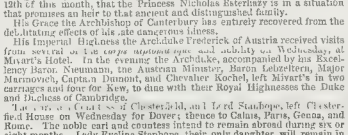
DEATH OF THE HON. CAPTAIN MATTHEW FORTESCUE, R.N.—We have to announce the demise of the above honourable and gallant gentleman, which melancholy event took place on Saturday last, at his residence in Devonshire-place. The deceased, who was only brother of the late Earl Fortescue, was born on the 12th of April, 1784, and was consequently in his 89th year.

It gives us pleasure to state, on the authority of letters from Vienna of the 12th of this month, that the Princess Nicholas Esterhazy is in a situation that promises an heir to that ancient and distinguished family.

His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury has entirely recovered from the debilitating effects of his late dangerous illness.

His Imperial Highness the Archduke Frederick of Austria received visits from several of the corps diplomatique and nobility on Wednesday, at Mivart's Hotel. In the evening the Archduke, accompanied by his Excellency Baron Neumann, the Austrian Minister, Baron Lebzeltern, Major Marinovich, Captain Dumont, and Chevalier Kochel, left Mivart's in two carriages and four for Kew, to dine with their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge.

The Marquess and Countess of Chesterfield, and Lord Stanhope, left Chesterfield House on Wednesday for Dover; thence to Calais, Paris, Genoa, and Rome. The noble earl and countess intend to remain abroad during six or eight months. Lady Eveline Stanhope, their only daughter, will remain in this country.



CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

The Rev. T. T. Bayne, of Jesus College, Oxford, has been presented to the perpetual curacy of St. John's Church, Broughton, Manchester.

J. H. Gatton, Esq., has presented the Rev. James Beaircroft, of Oriel College, to the rectory of Hadzor, Worcestershire.

We find by the Barbadoes Mercury of the 11th ult. that the Right Rev. Dr. Parry, the new Bishop of Barbadoes, was formally installed in his diocese on the 16th of October, in the presence of the Lieutenant-Governor, the ecclesiastical dignitaries, and legal functionaries of the island.

ORDINATION.—The Lord Bishop of Ely intends holding a general ordination in the Cathedral Church of his diocese on Sunday next, the 27th inst.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING THE BUILDING AND ENLARGEMENT OF CHURCHES AND CHAPELS.—A meeting of this society was held on Monday last, at the offices, St. Martin's-place, the Bishop of London in the chair, when the report stated that grants had been made by the society for the building of three new churches, and for the enlargement and repair of several others in the counties of York, Stafford, Middlesex, and Essex, where considerable church accommodation was required. The report from the treasurer stated that the amount of outstanding grants was nearly £50,000, the sum in the society's hands being £42,696, showing a deficiency in the society's funds of £7,134.

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

The Belvoir hounds (formerly the Duke of Rutland's) have begun hunting in Leicestershire, and it is understood Lord Forester has consented to continue the management, about which difficulties had arisen, and it was thought this pack would be given up.

A TROTTING MATCH.—A match to drive in harness from the Elephant and Castle to Brighton, making the best of the way, for £50 a side, came off on Monday last, between Mr. S. Lawrence and Mr. T. Angel. The conditions were, that each party should ride his horse, and accordingly Mr. Lawrence rode Lord William, and Mr. Angel a well-known fast mare, called Black Bess. Mr. Lawrence was the winner. He did the distance in four hours and ten minutes, coming in about half an hour in advance of his opponent. Bets to a large amount were laid on the event.

A sale draft from the Earl of Harrington's valuable stud was brought to the hammer on Monday, at Tattersall's, by direction of the noble earl. The horses were few in number. The principal lot was his lordship's well-known roan gelding, driven for several seasons in the earl's well appointed cab, which, after a spirited competition, was knocked down to a Mr. Harvey for 190 guineas.

ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY.—On Wednesday a meeting of this society took place at the offices, Pall-mall, W. Yarrell, Esq., vice-president, in the chair, when several new species of shells and parrots, hitherto unknown to science, were produced, together with descriptive catalogues of several species of Chinese birds contained in the museum at Hyde Park-corner.

THE NIGER EXPEDITION.—The following account of the ill-fated Niger expedition, which is extracted from a letter dated Cape Coast Castle, September 26, 1842, will be read with much pain and disappointment by all parties in this country, but particularly by those philanthropic individuals who co-operated in advancing the scheme and entertained sanguine hopes of its success:—"The Wilberforce, with Will reconnoitre, was here by March last, at which time Captain W. Allen was preparing to reascend the Niger, to look after the 'Model Farm' people, and if possible to do something to retrieve the fame of the expedition. He proceeded hence to Fernando Po to fit out the Soudan to accompany him. While he was still lying there the late steamer arrived with orders from Government that only one steamer was to go up the river, and that she was only to have on board four or five white men at most. Her only object in going up was to be the bringing back the people left at the farm. On receiving these orders Captain Allen and most of his officers and crew went on board the Kite for a passage to England. The other commissioner (Cook) went home by the Golden Spring. The Wilberforce, under charge of her present commander (Lieutenant Webb), proceeded up the river, and found the 'Model Farm' in a most perfect model of disorganization. The blacks who had been left at it, having plenty of cowries (a species of Indian shell used as money), and goods, voted themselves to be independent country gentlemen, and managed to get hold of a lot of natives, whom they very coolly made slaves of, and whom they compelled to work on the farm, each gentleman being provided with a cat or slave-driver's whip, the better to enforce obedience. The model farmer himself (Carr, brother of the Chief Justice of Sierra Leone) has never been heard of, and had, as it afterwards appeared, been killed somewhere near the mouth of the river. The Wilberforce brought away farm implements, people and cattle, all those of the latter belonging to this place are now being discharged here. The steamer got on a rock in the river, where she remained five days, and came down with a hole in her bottom, which now compels her to go home. So much for the last speech and dying words of the far-famed Niger expedition. A more mismanaged piece of business from beginning to end is not, I will venture to say, to be found in any history."

PEACE WITH CHINA.—CAPTURE OF GHUZNEE AND CABUL.

The intelligence conveyed in the telegraphic despatches announcing the termination of the war in China, which we published in a third edition on Monday, was communicated by the French consul at Canton to the French consul at Alexandria, and from him to the foreign office agent at Marseilles. The telegraphic despatch did not contain the whole of the Chinese news, as it was interrupted in the midst of a paragraph by bad weather.

Misfortunes, it is said, never come singly, and successes, judging from recent experience, seem to be distinguished by the same characteristic. In Affghanistan, since the month for advance was issued by Lord Ellenborough, triumph has followed triumph in quick succession, and our gallant fortune has at length been consummated by the capture of Ghuznee and Cabul, and the total overthrow of the rebel cause; while in China the war has been brought to a sudden and unexpected termination by the compliance of the Emperor with our demands, and a treaty has been arranged by which compensation for our losses and expenses is guaranteed, a most important boon on the ensuing harvest open to British merchants, the island of Hong-Kong ceded to us in perpetuity, and the future form of official intercourse between the representatives of the two powers honourably and satisfactorily settled.

In consequence of instructions from the Governor-General, a steamer had been ordered for despatch to Suez about the middle of the present month, for the purpose of conveying to England without delay the concert of the news of our operations in the Caubul country, and that, in transmitting this information, we should also have to announce so important an event as the cessation of hostilities with China. Two pieces of intelligence of such moment as importance have, perhaps, never before been simultaneously despatched from the shores of India.

CHINA.

On the 11th October the Honourable Company's steam frigate Sesostris Commander Hornby, arrived at Bombay, bringing news from Nankin to the 31st August, and Hong Kong to the 10th September.

The last mail brought information, as our readers will recollect, of the capture of Woosung and Shanghae, in the Yang-tse-Keang, and of the destruction of numerous batteries and defences on the banks of the Woosung river; and it was stated that the fleet had proceeded towards Nankin for the purpose of commencing operations against that city.

The squadron set sail from Woosung on the 6th July, and on the 14th arrived opposite some batteries built on a range of hills commanding the river, from which a fire was opened on the leading ships. The guns were instantly silenced, and the whole of the defences destroyed. On the 20th the vessels anchored in front of the city of Chin-Keang-foo, which commands the entrance of the Grand Canal, and the next morning the troops were disembarked, and marched to the assault of the Chinese forces. Our force was directed to move against the enemy's camp, situated about three miles distant, where from 1500 to 3000 men, it was reported, were assembled; another was directed to co-operate with the garrison in cutting off the expected retreat of the Chinese from the camp to the city; while the third received instructions to occlude the northern wall of the town. The Chinese, after firing a few distant volleys, fled from the camp with precipitation, and dispersed over the country. The city itself, however, was manfully defended by the Tartar soldiers, who prolonged the contest for several hours with a desperate valour far surpassing the efforts of the Imperial troops, aided by a reinforcement of marines and seamen. At length opposition ceased, and for night fall the British were complete masters of the place. Chin-Keang-foo, like Amoy, was most fearfully terrified, and the city is in excellent repair. It is supposed the garrison consisted of not less than 3000 men, and of these about 1000, and 40 mandarins, were killed and wounded. "The Tartar governor," says Sir H. Pottinger, "retired to his house which he saw that all was lost, made his servants set it on fire, and sat in his chair till he was burned to death! His private secretary was found, the day after the assault, lashing himself to a post, on which he had carried the body and consumed the half-consumed remains of his master, who was worthy of such a death."

The list of casualties was heavy: three officers of the land force, and one of the navy, being killed, and nine of the former, and two of the latter, were wounded. 150 men of both services were killed and wounded.

LAND FORCE.

Killed Col. Driver, 6th M.N.I.; Capt. Colhnson, 89th R.I.; Lieut. Gibbons, H.M. 49th.

Wounded Lieut. Bernard, 18th R.I. (slight); Lieut. Badeley, H.M. 49th (dangerously); Lieut Grant, same regiment (slight); Major Warren, 55th Regiment (severely); Lieut Cadly, same regiment (severely); Capt. Johnson, Rifles (severely); Ensign Travers, 2nd M.N.I. (slight); Waddle, Madras Artillery (severely); Jamedar, 2nd M.N.I. (severely).

NAVY.

Killed Major Uniacke, Royal Marines.

Wounded—Lieut Crouch, Midshipman Lyons.

Leaving a strong garrison for the retention of Chin-Keang-foo, the fleet proceeded towards Nankin, which was about 40 miles distant, and arrived on the 6th of August, when preparations were immediately made for an attack on the city. A strong force, under the command of Major-General Lord Saltcun, was landed, and took up their position to the west of the town; and operations were about to be commenced, when a letter was sent off to the plenipotentiary, announcing that a truce, as certain high commissioners, specially delegated by the Emperor, and possessed of full powers to negotiate, were on their way to treat with us. The attack was, consequently, delayed, but the commissioners did not arrive till the 13th. Their names and rank are thus given:—

1. Kee Ying, of the royal family, and commander-in-chief of the Tartar troops at Canton.

2. Eleepoo, lieutenant-general of Shantung, [illegible] Keang-soo.

but degraded for liberating the prisoners [illegible]

3. Gin, a member of two governments [illegible] Keang-soo.

After several visits, and a good deal of discussion between the contracting powers, matters were arranged to their mutual satisfaction; and on the 29th of August the treaty was publicly signed on board her Majesty's ship Cornwallis, by Sir H. Pottinger and the three commissioners. Of this convention the following are the most important articles:

"1. Lasting peace and friendship between the two empires.

"2. China to pay twenty-one millions of dollars in the course of the present and three succeeding years.

"3. The ports of Canton, Amoy, Foo-chow-foo, Ningpo, and Shanghai, to be thrown open to British merchants, consular officers to be appointed to reside at them, and regular and just tariffs of import and export (as well as inland transit) duties to be established and published.

"4. The island of Hong-Kong to be ceded in perpetuity to her Britannic Majesty, her heirs and successors.

"5. All subjects of her Britannic Majesty (whether natives of Europe or India) who may be confined in any part of the Chinese empire to be unconditionally released.

"6. An act of full and entire amnesty to be published by the Emperor under his imperial sign manual and seal to all Chinese subjects, on account of their having held service or intercourse with, or resided under, the British Government or its officers.

"7. Correspondence to be conducted on terms of perfect equality amongst the officers of both Governments.

"8. On the Emperor's assenting received to this treaty, and the payment of the first instalment, 6,000,000 dollars, her Britannic Majesty's forces to retire from Nankin and the Grand Canal, and the military posts at Chinkiang-foo and Kiahkhiow, but the islands of Chusan and Kolangsoo not to be held until the money payments and the arrangements for opening the ports be completed."

It appears the Emperor at first objected to throw open the port of Foochow-foo, on the ground that, as this place was within 70 miles of the [illegible] of country where the black teas are grown, the English would take their interest here, instead of at Canton (which is 400 miles off), and consequently the trade of the latter place would be ruined. The plenipotentiary, however, refused to yield the point, and his Majesty was obliged ultimately to give way.

At the time the Sesostris left Nankin the mandarins appeared most anxious for our departure from this neighbourhood, and the 6,000,000 dollars required to be paid ere the expedition would be withdrawn were in the course of collection. Four millions, indeed, had been already tendered, as an instalment, but Sir H. Pottinger refused to receive anything less than the whole sum.

It will be observed that in no one provision of the treaty is there the slightest allusion to the opium trade—the actual cause of the war; and it is said, that, although the commissioners were very desirous of introducing some article on this point, Sir H. Pottinger refused to admit it, stating that the Chinese must impose restrictions on their own subjects if they wished to prohibit the traffic. Thus, recognised by neither power, the opium trade will henceforth be a system of dangerous but lucrative smuggling; and, doubtless, soon prove the source of fresh jealousies and misunderstandings with the Chinese. We can but regret that the question as to its lawfulness has not been finally set at rest.

Immediately after the signature of the treaty it was despatched to the Emperor for ratification, and, on its return, which was expected in about ten days, Major Malcolm was to convey it to England, viâ Suez, by the Hon Company's steamer Auckland.

At the time of the settlement of differences sickness had begun to appear extensively among the men both of the land and sea. Upwards of 100 belonging to the 98th Regiment had died

When the first instalment of the twenty-one millions of dollars is paid the troops return to Chusan. There are at present off Nankin her Majesty's ships Cornwallis, Blonde, Modeste, Childers, Clio, and Algerine; her Majesty's steamers Vixen and Driver; and the East India Company's steamers Auckland, Queen, Pluto, Phlegethon, and Medusa, which vessels retain their position until payment of the instalment.

The Tenasserim steamer was despatched to Calcutta with the tidings of peace and arrived safely on the 4th ult.

Her Majesty's ships Endymion, Calliope, and Dido, and the East India Company's steamer Pemerang, are stationed off the Great Canal. The steamer Nemesis was to proceed to Formosa to obtain the release of the captured crews of the Anne and Nerbudda.

At Hong-Kong there remain her Majesty's ships Blenheim, Wolverine, and Warspite, and the East India Company's steamers Memnon and Hooghly.

(From the Bengal Hurkaru, Oct. 4.)

The Honourable Company's steam-frigate Sesostris, Commander H. A. Ormsby, came in late last night, bringing the gratifying intelligence that the war in China is at an end. She is on her way to Bombay with the despatches of his Excellency Sir Henry Pottinger, who signed a treaty of peace between Great Britain and China on the 29th ult., on board her Majesty's ship Cornwallis.

The Sesostris left Nankin on the 31st August, and Hong-Kong on the 10th Sept. She has on board Commander Richards, R.N.; and Captain Whitingham, A.D.C., charged with despatches for England; Captain Murray, 18th Regiment, and Lieutenant Roberts, I.N., also came in her. The Sesostris proceeds to Bombay the moment she has got in coals.

The Tenasserim steamer left Nankin with the Sesostris, to convey the tidings of peace to Calcutta, and touched at Amoy: she was to leave Hong-Kong on the 11th; therefore need not be expected before to-morrow.

The following is Sir Henry Pottinger's circular, containing the heads of the treaty, and other intelligence:—

CIRCULAR.

TO HER BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S SUBJECTS IN CHINA.

Her Majesty's plenipotentiary, &c., &c., in China, has high satisfaction in promulgating, for the information of her Majesty's subjects in China, the important progress and success of the expedition, since the date of the last circular on the 24th of June.

The expedition was detained, by bad weather and other circumstances, at Woosung until the 6th of July, on which day it advanced up the river Yangtse-kiang, and on the 14th reached a military position built on a range of hi ls commanding the stream, where two small recently-erected batteries, mounting thirteen guns, opened the first fire since leaving Woosung on the leading ships, but were instantly silenced, and the guns, batteries, and military buildings, connected with them, destroyed as soon as men could be put on shore

At this point the main body of the fleet was retarded by adverse winds for nearly a week, during which period some of the ships of war, assisted by the steamers, got up to "Kinshan," or "Golden Island," where the whole armament, amounting to seventy sail of vessels, assembled on the 20th instant, and anchored abreast of the city of Chin-keang-foo.

A reconnaissance having been obtained the same evening, the troops were disembarked as early as possible the next morning. It was at this time believed that the major ty of the Chinese troops, which had been variously reported at from fifteen hundred to three thousand men, were in a camp, wh ch was visible from hills overhanging the river, at a distance of about three miles.

Against this camp the right brigade moved under Major-General Lord Saltoun. The centre brigade, led by Major-General Bartley, was directed in the first instance to co-operate with the right one, in cutting off the anticipated retreat of the fugitives from the camp in the direction of the city; and the left brigade, headed by Major General Schoedde, landed on the river face of the city, opposite the fleet, where it was instructed to escalade the northern wall; which the centre brigade was likewise appointed to do on the southern side, after it had performed the other duty assigned to it.

As Amoy will be one of the places open for British commerce, and to give our subscribers a better notion of it, we have been permitted to copy three admirable views of the place, drawn by Lieut. R. B. Crawford, R.N., and published by Messrs. Ackermann. We also subjoin the author's description of each:—

The above shows the Druid, Blonde, Modeste, and Bentinck, attacking the batteries on the island of Kolensoo; also the entrance into the harbour of Amoy, and the Hon. Company's steamer Sesostris throwing shells into the city; also points out the position taken by her Majesty's troops upon the heights above the city. A small trading junk is in the foreground.

We have represented the Wellesley, 72, carrying the admiral's flag, the Blenheim, 72, and Pylades, 18, attacking the long granite battery on Amoy Island, of 75 guns; the Hon. Company's steam-frigate Queen, on the left of the drawing, shelling the fleet: fishing boat in the foreground, &c.

And the above exhibits the Columbine and Cruiser, 16-gun sloops, covering the disembarkation of her Majesty's 49th and 18th Regiments, on the point of being landed from the steamers Phlegethon and Nemesis; some of the transports appear in the offing, with a small trading junk in the foreground.

The Chinese troops in the camp did not venture to stand the near approach of our men, but, after firing three or four volleys from their jingalls and matchlocks, took to flight and dispersed all over the country, which was hilly and covered with the jungle. By this time the left brigade had got on shore, when it became obvious that the Tartar garrison intended to defend the city, from the walls of which they opened a heavy and incessant fire of cannon, jingalls, rockets, and matchlocks.

As the left brigade moved from the landing-place, the Auckland (steam-frigate), which had been placed in position for the purpose, threw some shells amongst the enemy on the works with admirable precision, but was obliged to cease firing, owing to the rapid advance of the brigade to the bottom of the wall, which was most gallantly escaladed under a heavy fire from the Tartar troops, who behaved with great spirit, and disputed every inch of the ramparts, availing themselves with great tact of their knowledge of the localities, to gall our, and screen their own, troops

The centre brigade got into the city after some delay in finding a bridge across the Grand Canal, which runs along the western side of Chin-Keang-foo, and separates the walled city from very extensive suburbs) by blowing open one of the gates; but even after the left brigade had received this large reinforcement, besides parties of marines and seamen, who were landed the moment the opposition promised to be so stubborn, the Tartars manfully prolonged the contest for some hours; and it was late in the afternoon before they entirely disappeared, which it is surmised the survivors did, by throwing away their arms and uniform, and either hiding themselves till night enabled them to escape, or else mingling with the other inhabitants.

The city of Chin Keang-foo is rather more than four miles in circumference, the works are in excellent repair, and the parapet, which is so thick and solid that nothing but cannon shot could have made any impression on it, is pierced with narrow embrasures and loopholes, and flanked at a variety of spots with transverse walls.

It has hitherto been impossible to obtain anything like a precise return of the strength of the garrison, but from calculations made with reference to the extent of the works, and the Tartar troops seen on them at the same moment, it is thought there could not have been less than 3000 men. Of these it is said that 40 mandarins, officers, and 1600 men were killed and wounded. The Tartar general commanding-in-chief retired to his house when he saw that all was lost, made his servants set it on fire, and sat on his charger till he was burned to death. His private secretary was found the day after the assault hidden in a garden, and on being carried to the spot recognised the half-consumed remains of his master, who was worthy of such a death

It will be readily understood that a brilliant service, of which the preceding detail gives but a very feeble outline, could not be performed without loss on our side; and her Majesty's plenipotentiary is sure that all her Majesty's subjects in China will participate in his feelings of sincere regret at the annexed returns of casualties in killed and wounded in her Majesty's combined forces.

Arrangements are in progress for placing a strong British garrison at Chin Keang-foo (which commands the entrance to the Grand Canal, and is therefore of vast importance), and the remainder of the expedition will shortly move up this majestic river, headed by the admiral's flag-ship Cornwallis, to the neighbourhood of Nankin (which ancient capital of the empire is about forty miles distant, and situated about three miles from Yang tse-Keang, with which it is connected by a variety of canals), it having already been ascertained by actual survey that there is ample depth of water, and no natural impediments.

GOD SAVE THE QUEEN.

Dated on board the steam-frigate Queen, Yang-tse-Kiang river, at Chin-Keang-foo, this 24th day of July, 1842.

HENRY POTTINGER,
Her Majesty's Plenipotentiary.

The payment of the money due by the Chinese is, it is stated, to be effected in the following manner:—Immediate payment, 6,000,000; in 1843, 6,000,000; in 1844, 5,000,000; in 1845, 4,000,000.

The following description of the storming and capture of Tcheang Keang, on the 21st, by an eye-witness, will be found interesting:—

"The ladders were planted with magical rapidity, and the grenadier company of the 55th (who were, perfectly speaking, the forlorn hope) commenced their dangerous ascent under cover of a close fire from the rifles, who were stretched on their fronts on the face of the hill, picking off every man who showed himself at the embrasures; from which, however, the enemy kept up a very deadly fire for some minutes, and a good many of our men fell dead and wounded. The first man who reached the top of the wall was Lieutenant Cuddy, of the grenadier company of the 55th. He behaved with matchless gallantry; slowly, but firmly, he climbed the ladder. On reaching the top he waved his sword, and then deliberately seated himself on the wall, and assisted his men over. At this moment the anxiety and interest which was felt by every one for his safety who witnessed his daring conduct was intense. I could scarcely breathe. It was more than miraculous that he was not shot dead, or hurled from the wall: it was like a man jumping into his own coffin. He was severely wounded in the foot by a jingall ball while on the wall, which disabled him for the rest of the day. In about a quarter of an hour the ensign of England and the colours of the 55th were shown from the fleet; but, though the colours were shown, the place was by no means taken. On the contrary, they had the greatest difficulty in driving the enemy from the walls. The Tartars fought with great bravery, made repeated charges on our men with their long spears, and disputed every inch of ground. The British bayonet, however, at length prevailed. The day before the battle it was thought that not more than 1000 or 1200 Tartar soldiers were in the town. It is now believed that there must have been nearer 3000. Well was it for us that our force was superior to this, otherwise we might have been taken by surprise, and no saying what the consequences might have been.

"It is discipline, not courage, that the enemy want. Instances of the most desperate and devoted bravery were common throughout the day; and some of their leaders, in particular, when they found that the day was against them, were observed to spur their horses against our bayonets, and thus court their death.

"I walked through a part of the town next day with an escort. It was almost entirely deserted, at least no further resistance was offered by its now terror-stricken inhabitants. I need not say that the most disgusting sights met the eye at every step. The dead and wounded of the enemy (although most of them had been carried away) were lying about in all directions, no attention whatever being paid to the latter. Already had the houses and shops been broken open, and the most valuable property (as teas, balas of silk, furs, &c.) was scattered about like rubbish. All the houses which were supposed to have any connection with Government or Government officers were either burnt or being burnt. As at other places we have taken from the Chinese, suicides were committed to a fearful extent—men, women, and children were found strangled, or taken out of the wells by dozens. But why dwell on scenes so repulsive?—scenes at which humanity should blush; but which are the too frequent and unavoidable concomitants of war!

"One mandarin, besides a good many persons of lower rank, are on board the flag-ship.

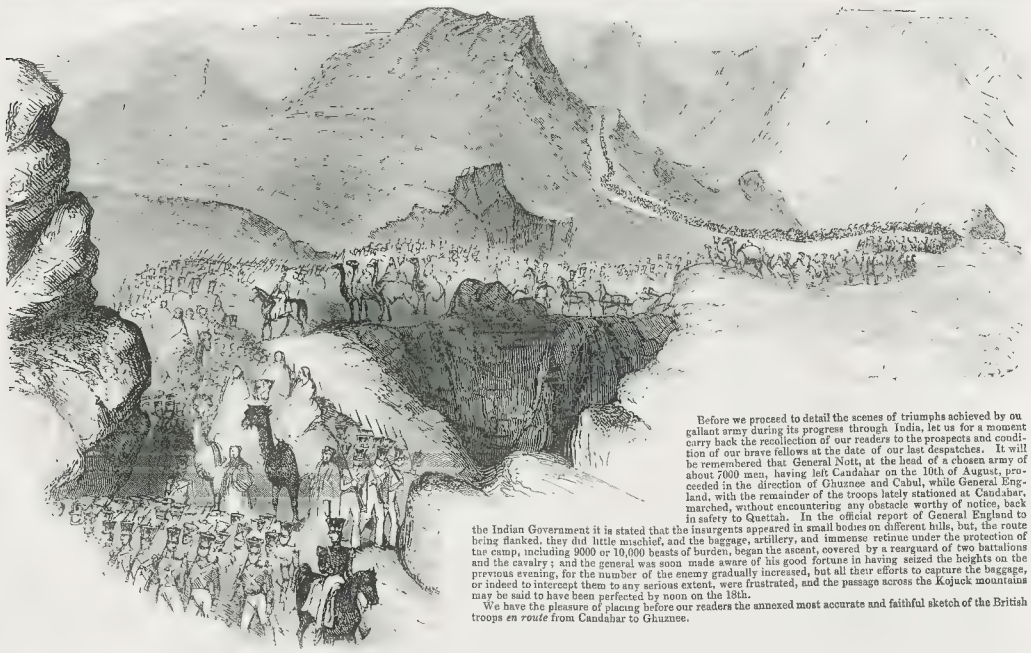
"The natives are very kind to us, and have been so all along. They occasionally bring us presents of vegetables, &c. Their vegetables are very fine. They have excellent brinjals, French beans, celery, cucumbers, &c., for these they won't take payment, unless it be a bit of paper with 'British protection' written upon it, which they are all very glad to get.

"A great many cases of coup-de-soleil occurred during the day of battle. The heat was great, though nothing to what it is in some parts of India. Colonel Driver, of the 6th Madras Native Infantry, and Major Unacke, of the Royal Marines, died from this cause; but the 98th suffered most, having lost about twenty men: this was probably owing to their having been on board ship on salt provisions for seven months, and to their being fresh from England.

"The country on the western bank of the river is in some parts picturesque and beautiful; that on the eastern bank is a dead flat, and, as it is marshy, I fear we shall have a good deal of fever. Should we winter at Nankin, as is expected, we are in hopes of being able to establish a bazaar, and to have an abundant supply of fresh provisions: they have very fine poultry."

HONG-KONG.—(From the Friend of China, Sept. 1.)—Among the troops stationed at Chekehu, on the other side of the island, much sickness has prevailed during the past few weeks, and several have died. We regret to have to announce the death of Ensign De Quincy, belonging to the Chekehu detachment, her Majesty's 18th Regiment. Ensign De Quincy was the son of the author of that singular and celebrated work entitled the "Confessions of an English Opium eater." We omitted to mention the lamented demise of Dr. Brace, also of the 26th Regiment, which took place a week or two ago, at the Western Barracks, on this side of the island.

GROUP OF ASIATIC ARMS.



SKETCH OF THE BRITISH TROOPS EN ROUTE FROM CANDAHAR TO GHUZNEE.

Before we proceed to detail the scenes of triumphs achieved by our gallant army during its progress through India, let us for a moment carry back the recollection of our readers to the prospects and condition of our brave fellows at the date of our last despatches. It will be remembered that General Nott, at the head of a chosen army of about 7000 men, having left Candahar on the 10th of August, proceeded in the direction of Ghuznee and Cabul, while General England, with the remainder of the troops lately stationed at Candahar, marched, without encountering any obstacle worthy of notice, back in safety to Quettah. In the official report of General England to the Indian Government it is stated that the insurgents appeared in small bodies on different hills, but, the route being flanked, they did little mischief, and the baggage, artillery, and immense retinue under the protection of the camp, including 9000 or 10,000 beasts of burden, began the ascent, covered by a rearguard of two battalions and the cavalry; and the general was soon made aware of his good fortune in having seized the heights on the previous evening, for the number of the enemy gradually increased, but all their efforts to capture the baggage, or indeed to intercept them to any serious extent, were frustrated, and the passage across the Kojuck mountains may be said to have been perfected by noon on the 18th.

We have the pleasure of placing before our readers the annexed most accurate and faithful sketch of the British troops en route from Candahar to Ghuznee.

INDIA.

The report of General Nott's victory over Shumshoodeen Khan, in the neighbourhood of Ghuznee, which was current at the date of our last advices, has turned out correct. The engagement took place on the 30th August, at a place about 38 miles from the city, and was a gallant and well-contested fight.

Two days previously a body of the enemy had attacked the rearguard of our force, but were defeated and dispersed by a detachment of cavalry under Captain Christie, and about 50 of their number cut up.

Nothing daunted by this trifling reverse, Shumshoodeen moved out with nearly the whole of his army, amounting to not less than 12,000 men, and arrived in the neighbourhood of the British camp about three o'clock on the afternoon of the 30th.

"I moved out," says General Nott, "with one half of my force; the enemy advanced in the most bold and gallant manner, each division cheering as they came into position, their left being upon a hill of some elevation, their centre and right along a low ridge until their flank rested on a fort filled with men; they opened a fire of small arms, supported by two six-pounder horse artillery guns, which were admirably served; our columns advanced upon the different points with great regularity and steadiness, and, after a short and spirited contest, completely defeated the enemy, capturing their guns, tents, ammunition, &c., and dispersing them in every direction. One hour's more daylight would have enabled me to destroy the whole of their infantry. Shumshoodeen fled in the direction of Ghuznee, accompanied by about 30 horsemen."

In the above action, and the engagement on the preceding day, our casualties amounted to 104 killed and wounded. The following are the names of the officers included in this list:

KILLED.—Capt. Burr, 3d Regiment of Bombay Light Cavalry; Brevet Capt. G. O. Reeves, same regiment.

WOUNDED.—Brevet Capt. G. O. S. Ravenscroft, same regiment; Lieut. T. A. Mackenzie, do.; Lieut. Meason, H.M. 40th Regt. of Foot; Lieut. A. B. Chamberlain, Christie's Horse.

On the 1st September General Nott advanced from Gonine (where the battle took place), and continued his march to Ghuznee. He arrived on the 5th, and invested the city, which was strongly garrisoned, while the hills to the north-eastward swarmed with soldiery. These heights were the first object of attack, and, after considerable opposition, they were effectually cleared. Preparations were then made for an attack on the fortress, but, before our batteries could be opened, the enemy abandoned it, and left us once more complete masters of Ghuznee. Our flags were then hoisted in triumph on the fortress.

The loss sustained by our troops amounted to no more than three killed and 43 wounded.

Ghuznee is now a desolate heap of ruins. Its splendid citadel and other formidable works and defences have been razed to the ground. The 27th Native Infantry, which had been cooped up here from 1st December to 1st March, when they surrendered, were at one time believed to have been slaughtered. Their European officers had, just before General Nott's advance, been transferred to Cabul; and 327 of the Sepoys, said to have been sold to slavery, and constituting about three parts of the whole that were missing, were recovered. These were formerly said to have been put to death with terrible torture; one reason of our advance being to avenge their slaughter!

The information is, so far as it extends, perfectly authentic; but is in the last degree meagre and fragmentary—the official despatches being characterised by anything but copiousness or lucidity.

The force was to leave about the 9th or 10th September, and would join General Pollock at Cabul on the 17th or 18th.

General Pollock reached Shorkah in one march, and left on the 8th September in progress to Jugdulluck. On reaching the hills which command the road, through the pass, the enemy were found strongly posted, and in considerable numbers.

The following is General Pollock's own description of this important engagement:—

"The enemy were assembled in bodies apparently under different chieftains, each having a distinguishing standard.

"The hills they occupied formed an amphitheatre inclining towards the left of the road on which the troops were halted while the guns opened, and the enemy were thus enabled on this point to fire into the column, a deep ravine preventing any contact with them. The practice of the guns was excellent, yet the enemy appeared so determined on making a stand, that the bursting of the shells among them on the right hill, which was of a conical shape and difficult ascent, had not the effect of making them relinquish it, or of slackening their fire, which now became heavy from all parts of their position, causing several casualties.

"It is with the deepest feelings of regret I have to deplore the loss of Captain Nugent, officiating Sub-Assistant Commissary-General, who was shot here, and died almost immediately. I had lately received the most important and valuable assistance from him; the service has lost a promising officer, and the department to which he belonged a most efficient member.

"As the guns appeared to have little effect in forcing the enemy to quit the heights, I resolved upon attacking them; for this purpose Captain Broadfoot was detached to the extreme left of the enemy's position, and his sappers commenced ascending a steep hill, on the top of which the enemy were entrenched in a sungan. Her Majesty's 9th Foot, under Lieutenant-Colonel Taylor, were directed to cross a deep ravine and assault the hills on the opposite side, where the enemy held a ruined fort, and were, with their chiefs and cavalry, in considerable numbers. Her Majesty's 13th Light Infantry, led by Captain Wilkinson, commanding the regiment, attacked the hill which may be considered the key of the position. The 9th, accompanied by two companies of the 35th N.I., under Lieutenants [illegible] Trench; and the 13th by 130 men of the 26th, led by Captain Gahan (Major Huish, who, although present in the field, was prevented by his wound, received at Mamoo Kheil, from assuming the command), rushed up the height simultaneously, and the animated and enthusiastic cheer they gave seemed to strike a panic into the enemy, for they dared not wait the collision, but fled down the hills, and were enabled to escape chastisement by the nature of the ground, which was so well calculated to favour their retreat. At this moment Major Lockwood, with her Majesty's 3d Light Dragoons, galloped up, and very nearly succeeded in overtaking the enemy's cavalry, but I am sorry to say they also effected their safety by flight.

"Captain Broadfoot had completely succeeded in the attack he made, and the enemy were dispersed in every direction, a large body of them retiring to the summit of a high mountain. On this apparently inaccessible height they planted their standards, and showed every demonstration of maintaining it. As the achievements of the day would have been incomplete were they suffered to remain, I decided upon dislodging them. The troops named in the margin (viz., her Majesty's 13th Light Infantry, one company 26th Native Infantry, one ditto 35th Light Infantry, 5th company Sappers under Lieut. Becher, and Broadfoot's Sappers) advanced under cover of Captain Abbott's guns, and those of Captain Backhouse's mountain train. Seldom have soldiers had a more arduous task to perform, and never was an undertaking of the kind surpassed in execution; these lofty heights were assaulted in two columns, led by Captains Wilkinson and Broadfoot; the discomfited Ghilzies, not relishing an encounter, betook themselves to flight, carrying away their standards, and leaving our troops in quiet possession of their last and least assailable stronghold."

In this action several of the most influential Affghan chiefs were engaged; and the total amount of the force brought forward to oppose us is estimated by General Pollock at from 4000 to 5000 men. Our loss was rather heavy. Captain Nugent, the Sub-Assistant Commissary-General, being killed, and Major-General Sale slightly wounded; and 62 men killed and wounded.

General Pollock proceeded onwards, and does not appear to have encountered any further opposition until his arrival, on the 13th of September, in the Tezeen Valley, where an army of 16,000 men, commanded by Mahomed Akbkar Khan in person, was assembled to meet him. The following account of this brilliant affair is from a private letter, the authenticity of which may be relied on:—

"During the 12th, at Tezeen, the enemy twice appeared to be collecting in greater force than before, and on the afternoon, when one of our outposts was running to camp, they followed up and became so daring that I was obliged to order out the 9th. They went to work beautifully; soon drove the fellows up the hills, and followed, which the enemy did not expect, and the 9th, running upon them unawares, fixed bayonets; but the fellows ran down the hill. The 9th fired upon them, and killed about 20, who rolled to the bottom; others were killed by individuals, as one by Elmhirst, of the 9th. It became dark, and the party returned, and we all thought they would be quite satisfied and leave us alone; but not so, they were a little stronger than we thought. About eight P.M. they commenced attacking our picquets, and I hardly slept a wink, for they were firing all night; and in the morning we had to go through the Tezeen Pass. I had taken every precaution. Very soon after we entered it firing commenced. I left two squadrons of dragoons and two guns at the mouth of the pass to fall upon the enemy if they made any attempt, which they did; and the dragoons and other cavalry paid them off their old scores, killing a number. I was with the advance. Every place appeared covered with the enemy: in front they had also a number of horse, and they fought really well, actually coming up to the Europeans' bayonets. I then suspected Akhbar Khan must be present, and so it turned out. He had with him Mahomed Shah Khan and Aumunoola, with many other chiefs. The amount of his whole force was 16,000 men (he said 20,000), and among them were his best Jezailchees. We hunted them from post to post, as we did in the Khyber, and retained possession of the heights. We at length got complete possession of the pass. We reached the Haft Kotul, when Lieut. Cunningham, of the Sappers, pushed on, and captured a 24-pounder howitzer, but they had taken away the bullocks. I then heard they had carried off another gun not far ahead. I despatched a squadron of dragoons, and two Hon. Artillery guns, after the gun in advance; and, after a gallop of two miles, they came up with it and the bullocks for both guns, and again cut up a great number of the enemy. They (the dragoons) continued the pursuit; and, on another plain, overtook more of the enemy, and cut up about twenty. Altogether the enemy must have lost several hundreds. They stood well, as if they knew it was Akbbar's last stake; and, though it was performed by my army, it was a very brilliant thing. The enemy did not get a particle of baggage."

Our loss was 32 killed and 130 wounded. The names of Capt. Lushington, of her Majesty's 9th; Captain Geils, of the 60th N.I.; Lieut. Norman, 35th Light Infantry; and Lieut. Montgomery, of the 60th N.I., are among the list of the latter. Akbbar Khan fled in the direction of Bameean.

On the day following the engagement the General advanced to Boodkhak; on the next he encamped on the race-course at Cabul; and the 16th witnessed his triumphant entry into the citadel, and the planting of our colours on Balla Hissar

The city was nuh deserted. The prisoners who had been left there on the removal of their companions to Bameean were restored to us by the Kuzzilbashes. They consisted of Mrs. Trevor and eight children, Captain and Mrs. Anderson and three children, Captain Troup, and Dr. Campbell. It would appear that the captives who were taken to Bameean are not now in the custody of Mahomed Akbbar, as the defeat of the latter confirms them. Pollock appeared to entertain a confident expectation of obtaining their release in eight or ten days; while Captain Bygrave, who had been carried off by the Shrdar, was thought likely to be recovered at present. Lieut. Sir Richmond Shakspear had proceeded in search of them, at the head of 700 Kuzzilbashes.

The arrival of General Nott was daily looked for; and on the junction of the two armies it is said they would return to India with as little delay as possible. There seems no probability of our re-occupying Cabul; as soon as the prisoners are all recovered we shall not delay to retire, after completing the work of retribution by the destruction of the city.

A great deal of discussion has at different times arisen on the subject of the national character of the Affghans; the present retirement of Sepoys praises on the treacherous assassins of Cabul, and vehemently proclaiming their patriotism—their valour—and their kindness to the captives; while other writers repudiated the pretensions so discreditable, pointed our enemies in their true colours, and denounced with honest indignation their abominable crimes. The correctness of these latter views has been proved on numberless occasions; and we have now yet stronger and more fearful confirmation of their truth in the fact, that the whole of the Sepoys of the 37th N.I., who were released at Ghuznee, had been reduced to slavery by the Affghans!

MISCELLANEOUS.

Our accounts from Scinde are not of much importance, relating chiefly to the movements of General England's force, now on its return to India, one detachment of which, under Major Reid, left Quettah on the 10th and reached Dadur on the 19th September, while the second division Scoudi proceed through the Bolan Pass on the 21st. The country is described as perfectly tranquil. Cholera prevails to a great extent among the troops at Kurachee.

Boondelkund is still in rather a disturbed state; but no fresh collision of any importance appears to have occurred with the rebels.

The most interesting item of the intelligence from Simla is, that Lord Ellenborough has ordered the construction of the great Doab Canal, which was suspended on his arrival, to be immediately proceeded with. Two lacs of rupees (£30,000) per annum have been set apart for this work.

Lieut.-Colonel Low has resigned the Residency of Lucknow, and Major-General Nott, the new "hero of Ghuznee," has been appointed by the Governor-General to succeed to this lucrative office.

Major General Pollock, who may as appropriately be designated the "hero of Cabul," has been appointed to the general staff of the army, in succession to the late Major-General Penny.

Colonel Palmer, it seems, is not dead, but was taken to Cabul, and thence, with the other prisoners, to Bameean. The story of his having been tortured, while in Ghuznee, has been confirmed by the Sepoys.

The sandal-wood gates of Mahomed's mausoleum have been carried off from Ghuznee to General Nott, at the express desire of Lord Ellenborough.

We have nothing of importance from Bombay since the announcement of the arrival of the Marquis of Tweedsale, and his assumption of the government, and the departure of his predecessor.

Our Bombay local news is unimportant. The burning of the ship Monarch, on the 29th September, by the Lascars (as it is believed) on board of her, is the chief item. The suspected parties have been lodged in gaol. The vessel was bound from Bombay to Calcutta.

POSTSCRIPT.

The Delhi Gazette mentions the receipt of letters from Kurnaul, to the effect that a communication had been received there intimating the recovery of the whole of the prisoners excepting Captain Bygrave. This report does not seem to be worthy of implicit credit.

It was said a force would be despatched for the prisoners, in addition to the Kuzzilbashes sent off instantly on Gen. Pollock's arrival at Cabul.

A letter from Cabul, dated the 16th of September, says, "General Nott had arrived, and formed his camp about five miles from ours (General Pollock's) in the Ghuznee road. He sent Colonel and Major Thewardin, the political employé, with despatches, and respects to General Pollock, and on the following morning (17th) General Nott's force will move opposite to Cabul."

All is quiet at Jellalabad and Candahar, but robberies are frequent in the neighbourhood of the Khybar Pass.

The following extract from a Jellalabad letter of the 30th September will be perused with melancholy interest:

"On Sunday last seven officers and about twelve artillerymen, with some of Thomas's Khyburees, went as far as the hill, three miles on the other side of Gundamuck, where it is said the 54th, and some of the Artillery and 5th Cavalry, made their last stand, for the purpose of burying the bodies exposed to public gaze. They buried (within a square made of stones) 103 bodies, and covered them over with stones. On Sunday morning another party was sent out, who found and buried 70 men, so that 272 skeletons have at length been lodged in their earthly tenement."

Calcutta journals have been received to the 8th inst. The Tenasserim steamer arrived on the 4th from China, with intelligence of the settlement of our differences with the Celestial empire.

The Englishman of the 4th says, "We are happy to inform our Hurkuru contemporary that Lord Ellenborough has determined on hanging Akbbar Khan on bringing home to him the murder of Sir William M'Naghten!"

Ceylon papers to the 30th of September, and Madras to the 8th of October, have come to hand, but contain nothing of importance.

OFFICIAL DESPATCHES FROM GENERALS POLLOCK AND NOTT.

Head-quarters, Simla, 21st Sept., 1842. Political Department.

The governor-general has this day received the reports of three victories obtained, on the 30th of August, over 12,000 Affghans, 38 miles south-west of Ghuznee; on the 8th of September, by Major-General Pollock, over the troops of Mahomed Akbbar Khan and Ghilzie chiefs at Jugdulluck; and on the 16th of June, by the expedition on the coast of China, within the mouth of the river Yang tse Keang, at the city of Woosung.

In this last operation, and those immediately preceding it, Vice-Admiral Sir W. Parker and Lieut.-General Sir Hugh Gough took 364 guns from the Chinese.

On the 3d of September Major-General Nott had advanced to Nanee, a short march off Ghuznee.

On the 9th of September Major-General Pollock had advanced to Kutta Sung, and had encamped on the race-ground.

Formed as the troops under Major General Nott have mostly been by four years of constant service, and habituated as they have been to victory under their able commander, the governor-general had anticipated their success against any force which could be brought against them. It is to the governor-general a subject of sincere satisfaction that the events of the campaign should have opened a new career field to that brave army on which it may make manifest to the world the high qualities he has so long known it to possess.

Major-General Pollock has, through the prudence of his arrangements, and the correctness of the movements directed by him, had the gratification of affording to his troops the opportunity of proving their superiority to the Affghans on the very scene of the late disaster on the retreat from Cabul; and Major-General Sir R. Sale, at the head of the garrison of Jellalabad, worthily supported by the reinforcements from India, has had the glory of leading the army on its triumphant return to the capital of Affghanistan.

The governor-general regards with the highest admiration the noble ardour which has in these several operations been manifested, equally by the officers and soldiers of both nations and of all arms. He sees, in the successes already obtained, the certain promise of other more decisive victories calculated to impress upon all the enemies of the British Government a conviction of the futility of resistance to the force under his direction, and tending, under the continued favour of Providence, to effect the first object of his desire, the restoration of peace to Asia.

By order of the Right Hon. the Governor-General of India,

Secretary to the Government of India, with the Governor-General.

GENERAL ORDERS. Simla, Sept. 30, 1842.

The governor-general announces to the army and to the people of India the occupation of Ghuznee by Major-General Nott, on the 6th of September, and its entire destruction by the Candahar division of the army. Major-General Nott had the satisfaction of releasing in the neighbourhood of Ghuznee, 337 Sepoys of the 27th Bengal N.I. from the slavery to which they had been reduced by the Affghans.

The governor-general likewise announces the complete defeat of Mahomed Akbbar Khan, at the head of 16,000 men, at Tezeen, on the 13th of September, by Major-General Pollock, and the occupation of Cabul by the troops under that general on the 16th of September. The British flag waves in triumph from the highest point of the Bala Hissar

Thus have all past disasters been retrieved and avenged on every scene on which they were sustained; and repeated victories in the field, and the capture of the cities and citadels of Ghuznee and Cabul, have advanced the glory and established the accustomed superiority of the British arms.

The report of Major-General Pollock leads the governor-general to expect that long before this day all the British prisoners taken by the Affghans will have been brought into the general's camp; those who had been left near Cabul were already at liberty.

The governor-general, in the name of the Government and of all the people of India, offers to Major-General Pollock and Major-General Nott, and all the officers and troops under their respective commands, his grateful and heartfelt acknowledgments of the important services they have performed.

The governor-general has derived much satisfaction from the report made by General Pollock of the admirable conduct of the troops of his highness the Maharajah shere Sing, acting in co-operation with the British army. The governor-general rejoices in this new proof of the cordial good understanding which prevails between the British Government and that of Lahore.

On the 14th Major-General Pollock advanced to Boodkhak; on the 15th he encamped on the race-course at Cabul; and on the 16th he took possession of the Balla Hissar, planting our standard on the citadel walls.

Sir R. Shakspear, with 700 Kuzzilbashes, had proceeded to Bameean in search of the prisoners.

The governor-general directs that the recent successes obtained by the armies in Affghanistan be fully made known to all the troops, at all the stations of the army, and that at all those stations a salute of 21 guns be fired for the capture of Ghuznee, and a similar salute for the capture of Cabul.

By order of the Right Hon. the Governor-General of India,
(Signed) T. H. MADDOCK,
Secretary to the Government of India, with the Governor-General.

The subjoined official document will be perused by the British public with the liveliest gratification. It announces the liberation of Lady Sale, and her companions in captivity, who are at length, after a cruel separation, restored to their friends:—

SUPPLEMENT TO THE GOVERNMENT GAZETTE EXTRAORDINARY OF THE 30TH SEPTEMBER, 1842.

(Head quarters, Simla, Oct. 5, 1842.

Since the public notification of the 30th ult. the governor general has received the gratifying intelligence of the safety of all the European prisoners but one, in the following extract from a communication from Major-General Pollock, C.B., dated the 21st ult.

Extract from a letter to the governor-general from Major-General Pollock, C.B., dated Jung Jehal, Sept. 21, 1842:—

"My Lord,—It gives me great gratification to be enabled to state that the whole of the European prisoners are now quite free from the hands of Mohomed Akbbar, except Captain Bygrave. I will make my official report on the subject whenever they reach my camp, which no doubt will be to-morrow. I sent a lightly-equipped force under Sir R. Sale to meet them, and the whole of the party is with him, with the following exceptions, who have already reached my camp:—

"Major Pottinger and Captain Johnson, arrived this morning; Mrs. Trevor and eight children; Captain and Mrs. Anderson and three children; Captain Troup and Dr. Campbell; one European woman and four privates."

By order of the Right Hon. the Governor-General of India,

Secretary to the Government of India, with the Governor-General.

THE COLOSSEUM PRINT.

We have now to call the attention of our readers and subscribers to the promised prospectus of our Colosseum Print—a superb and original work of art, produced upon the grandest scale—which we pledged ourselves to present to all the readers of the

who should have punctually subscribed to the paper during the first six months of its existence. The press issues which we have achieved now enables us to go to an extent of enterprise that we are sure will more than crown the highest expectations of the public.

THE COLOSSEUM PRINT

derived its title, in the first instance, from an intention of presenting a magnificent engraving of LONDON AT ONE VIEW—to reflect, as it were, a stellar grand picture to that so long exhibited at the Colosseum. The better taste, however, of our artists and advisers reminded us that we should thus exclude that wondrous leviathan of our metropolitan architecture,

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL

and to this important omission was added a suggestion that a much finer field of view may not unjustly be called "Panoramic"—was presentable from another point eminence of London, which is, however, required official authority to obtain access to the

by the generous and nobly-granted permission of General Maitland, for himself and his successors, who thus confirm the Colosseum right that stimulated our proprietors to a degree of exertion which they hope will prove worthy of the signal mark of favour they have received. Their

which will really be, in its proportionate dimensions, what the term "Colossal" is in reference to size, will then present two

ORIGINAL ASPECTS OF LONDON.

The upper or south view will comprise all that magnificent sweep of picturesque objects which are strewed from either bank of the Thames, as far as they are visible on the right, to beyond the Tower of London, with its adjacent forests of shipping on the left. The splendid range of manufactories which mark the river's course from the Surrey distance to the gazer's eye, until they are closed with, and screened by, the venerable Abbey of Westminster, at once, with its solemn enormous grandeur, absorbing mind and sight. But that fine passage of contemplation over, and away travels the eye, using as it were a kind of memory to bring present the old familiar features of the "City of the World." Look at the beautiful range of bridges spanning that river, which, though its waters are but silver, has been designated, for their burthen, the "river of gold." Mark the long lines of streets, the grand public buildings, the spires of old and new churches pointing to the sky, the Monument, the ancient and fort-like Tower, and "and all and above all, the eternal grandeur of St. Paul's! And these objects are so woven into the picture, that they are not parts of a confused mass, but prominent beauties of such a clear and well-defined architectural panorama as was never before embodied in the forms of art.

THE LOWER OR NORTH VIEW

turns the gazer upon a still more broad and open district of the metropolis. It stretches over the beautiful Parks; includes the Royal Palaces and mansions of our nobility; wends in the finest manner in the world, Regent-street, Piccadilly, Portland-place, Whitehall, Trafalgar-square, and the superb gathering of aristocratic clubs; and, in a word, concentrates within its focus all the palatial magnificence of wealth in contrast with the stir, and cold grandeur of its commercial aspect; endless wealth-accumulation on the one hand, and on the other an expenditure whose lavishness might startle kings.

Such are the two sections of the DESIRABLE PROSPECTUS which we are about to present in all good-will to our readers, and now the only other points to be noted with it which we wish to impress upon their attention are

ITS UNDOUBTED FIDELITY AND TRUTH

It is, in plain terms, a Mirror of the Metropolis, and for its perfection we are indebted to the light of the sun

M. Claudet was expressly commissioned by us to construct a Daguerreotype apparatus, whereby we have obtained a series of views—but not mere "impressions of the city itself," with all the niceties of perspective preserved, and an accuracy of detail never before equalled in panoramic art.

NOTICE.

THE COLOSSEUM PRINT will be ready on New Year's Eve, when all persons will be entitled to receive it who have subscribed for six months from the commencement of the paper, or for six months previous to the publication of the print, or who pay a six months' subscription in advance from the time of the issue of the plate. This is the definite and determined answer to all correspondents who have addressed us on the subject, and is a general guide to the public at large. The engraving is upon so grand and magnificent a scale, that it cannot be finished and delivered in sufficient number printed before the time appointed for publication. Our subscribers have already so increased that the time requisite for printing becomes most important, and any delay that has arisen is attributable only to the necessity for such careful and deliberate arrangement as will make disappointment next to impossible.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"John Ingram."—Yes.

"S.," Plymouth, is entitled to it. But really we wish our correspondents on the subject of the Colosseum Print would take the trouble to refer to the engraving in the number of the paper.

"W. R.," Dunstan.—It shall appear in our next.

The writer from Kingsland-road about the "high chimney," should consult a professional man.

"T. B."—The postman will do.

We have no room for the suggestion of "An early Subscriber."

"C. Conolly," Newsman, Brighton.—Certainly, if they have taken it for six months, or subscribe to you to do so. Ditto to his newsmake of Dublin.

"An old Man-of-War's Man."—His letter is very creditable. No doubt the impositions of retail bakers are in many cases intolerable, and in none worse than in that which he describes. We promise him to keep an eye generally upon their tricks of trade which affect the pittance of the poor.

"H. F.," Melksham.—Yes, to both questions. The subscription is thirteen shillings.

"G. H. Johnson," Southampton. -We fear we cannot yet make the suggestion available.

"Ellhistone."—The novel will certainly appear. To both the other queries—Yes.

"Scopas."—We have not the drawing.

A correspondent sends us the following—"Shot by Mr. John Lucas of Redmond Park, on the 14th of November, a large brown eagle, measuring nine feet from the tip of one wing to the other."

"W. Johnson."—Apply in the first instance to the school for the official forms and information, which the secretary will doubtless supply. Then get a list of go erners or directors, and see what personal influence you or your friends may have with any of them; or, if the merits of your case are strong enough in themselves, forward an authenticated statement and application. We believe the children are admitted by election; if so, canvas the electors with industry and spirit whenever a vacancy occurs. A certain amount of subscription will perhaps make a governor or give a presentation.

"Isaac Williams," Aberavon.—The Portrait will shortly appear.

"Clericus."—Thanks for his letter and hint

"Sexagenarian."—This correspondent, in noticing our recent leader on post-office robberies, complains that the appointments are too ill-judged, facile, or corrupt; and the servants (particularly in the higher walks) too ill-paid, for situations of great responsibility and trust. He agrees with us in the main for the evil we denounced, and courts further discussion of the question of post office reform, which we do not intend to let sleep. We cannot find room for his letter.

"Jack Quid" had better purchase them in parts, and send the volume to the binder. Our own volume, bound with title and index, will be purchasable for a guinea at the end of the year.

"X. D."—The subject is altogether too unpure for us to think of touching it in a family paper.

"W. J. R."—Too long.

"E. H."—There is much sense in our correspondent's suggestion; but the public demand rapidity.

"J. Meredith," Leamington.—No. We cannot receive back old sets, it would be tantamount to doubling our impression; but our correspondent can get them bound himself, and can procure from us the title-pages and index.

"W. H. P.," Lynn.—Yes. When back numbers are exhausted we reprint

"Jas. B.," Halifax.—All that our correspondent has suggested will speedily appear.

Principal and Agent. "N. Y. Z."—We cannot, as a rule, undertake to answer legal questions.

"A. J. Palmer."—A letter referred to our publisher.

"W. Strong."—The offer is declined, with thanks.

"Stephen."—We may avail ourselves of the sketches, and are always grateful for this sort of correspondence.

"R. T."—We cannot borrow from another journal, but may give specimens of our own

"J. K. A."—Received, with thanks

"J. C."—Advertise in the Times and Shipping Gazette.

"J. as bonne cause." Letitia Elizabeth Landon.

"H. B. Gardiner"—Declined.

"T. Peacock."—Let our fair correspondent try the experiment.

"Expectant." Yes. His other suggestions shall be noticed.

"L. W. R." will doubtless have it without purchase.

"B. T."—We should be most glad to avail ourselves of our correspondent's kind offer.

"J. E. P."—No; six months.

"J. Q." Downpatrick.—Yes.

"A Subscriber." Dear.—We really cannot afford the space, much as we wish to oblige all our friends.

"Edward Lee."—Declined.

"H. A. O."—We are really very much indebted to this talented and considerate correspondent for the trouble she has taken. Her services in the sketching department particularly, would be highly available, and, in the present instance, if we return her designs with thanks, instead of engraving them, it is only because their being so numerous, elaborates their subject beyond the interest which the public would take in them. They are prettily executed, and make us desirous of obtaining more; but are drawing to each subject, with the many claims upon our space, is all that we could entertain. Again we repeat our obligations.

We shall present our readers next week with several beautiful views in India—scenes that recent events will make long memorable in the annals of our country.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1842.

Our copious detail of Indian intelligence, our Paris correspondence, and numerous unforeseen claims upon the space of our journal by the news and illustrations of the week, have left us little room for general comment upon domestic affairs. The Affghan victories have filled our English world with joy, and the Chinese peace, while it has raised the funds, and poured a flood of speculation into the heart of the trading community, has awakened also other pleasant glimpses of hope among the people—that the speedy abolition of their annoying income-tax may not be long in resulting from the termination of our wars! Those who argued for it upon the principle of its being a war-impost, have now no ground under their feet, and therefore it is presumed that they will fall away from their advocacy. Moreover, the many millions of tributary dollars from abroad are eyed with a belief in the diminution of taxes at home; and there is a pleasant sort of content beaming upon the countenance of society which, we hope, may never die of disappointment and chagrin. We shall have more to say about this when we have all the bearings of the subject into consideration, but, in the meanwhile, yield up our English comment to the amusing diatribes and discoveries of the French. Our Gallic neighbours are quite dumfounded—they are in a fret of jealous passion at the new condition of our Indian affairs. And their notions of free trade, and a participation in the benefits which Great Britain has secured to herself from China, are novel and disinterested in a peculiar degree. These French have odd ideas of commercial transactions, and even their integrity will stand for little, if we regard the abandonment of the recent treaty which their minister had accepted with such definitive grace. They are far from understanding the principles of pure political morality, and they are determined, no matter at what cost to their own interests, that Englishmen shall buy their wine and brandy.

From France and England we should be almost tempted, by a recent melancholy occurrence in the county of Cork, to turn to ever-agitated Ireland. We allude to an unhappy affray at Skibbreen, between the populace and the police, arising out of the collection of the poor-law rates. There was, we fear, needless bloodshed here. The police fired by a magistrate's order, and two deaths were the consequence; and, it is only because a sense of justice tempts us to await the result of a coroner's inquest, that we refrain from making such observations on the affair as its distressing character seems loudly to demand. We shall speak out when the law has taken its course.

We have, however, no restraint or compunction similar to this to deter us from pointing the attention of our readers to two cases of domestic tyranny, such as we never willingly overlook, but which appear in our weekly records of magisterial law. The first is described by a paragraph in a Worcester paper:—

"A servant girl, named Mary Morgan, was recently brought before the Cheltenham magistrates for running away from service. She had been hired at Cheltenham for a year certain on the 17th of October, and went away two days after. Her excuse was that she did not like the ways of the house. Mrs. Wood and the magistrate's clerk. After some coyness she said, "because I had to go through the man's bedroom to my room!" The magistrate replied, "this is a common thing in farm houses;" and the girl was sent to Northleach gaol for fourteen days!

First, it is proper to say that the girl should not have deserted her place without due complaint and notice, and an endeavour to procure a change in the locality of her sleeping apartment; but, secondly, if her plea was a true one, if, as a young girl, she had felt either alarmed or annoyed at the very improper alternative of having to pass to her chamber "through a man's bed-room," then, indeed, was the feeling not only prudent and commendable, but the injustice was monstrous that could sentence her to imprisonment for the exercise of womanly delicacy, and the observation heartless that could imply an approval of a custom, which, if "common in farm-houses," can only disgrace them, and is certainly revolting to a well-regulated mind. At all events, even those who may sneer down maiden modesty into prudery, will still labour in vain to excuse the tyranny which sends young innocence to a prison to expiate what was never an offence, and perhaps be hardened into the immorality which a magistrate has punished her for being loath to learn. The other case does not involve the conduct of a magistrate except in a creditable sense, although it reflects the utmost blame upon some of the subordinate administrators of the infamous dietary and workhouse system of the Poor-law Bill. It resulted in the dismissal by Mr. Henry, at the Lambeth-street Police-office, of four men, named John Brown, Thomas Smith, John Smith, and John Allen, charged with refusing to perform the task-work allotted to them by the guardians under the Poor-law of the Whitechapel union for food and lodging supplied to them. The case exhibited, as against the relieving (!) officer, evidence, for a brief period, of combined cruelty and starvation, and the magistrate dismissed it with such indignant reproaches as we hope may lead to another dismissal yet, that of the ill-judging and inhuman functionary, whose little brief authority thought to sting poverty into endurance of more than its natural bitterness, and to insult affliction with a fresh accumulation of pain. Shame on laws that thus admit humanity to be scandalously outraged in a civilized country.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

A Privy Council has been summoned for Monday next.

The commissioners appointed to investigate into the circumstances attending the late robberies at the Custom-house held their first meeting on Monday last, at Gwydir House, Whitehall. The commissioners are, Lord Granville Somerset, Chairman, Mr. Pringle, Mr. W. E. Gladstone, Mr. B. Baring, and Mr. Gaskell. Mr. Courtney is the secretary. The proceedings were strictly private, none being admitted except those summoned by the commissioners to attend.

The will of the late John Holmes, Esq., who for many years held the office of High Bailiff for the borough of Southwark, has been proved by the executor in the Prerogative Court of the Archbishop of Canterbury, in Doctors' Commons. The personal property has been sworn under £10,000, which is principally left amongst his family.

Official despatches were received at the Foreign-office and at the Board of Control on Wednesday morning from the Governor-General of India and Sir Henry Pottinger, which we understand fully confirm all the glorious intelligence relating to the treaty of peace with China, and the end of the war in Afghanistan.

Lord Stanley, Sir Herbert Jenner Fust, and Dr. Nicholl, Judge Advocate-General, had long interviews with Sir James Graham at the Home-office on Wednesday.

The Lord Mayor has received a requisition from the members of the Common Council to convene an early meeting of the Court, to consider the question of the abolition of the corn-duties.

Count de St. Aulaire, the French Ambassador, and Baron Brunnow, the Russian Minister, transacted business at the Foreign-office.

By the Oriental, which arrived at Malta late at night on the 12th inst., we learn that the Lord High Commissioner of the Ionian Islands has resigned.

The following gentlemen were, on Tuesday last, called to the degree of Barrister-at-Law by the Hon. Society of Lincoln's Inn, viz.:—Thomas Fenwick, Esq., H. John Hodgson, Esq., Francis Thomas Allen, Esq., Thomas Clifton Paris, Esq., Joseph Trounsell Gilbert, Esq., and Jacob Waley, Esq.

The following gentlemen were on Thursday last called to the degree of Barrister-at-Law by the Hon. Society of Lincoln's Inn, viz.:—William Pitt Manson, Esq., Zachary Mudge, Esq., Lucius Henry Fitzgerald, Esq., Thos. Fassett Kent, Esq., and John Edward Johnson, Esq.

Twenty-two subordinate officers of customs and two surveyors-general have just been suspended by the commissioners appointed to investigate Custom-house frauds. Several have been dismissed office for allowing tradesmen certain periods to pay Custom-house duties. It has been proved that one officer, with about £160 a year, took a house for his family at Brighton, and used to travel by railway to and from London and Brighton daily.

Robert Malcolm, Esq., whose recent death has caused a vacancy in the office of surgeon to the Surrey county gaol, has bequeathed the sum of £1000, to be paid at the demise of his wife, to the Royal Naval School at Camberwell, to found a scholarship or exhibition, to be entitled the "Malcolm Exhibition." Mr. Malcolm, who was a surgeon in the navy, was one of the council of the Royal Naval School, and was much respected by his colleagues.

A commercial traveller, a few days ago, left behind him, in a carriage on the South Western Railway, a white linen bag, containing 244 sovereigns. On returning to look for it he found it gone. A reward of £50 has since been offered for its recovery.

We are glad to hear that the local commissioners for the City have relaxed the rule laid down by them of requiring persons assessed by two at to the property-tax at more than £150 a year to appeal in those cases where the Government officer is prepared to certify that the parties are entitled to exemption. We hope this will heal the angry feeling manifested in the City at the proceedings of the assessors.

The railroad from London to Ashford will be opened about the 1st of December next, and in the meantime every county south, with the exception of the Dover mails, will be taken off the present line.

POSTSCRIPT.

Saturday Morning.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO RAMSGATE.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert made a private visit to Ramsgate on Thursday, having gone over from Walmer Castle. Her Majesty drove through the pier gates to the Pier House, where she and her illustrious consort were received by Sir William Curtis, the Deputy Chairman of the Harbour Trustees; her Majesty afterwards walked on the East Pier, promenading to the further extremity. While at this point the Queen witnessed the arrival of four vessels in the harbour, one of which, a brig, very nearly struck the stone-work, and had a most narrow escape. Her Majesty betrayed considerable emotion at the peril in which the brig for a minute or two had been involved. Her Majesty afterward witnessed the launching of a Genoese vessel, the Felice, from the patent slip in the harbour, and, after remaining upon the pier for nearly an hour, re-entered the Pier House, where an elegant collation had been prepared for the royal and illustrious party. Sir W. Curtis had the honour of being invited by her Majesty to be present at the splendid repast. Her Majesty, previously to taking leave of Sir W. Curtis, and entering her carriage, honoured the officers of the Compte de Flandres, a Belgian brig-of-war, lying in the harbour, with an audience. Her Majesty arrived at Walmer, on her return, a few minutes before four.—[We shall next week give a spirited and accurate sketch of Ramsgate Pier.]

On Friday her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert walked out on the beach as far as Herridge's-hut and back, between twelve and one o'clock, when the weather set in so wet and boisterous as to prevent their leaving the castle again. No time has yet been fixed upon for the court to return to Windsor, but the probability is that her Majesty will remain at Walmer for a week or ten days longer. It is said that the Princess Charlotte man-of-war will relieve the Thunderer. The visit of royalty to this part of the coast, with the great probability of her Majesty annually visiting Walmer on account of the purity of its air, and the natural beauties of its scenery, have already been the cause of suggestion to some speculative capitalists the advantages to be derived in making this port a fashionable watering-place; and, under the full conviction of its undoubted success, they have issued circulars throughout the neighbourhood for the purpose of raising a capital of £100,000 in £100 shares, which is to be appropriated in erecting, in the neighbourhood of Walmer, a number of detached houses, but connected by an esplanade about 3000 feet in length, separate gardens and suitable offices to be attached to each residence, and, from the opinion of several residents here, it is probable that the object will be eventually carried out.

Several of the Cabinet Ministers visited Sir Robert Peel yesterday morning, at the right hon. baronet's residence in Whitehall-gardens.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer had a long interview with Sir James Graham at the Home-office.

We regret to announce the demise of the Right Hon. Lady Mostyn, who had been afflicted with a long and severe illness, which she bore with great resignation.

ACCIDENT TO LORD BURGHERSH.—Last night, between eleven and twelve o'clock, as Lord Burghersh was crossing Wimpole-street, on his return to his residence in Upper Harley-street, he was suddenly seized with giddiness in the head, and fell in the road-way, cutting his face very severely. Being unknown, his lordship was conveyed on a stretcher to the Marylebone-lane station-house. Mr. Tedman, of the D division, who was on duty, sent immediately for medical assistance, and, restoratives being used, his lordship so far recovered as to be able to walk home, accompanied and assisted by Mr. Richardson, of the New Road, who was passing when his lordship fell, and went with him to the station-house.

COVENT-GARDEN THEATRE.—On Thursday night, during the performance of the Tempest, the company (through Mr. Bartley) received a communication that Mr. Kemble had been removed from the management of Covent-garden Theatre that day by the proprietors, and that Mr. Bunn was appointed its future manager. The greatest astonishment was exhibited at this information. Mr. Bartley observed that Mr. Bunn would meet the company at two o'clock on Friday, and state his arrangements for the termination of the season. On Friday, at two o'clock, Mr. Bunn met the assembled company in the green-room. Mr. Benedict attended on the part of Miss Adelaide Kemble and Mrs. Alfred Shaw. Messrs. Vandenhoff, Bartley, and Cooper on behalf of the company. Mr. Bunn observed, that whatever surprise might be felt by the company at seeing him in the green-room as the future lessee, it did not exceed his own, for at ten o'clock the previous day he had no idea of his future connection with Covent-garden Theatre. He then proceeded to state the circumstances under which he had been called to the management of the establishment, and, after laying his views before the meeting, negotiations with the proprietors were commenced, which, as far as they have already gone, are not satisfactory, it appears, to the company. It seems that Mr. Chas. Kemble knew nothing of the proceedings of the proprietors.

WEST RIDING ELECTION FOR THE REGISTRARSHIP.—This election has terminated in the return of Mr. T. B. Hodgson, contrary to general anticipation. Mr. Luscelles had a majority of 77 on the second day's poll, but his opponent kept him upon the third day (Thursday), and at half-past six o'clock the scrutators found that the majority for Mr. Hodgson was 41, and they had then only 20 votes more to examine. Nearly 3400 voters had polled.

UNIVERSITY AND CLERICAL INTELLIGENCE.—OXFORD, Nov. 24.—In a Congregation holden this day the following degrees were conferred: Doctor in Divinity, Grand Compounder: The Rev. Thomas Sutton, Worcester. Master of Arts: George Bisset, Balliol. Bachelors of Arts: Brownlow North, Magdalen Hall, Grand Compounder; John Fraser, Fellow of Merton; Edward Meherzer Kinsey, Michel Scholar of Queen's; Evan Thomas Evans, Scholar of Jesus; Henry Danby Seymour, Magdalen; William Les, Robert J. Buller, Brasenose; Vere Gardon Driffield, Scholar of Brasenose; John Mason, New Inn Hall; Offley Crewe, Frederick Anderlecht Goulburn, Merton; Jonathan Rashleigh, Thomas Henry, Balliol; George Brian, Worcester; Joseph Cox Algar, Scholar of University. At a meeting holden this day at the Vice-Chancellor's by the electors of Dr. White's Professor of Moral Philosophy, the Rev. George Henry Sachaverell Johnson, M.A., Fellow of Queen's College, was unanimously elected Professor of Moral Philosophy, in the room of the Rev. Dr. Stocker, late Fellow of St. John's College, who has resigned. In a Convocation holden this day, the Rev. William Jacobson, M.A., Vice-Principal of Magdalene Hall, was unanimously elected Public Orator of the University, in the room of the Rev. the Principal of New Inn Hall, now Regius Professor of Modern History.

Amongst our Irish news will be found the details of a fatal affray which took place at Skibbereen, in the county of Cork, between the police and the peasantry, arising out of the execution of ejectments, in which two of the latter were shot dead. A coroner's inquest has been since held on the bodies, the cases being taken separately, when the jury found a verdict of "Manslaughter" against the police in one case, and "Justifiable Homicide" in the other. We regret to add that the most dangerous excitement now prevails in this hitherto peaceable district.

FRIGHTFUL ACCIDENT IN A PAPER-MILL.—On Wednesday a most shocking fatality occurred at the paper-manufactory of Mrs. Mary Crompton, situate at Collyhurst, in Manchester. The sufferers on this melancholy occasion were a female named Eliza Jenkinson, twenty-eight years of age, house-servant to Mrs. Crompton, who was killed on the spot, her body being literally torn in pieces, and Mrs. Crompton herself, who lost her left arm. The occurrence most painfully exemplifies the great danger of fly-wheels, cog-wheels, and other portions of revolving machinery being left exposed, so that the dress of persons passing may get entangled.

FIRE IN OXFORD-STREET.—Last night, about a quarter before nine o'clock, a fire of a most serious description, attended with vast destruction of property, burst forth from the premises of Mr. Mathews, cabinet-maker, in the rear of the houses on the north side of Oxford-street, between Newman-street and Perry's-place. Within a few minutes after the fire broke forth the highest engines arrived. For some time no water could be got from the plug, but, on a supply being obtained, the firemen worked vigorously upon all sides of the burning property. The workshops were totally consumed. As to its origin nothing positive could be elicited. The loss is very heavy.

DREADFUL SUICIDE.—Yesterday Mr. Wakley, M.P., held an inquest at the University College Hospital, Gower-street, on the body of Mr. John Dewell Aldridge, aged 50, an oilman, &c., of 22, Chenies-street, Bedford-square. A lad named Bates said that about 5 o'clock on Wednesday afternoon he saw deceased hang himself by the hands from the parapet of the top of his own house. In a moment or two he let go his hold, and witness, being frightened, ran away, and saw no more. Mr. Canney, house surgeon, said deceased was admitted with compound fracture of the left and simple fracture of the right thigh. The pelvis was fractured in two places, and there was a wound on the forehead. Death resulted from collapse, caused by those injuries. The brain was diseased. Verdict "Temporary insanity."

BOW-STREET.—On Tuesday the Rev. W. Baller, LL.D., was placed at the bar before Mr. Hall, charged with forging and putting off a promissory note for a very considerable amount, purporting to have been executed by a person who died some time since. The individual in question, whose name was Robert Smith, a person of eccentric character, during his life resided in Great St. Andrew-street, Seven Dials, and carried on the business of an ironmonger. At the time of his death reports were extensively circulated that he had left behind him property to a very large amount. In consequence of these reports, most extraordinary claims were immediately made upon his estate, by different parties, for debts which it was impossible he could have incurred. There was, however, one demand to which it was considered necessary to pay attention, viz., a debt alleged to be due to a Miss Ann Bailey, the prisoner's sister, the amount of which was £2875. An action was commenced to recover the amount, and in due time the cause came on for trial before the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. In the course of the trial the prisoner was called as a witness, and he then swore that he was present at his chapel in Queen-square; and that whilst in the vestry on that occasion he saw the deceased write the I O U produced, which he said was an acknowledgment of his sister's debt. Shortly before the trial a circumstance occurred which could leave no doubt that the prisoner had deliberately practised a gross imposition. That circumstance was, that the prisoner happened to be acquainted with Mr. Beilby, the undertaker who conducted the funeral of the deceased, and on one occasion took the opportunity of mentioning the death of the "wealthy miser." He then said, "I understand he could not write his name:" to which Mr. Beilby replied, "Oh, yes, he could well," at the same time producing some bills and receipts which had been written by him, and which the prisoner was permitted to take with him, at his own request, as he said he should like to show them to his friends, but which it would appear was in reality for the purpose of effecting the forgery in question. Other circumstances occurred at the time which induced the Chief Justice to order the several documents to be impounded, in order that further measures might be taken against the prisoner, and a verdict was eventually returned for the defendant. Mr. Sergeant Talfourd, who appeared for the defence, having advised that as forty proceedings should be stayed till the completion of the judgment; hence the delay which had occurred in instituting the present prosecution. After the judgment had been completed, the prisoner was called upon an illiterate Irishman, who said that in the street near his residence, whom he engaged to give a plausible version of the transaction at the chapel, which the prisoner furnished in writing, but when he was titled he must go before a judge, and swear to the truth of the statement, he relented, and positively refused to commit perjury, although he was promised £30 for his services. The poor fellow upon that consulted with a fellow-countryman, who advised him by all means to communicate with the relatives of the deceased upon the subject, which he did without delay, and the present prosecution was immediately instituted. Several other witnesses have been examined, Mr. Hall said he saw quite enough of the case to justify further investigation, and he should not be doing his duty if he did not remand the prisoner. He would refrain from making any remarks upon the nature of the evidence in the present stage of the proceedings further than that a remand was absolutely necessary.—The prisoner was accordingly remanded for a week

FOREIGN.

The French mail of Wednesday brings no news. The papers are principally filled with accounts of the insurrection at Barcelona (but which, however, contain no additional particulars), and remarks upon the treaty of peace entered into with the Emperor of China.

CHINA AND INDIA.—A London Gazette Extraordinary, containing further despatches received by Government from China and India, was published at a late hour on Thursday night, but our space precludes the possibility of giving these interesting documents at greater length than we have already done. The tone of the documents to which the signatures of the Chinese authorities are affixed amply demonstrates the improved position of our relations with them. Instead of designating us "barbarians," and "the evil eye," we are now flattered with iteration and the reiteration of "the honourable nation," "the most honourable nation," "and the honourable nation highly prizing justice and good faith," "the most powerful nation," &c. &c. The Emperor's assent to the provisions of the treaty has been intimated through an imperial edict, so that all doubts of the ratification of this most auspicious peace are at an end.

VISIT OF HER MAJESTY TO WALMER CASTLE.

On Saturday the unsettled state of the weather prevented her Majesty from taking her accustomed walking exercise. His Royal Highness Prince Albert walked out on the beach for a short time. Sir James Clark arrived at the castle in the morning.

On Sunday morning her Majesty walked out with his Royal Highness Prince Albert on the beach upwards of two hours. Her Majesty and the Prince, after walking so far as Deal, returned by the seaside to Kingsdown and back to the castle.

Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert attended divine service, which was performed at the castle by the Rev. Mr. Lane, rector of Deal. Lord Charles Wellesley, Viscount Sydney, Colonel Wylde, and most of the suite were present.

Monday being the birthday of the Princess Royal, by daybreak the Thunderer and another of her Majesty's ships (which had come into the Downs that morning) put on their gayest colours and fired a royal salute. Three gun-boats from the Thunderer came in close to the castle and fired similar salutes. About 10 o'clock the Deal and Walmer band drew up on the meadow in front of the castle, and played "God save the Queen," and other favourite airs, while the entire population, as well as the visitors assembled in the vicinity of the castle, cheered most enthusiastically in honour of the occasion.

The day was uncommonly fine, with the wind blowing a brisk gale, and the sun shining most brilliantly. By far the grandest sight of the day was a sailing excursion of the Deal and Walmer boats, which we are told up spontaneously by the boatmen in honour of the birthday of the youthful Princess, and also to gratify the Queen, who is passionately fond of aquatic display. The boats, to the number of about 30, with every inch of canvas they could carry, ran down from Deal under the castle walls. Here they braced up, and proceeded to sea, standing out to the westward till they had measured some three miles towards the South Sand Light. They then turned in on the other tack till they came close in shore under Walmer Castle, where they drew up, and each man standing up in his boat, gave three, and five times three or more hearty British cheers, that resounded for many miles. At this time her Majesty, Prince Albert, and suite, were on the ramparts witnessing the interesting spectacle, and both the Queen and Prince most graciously condescended to acknowledge the devotion of the brave and manly boatmen of Deal by repeatedly bowing. The band then struck up a national air, and the loyal fleet then again stretched out seaward, rounded the Thunderer, and about 12 o'clock returned to Deal in beautiful order, after having traversed some 12 miles in something less than two hours.

The wind was not particularly strong, but there was a capital sailing breeze, and the boats did their work in excellent style, and much to the delight of the Queen and Prince Albert, if we may judge from the expressions of high approbation they made use of respecting this nautical treat, which we must say much exceeded any regatta we ever witnessed.

During the afternoon the gun-boats of the Thunderer got up a sham fight between that vessel and the shore, which exhibition drew together a large concourse of spectators on the beach.

George Luth, Esq., Walmer, fired a royal salute from his house, and entertained the band at his board to dinner.

Sir James Clark arrived at the castle, upon his usual professional visit.

Her Majesty, feeling a great interest in the names and destinations of the ships of war passing through the Downs, commanded Mr. Charles Wesom, the superintendent in charge of her Majesty's naval yard at Deal, to report those particulars at the castle, as soon as they could be ascertained.

On Monday afternoon, immediately after the return of the Deal boatmen from cruising off the castle, and they had hauled their little fleet upon the beach, they were summoned to be present at the Town-hall, to receive a communication from Mr. Darby, the mayor of Deal, upon the subject of their display before the Queen that morning. At two o'clock the hall was filled by the boatmen, upwards of four hundred, who manned the boats upon the occasion being present.

Mr. Darby then briefly addressed them, expressing the high gratification he experienced in communicating to his fellow-townsmen that their loyal efforts to do honour to the birthday of her Royal Highness the Princess Royal had met with the approval of their Sovereign. The Mayor then read two letters which had passed between him and the Lord in Waiting, in reference to the display made by the boatmen of Deal

The reading of the letters was received with loud cheering by the assembled boatmen.

The Mayor again rose, and said, "As you did me the honour to make me your guest this morning, I shall, in return, beg you will do me the favour to 'splice the mainbrace' in a glass of grog, each of you, and drink to the health of our beloved Queen and the royal family."

The cheering at this announcement of the worthy Mayor was redoubled by the 400 or 500 present, who then left the hall to "splice the mainbrace," an operation well understood by our nautical readers.

Her Majesty's ship Thunderer was thus "dressed" during the whole of Monday, in honour of the birthday of the Princess Royal:—The royal standard was displayed at the main, the union jack at the force, with flags from the mast-head, to the yardarms, and the crescent. The flags were unfurled simultaneously, as if by magic, at nine o'clock, when the royal salute was fired.

The illuminations on shore, and at sea, on Monday evening, were upon an unusually grand and extensive scale. Her Majesty's ship Thunderer, at six o'clock, commenced the display opposite the castle by opening her upper and lower deck ports, with brilliant lights in each port; and at twenty minutes afterwards she fired two signal guns previously to the fireworks, which began by the exhibition of an immense quantity of blue lights on each yard, appearing, in the distance, as one continued blaze of fire. This was succeeded by showers of various rockets, and by the Marines on the quarter-deck firing a feu de joie, many times repeated. The display on board the Thunderer terminated with a royal salute from her 36-pounders.

The Fearless steamer, Captain Bullock, with the Lady Flora, Lieutenant Batt, and the Sealark, Master Quested, revenue cruiser, then anchored to the westward of the Thunderer, close under the castle, and commenced firing rockets and large Roman candles (which had a beautiful effect, illuminating the castle and the surrounding neighbourhood), under the direction of Lieutenant Batt.

The evening, which was remarkably fine, with but little wind, enabled her Majesty to view these interesting movements from the ramparts.

On Wednesday her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert enjoyed their morning's walk by the seaside, remaining out on the beach nearly two hours. The Princess Royal was taken an airing.

Preparations were made for the members of the royal suite to visit the Thunderer man-of-war. Captain Bullock moored the Fearless Government steam-packet immediately off the castle, and several boats' crews were sent to the beach, for the purpose of conveying the royal suite to the ship, which was lying about two miles out at sea, when, just as every thing was arranged for going on board, a stop was put to the proceeding by command of her Majesty, who had that instant received an official communication of a case of smallpox having the day previous occurred on board that vessel. It appears that one of the seamen had exhibited an eruption, which the surgeon had termed a spurious case of smallpox, but that no serious consequences were apprehended.

Lord Charles Wellesley, Mr. and the Hon. Mrs. Anson, Lady Caroline Cocks, and Lord Hardwicke, who intended to have gone on board the Thunderer, took a cruise in the Lady Flora revenue cutter.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert hunted with the Beachborough foxhounds; the meet was at Betshanger Gorse, where there was a brilliant field of upwards of three hundred well-mounted horsemen, consisting of the gentry and yeomanry of the Isle of Thanet, Herne Bay, Dover, Deal, Broadstairs, Sandwich, and Canterbury. At half-past eleven o'clock his Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Lord Charles Wellesley, the Hon. C. A. Murray, and Col. Wylde, arrived on the field. After about ten minutes' draw in the furze, a dog fox was started, which, with much difficulty, was made to break cover, when he ran for Betshanger Park, the estate of Frederick Morrice, Esq., and got into a small plantation near the house. This caused a check for about twenty minutes, in consequence of the fox being frequently headed back by so large a field. At last he broke away into the open country, and the field at this time was exceedingly animating. It, however, lasted but a very short time, as he was run into and killed near Eastry turnpike, after indifferent running of about twenty minutes. The Prince, being well up at the death, was presented with the brush by Mr. Brockman, who hunted the pack.

The field then made for Knowlton Park, and soon found in a cover close by, when they experienced a very pretty circuitous twenty-five minutes' run, after a few unpleasant casualties in crossing the turnpike roads. The fox was ultimately killed at Betshanger Gorse, within two or three hundred yards of where the field met.

PORTRAIT OF THE PRINCESS ROYAL.

HER MAJESTY'S VISITS ROUND WALMER.

The occasion of the Queen's visit to Walmer Castle, which we celebrated with illustration in our last number, and the progress of which we detail in the intelligence of the present week, has afforded our artist the opportunity of making drawings of all those beautiful and prominent objects of interest on the coast of Kent which have excited the peculiar attention of her Majesty in pleasurable trips of health from point to point, and which have long been reckoned among the boasts and beauties of the coast scenery of our tight little island. We now present to our readers spirited engravings of this series of views, with such brief historical and descriptive notices as may tend to give them seemly introduction. Let us commence our list with Dover harbour.

The celebrated seaport town of Dover is situated in the eastern part of the county, seventy-two miles from London. The small river Dour passes through a pleasant valley, and, washing great part of the town, enters the harbour, thence to empty itself into the sea. The harbour itself is of some historical importance.

In the reign of King Henry VII. it attracted the serious notice of Government, and accordingly great sums were expended for its improvement, but the want of a pier to seaward was still felt; and one was constructed in the reign of Henry VIII. Previous to the reign of Queen Elizabeth this had fallen to decay, and the harbour was again nearly choked up. An act was therefore passed for giving towards the repair of the harbour a certain tonnage from every vessel above twenty tons burthen passing by it, which then amounted to £1000 per annum. After many different trials, a safe harbour was at length formed, with a pier, walls, and sluices.

During the whole of the reign of Queen Elizabeth the improvement of the harbour continued without intermission, and the preservation of it was secured by a charter of incorporation granted by King James I., who also granted his waste ground, or beach, commonly called the pier or harbour ground, as it lay without Southgate, or Snargate, the rents of which are now of a considerable yearly value.

In the course of the eighteenth century several jetties were erected towards the east, to prevent the encroachments of the sea; and although the strong south-west winds, so frequent at Dover, throw up large quantities of beach at the mouth of the harbour, the sluices have been so constructed that, with the aid of the backwater, they often clear it in one tide.

DOVER HARBOUR.

DOVER CASTLE.

The magnificent castle of Dover is situated on the summit of a stupendous cliff, on the north side of the town harbour. The rock on which it is placed presents, towards the sea, a perpendicular precipice, three hundred and twenty feet high. The site of the castle was most probably once a British hill-fortress; and that tradition may possibly be correct which describes Arviragus as having fortified himself here when he refused to pay the tribute imposed by Cæsar.

A church was founded within the walls of the castle, in the remaining walls of which numerous Roman bricks are worked up and particularly in those of the tower. This building has long been desecrated.

The importance of Dover Castle was well known to the Normans in the earliest stage of their encroachments on this island. Shortly after the battle of Hastings, William the Conqueror hastened to this spot, and, meeting with some opposition, he not only put the governor and lieutenant to death, but is said to have destroyed the town by fire.

The castle, in its present state, consists of almost every kind of fortification which the art of war has contrived to render a situation impregnable, though its consequence has been materially lessened since the use of cannon; the hills towards the west being much higher even than the keep itself. The buildings occupy nearly the whole summit of that high eminence which bounds the south-eastern side of the valley in which the town of Dover is placed. In general terms, this castle may be described as consisting of two courts defended by deep and broad dry ditches; from which have been made communications with the inner towers, by means of subterraneous passages. The lower court is surrounded by an irregular wall, except on the side towards the sea; which wall is called the curtain, and is flanked, at unequal distances, by numerous towers of different shapes and ages. The oldest is said to have been built by Earl Godwin, and still bears his name. John de Fiennes, a trusty Norman, and one the Conqueror could confide in, was appointed governor of the fortification, which contained a strong garrison, and had lands given him, which he held of the Crown, to secure and defend the works. By his order the exterior wall was additionally fortified, and continued down to the very edge of the high perpendicular cliff. The porter generally stands at the door of a room under the arch on the left hand going into the castle, to invite travellers to see the ancient keys of the castle, and some other articles which are kept the[re].

SHAKSPERE'S CLIFF.

DEAL CASTLE.

QUEEN ELIZABETH'S POCKET PISTOL.

Near the edge of the cliff there is a beautiful piece of brass ordnance, twenty-four feet long, which was cast at Utrecht in 1544, and is called Queen Elizabeth's pocket pistol. It is curiously ornamented with figures in bas relief, and carries a twelve-pound shot. It is said to have been a present from the states of Holland to the Queen. Upon the breech of the gun are some lines in old Dutch, which may be thus translated:—

"O'er hill and dale I throw my ball; Breaker my name, of mound and wall."

Beyond Dover southward, leading to Folkstone, is the bold and high cliff, which is thus beautifully described by Shakspere, in his tragedy of King Lear:—

"There is a cliff whose high and bending head
Looks fearfully on the confused deep.
How dizzy 'tis to cast one's eye so low!
The crows and choughs that wing the midway air
Seem scarce so gross as beetles. Half-way down
Hangs one that gathers samphire: dreadful trade
Methinks he seems no bigger than his head.
The fishermen that walk upon the beach
Appear like mice; and yon tall anchoring bark
Diminished to her cock; her cock a buoy,
Almost too small for sight. The murmuring surge,
That on the unnumbered idle pebbles chafes,
Cannot be heard so high. I'll look no more,
Lest my brain turn, and the deficient sight
Topple down headlong."

Though this cliff may not now strictly answer the above description, as the sea is constantly undermining it, and large fragments frequently fall down, yet it is of tremendous height, and cannot fail to excite the admiration and astonishment of such as are not accustomed to objects of this kind.

Deal Castle stands on the south side of the town. It consists chiefly of a round tower; a battery of a few guns, with lunettes, makes its chief defence. The barracks stand at the same end of the town, and at the opposite end is Sandown Castle: these are both fine buildings.

The church is dedicated to St. Leonard, and is situated about a mile from the sea, in a village called Upper Deal. There is also a chapel of ease, situated in Lower Deal, which is a neat edifice, dependent upon the mother church. There are several dissenting chapels.

The Royal Hospital is the principal charity. There are besides a National and some Sunday schools.

The number of houses in Deal, according to the returns of 1811, was 180, and the inhabitants amounted to 7351; in 1831 the inhabitants were 7268. It now is joined with Sandwich and Walmer in the privilege of returning members to Parliament.

The country round is but flat, yet the sea views are beautiful, including the bold and noble promontory of the North Foreland.

ANECDOTE OF KING LEOPOLD.—Some two or three weeks since an Irish lady, Madame Talbot (sister of Lady Shrewsbury, and who is a chanoinesse), being in delicate health, was taking an airing in a close carriage in the Bois de Boulogne. The horses took fright at some object and ran off with the carriage, plunging at length into a thicket. Madame Talbot, who is rather advanced in life, fainted, but the servants called out so loudly for help that they were heard by a lady and gentleman who were driving through the wood, also in close carriage, and who immediately ordered their attendants to give their aid. The gentleman himself alighted, and directed that the traces of Madame Talbot's carriage should be cut, as the horses, though the carriage was stopped by the brushwood, were kicking violently. He then assisted in removing Madame Talbot, who was still insensible, to his own carriage; and having learned who she was, and that she lived in the Rue St. Dominique (Faubourg St. Germaine), ordered his coachman to drive thither. Just as the carriage had reached the Pont de la Concorde, Madame Talbot opened her eyes, and, looking earnestly at the lady and gentleman who were supporting her, discovered in them King Leopold of Belgium and the Princess Adelaide, sister of King Louis Philippe.

The Duke of Saxe Coburg Gotha has named Liszt and Rubini members of the Ducal Saxon Ernestine House Order. Both had given concerts for the benefit of the poor of the city. Rubini had appeared at the Coburg Theatre in Pirata, and had given an assurance that that would be his last appearance on the stage.

A triangular survey is now in progress in Greece, under the direction of French officers. A new road has recently been finished from Athens to Thebes, a distance of 30 miles. Others are now in progress to connect this town with Corinth, Eleusis, and Megara.

THE WELLESLEY PAPERS.—The executor of the late Marquis Wellesley has sent to the British Museum upwards of three waggon-loads of MSS. and books, in compliance with the will of the noble marquis. It is hoped that these valuable documents will soon be made available to the public.

"We are told," says the Gazette du Midi, "that when Espartero was at the order of Charles III. to our celebrated lyrist, Béranger, the poet was so far from having courted this favour that he returned it to the Regent, with a letter in verse, thanking him for the intended honour; but adding, that, having declined being made a member of the French Academy, he could not accept presents from a foreign government."

The English society at Hanover has been much saddened by the death of the young and amiable Mrs. Gervase Parker Bushe, who expired on the 1st of this month, a few days after a premature confinement. Mrs. Bushe was daughter of Lady Elizabeth Smyth, and granddaughter of the Duke of Grafton, and went to Hanover as a bride in the spring of last year with her husband, Mr. Bushe, who is attaché to the English Legation at that court.

IRELAND.

Fatal Resistance to Poor-rates.—The Cork Southern Reporter, in relation to a fatal affray which took place near Skibbereen, in which one man was killed and three others wounded, states that it is reported that a second man has died. The poor fellow who was first shot dead was a man named Bawn, who, in the act of running away, received a ball in his back, which passed right through his heart. The riot thus originated:—As soon as the police arrived at a place called Old Court, they were joined by a large number of country people, who shouted as they passed along, and who, as they proceeded, were joined by crowds, until the concourse numbered about 2000; and, as they reached Rha, Mr. Aylmer attempted to arrest a man who had a stick in his hand, and who resisted. Upon which a mounted policeman rode up and made a cut with his sword at him, when two or three boys threw stones, and thereupon orders were given to fire; upon which the police obeyed, and a firing was kept up until the face of a being was not to be seen.

The Freeman's Journal states that at a meeting of the Irish Roman Catholic hierarchy, held last week in Dublin, it was proposed, and unanimously approved of, that an Irish translation of the Douai Testament should be forthwith prepared and published, and that from 1200 to 1300 copies were subscribed for on the spot by the archbishop and bishops present.

Funeral of the late Bishop of Cashel.—The remains of this most estimable prelate were on Tuesday last consigned to their final resting-place, within the vaults of the University, in the presence of a considerable concourse of persons, who attended to pay the last mark of respect to one who, during life, was graced with all the virtuous which dignify mankind. The most poignant grief appeared to pervade a great portion of the assembly, while few remained unaffected by the sad ceremony which was taking place. At the conclusion of the service the coffin was brought from the chapel to the vault, where it was deposited beside those of other eminent men formerly connected with the University. The coffin bears the following inscription:—

Stephanus Creaghe Sandes, D.D.,
Episcopus
Casselensis et Waterfordensis;
Natus VIII die Oct., 1778,
Obiit XIV die Novembri, 1842,
Ætat LXIV.

The Dublin Evening Post states that the late Master of the Rolls, Sir Michael O'Loghlen, had, during five years and a half, pronounced no less than 25,000 orders, from which there were only 29 appeals; 14 of which were affirmed, three partly varied, and only three reversed—one at his own suggestion.

SCOTLAND.

Lord Kelburne, P. M. Stewart, Esq., M.P., Sir W. M. Napier, Bart., and Mr. Wallace, M.P., attended the Renfrewshire meeting last week, to take into consideration the condition of the unemployed population, when it was agreed that a voluntary assessment of £3000 should be raised upon the rental of the county.

The Ayrshire Colliers' Strike.—Particulars have been given of a most serious outrage perpetrated by the colliers in the neighbourhood of Ayr upon a number of strangers who had accepted of employment in the pits there. One of the men most severely assaulted died on the afternoon of Friday week, and every exertion is being used to bring the murderers to justice. On that morning, at nine o'clock, an application was received at the Glasgow police-office for a party, and by the half-past ten o'clock forenoon train ten men were despatched to the district.

The Royal Society of London have given the Copley medal this year to James M'Cullagh, Esq., F.T.C.D., Professor of Mathematics in the Dublin University. This is the first time that such an honour has been conferred on an Irishman—an honour heightened by the fact that the prize has been borne of late from two of the most distinguished savants in Europe, Liebeul and Dumas. Mr. M'Cullagh is a native of Strabane, in the north of Ireland, and one of the first mathematicians of the age.

In consequence of the late glorious intelligence from the East, it is reported that her Majesty will leave Walmer Castle for town in a few days, for the purpose of holding a Privy Council at Buckingham palace.

Derbyshire.—Strange Affair.—A woman in Brimington, who died last week, confessed to having murdered her husband about fourteen years ago. He was cut with the throat cut from ear to ear, and a razor in his hand; and she acknowledged, just before death, that she cut the unfortunate man's throat, and then placed the razor in his hand. Her motive was, that she might live with another man, with whom she had continued to cohabit till death; and suspicion was excited at the time by the haste with which she betook herself to the dwelling of her paramour. We are further informed that the latter has been apprehended; but how far that or any other part of the horrible narrative is correct we are unable to say at present.

Manchester.—A very large public meeting was held at the Town-hall, Manchester, on Tuesday, consisting of merchants, spinners, manufacturers, machine-makers, and other capitalists and employers of workmen in Lancashire and Cheshire, to consider the steps to be adopted in consequence of the ruinous effects produced on trade by the operation of the corn-laws and the restrictive commercial policy. The meeting was convened by a circular emanating from the council of the Anti-Corn-law League. Upwards of £3700 was subscribed on the moment towards the League Fund.

A few days ago the body of a well-dressed female was found in the Regent's Canal, near the Mile End-bridge. On her person was found a note, written in a very unsteady and irregular hand, stating her name and that of her husband, and intimating that she had died of a broken heart. By this document it appeared that the deceased, whose name was Wyndham, was the wife of a Frenchman, a master dyer, who, on his marriage with her, obtained a fortune of £3000, but owing to misfortunes in business had lost it all. The deceased used to live in Seymour-street, Euston-square, where she was supported by remittances from her husband, now living at Lyons, and always exhibited a very respectable appearance.

Singular and Fatal Accident.—On Tuesday night last a lamentable occurrence took place near West Drisfield. Mr. James Draine, a highly-respectable corndealer and maltster, residing at the above place, left his residence in a one-horse chaise at an early hour in the morning, for the purpose of attending the monthly fair held at Farnwood. Between ten and eleven o'clock at night the horse and gig were heard by Mr. Draine's family approaching the house at an unusually rapid speed, and on the man servant going to attend the horse, which had stopped at the gate, he was alarmed at seeing his master lying partly out of the gig, with his head apparently on the ground. The exclamation of the servant of "Master, for God's sake, what's the matter?" quickly brought several members of the family from the house, when a horrid spectacle presented itself to their view. The unfortunate man had evidently fallen headlong from his seat over the right side of the vehicle, but had been prevented from falling entirely from the gig by the leathern apron attached to the front of the vehicle, and which, being fastened at the time, had caught and retained the legs and lower part of the body, whilst the upper part hung suspended from the chaise: the head, having fallen on the ground just before the wheel, had been literally smashed, so that the body was nearly headless. It was at first conjectured that the unfortunate man had been robbed and murdered, but his watch and a large sum of money were discovered about his person, and, on subsequent inquiry being made, it was ascertained that he had left the George Inn, at Farnfield, at a quarter to ten o'clock, being at the time considerably intoxicated. The last place at which Mr. Draine was seen alive was at the cross-roads between Knighswood and Needham, at which place the gig passed a farmer of the neighbourhood, who was on horseback, and who states that the deceased, whilst in the act of passing him, swayed his body from side to side in a dangerous manner, and that he (the farmer) called to Mr. Draine, and endeavoured to overtake him, but, from the tremendous pace at which the other was driving, he could not succeed. The unfortunate man has left a wife and a numerous family to deplore his untimely end.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

A most extraordinary collection of Pagan deities, instruments of war, and vessels for domestic purposes, have lately arrived in this country from Mexico, as presents to Sir Edward Antrobus, Bart.

A Battue of Brigands.—A letter from Sartiene (Corsica), Oct. 20, says:—"The demand made by the French Government on that of Sardinia to execute rigorously the treaty of extradition agreed on some years back between the two states having been favourably received, the Corsican bandits, who had taken refuge in Sardinia, hastened to return to their own country, to the number of three hundred and fifty at least. As this influx of malefactors was expected, measures were taken to carry on a war of extermination against them. A fortnight back the bandit Nicoli fell under the attack of the brigadier of gendarmerie, Guelucci, and two men. To-day the robbers Luciani, father and son, were killed near Serra by a party of the Corsican voltigeurs. The two robbers entrenched themselves behind some enormous blocks of rock, and fought with desperate courage. The father, although covered with dreadful wounds, had strength enough left to give a stab of his dagger to a voltigeur who came close to him under the impression that he was dead. The son survived an hour, without a complaint having escaped him, and died abusing man and blaspheming God. We had scarcely recovered a little from the emotion caused by these events, when a new crime threw us into consternation. The widow Rocaserres, residing at Lévié, was mortally wounded by a pistol-shot, fired at her by a cousin of her husband, because this latter had left her all his property. This murder will have the effect of bequeathing to the commune of Lévié a dreadful hostility, to which no inhabitant can remain a stranger."

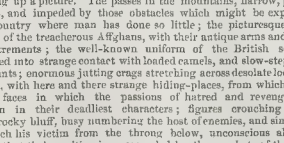
Freak of Fortune.—One of the most singular changes of fortune has occurred in the town of Bradford during the past week. William Sewell, alias "Water Bill," was, as his cognomen imports, a water-carrier, and has for years plied his occupation in that town. He is, however, no longer "Water Bill." A strange-looking letter arrived the other morning from Bath, informing him of the astounding fact that he was entitled to property to the amount of £10,000. He had no sooner recovered from the surprise created by this announcement, than a gentleman arrived from that city, informing him of the death of his aunt, who had left him the above amount. With this gentleman the astonished water-carrier set out for Bath on Friday week, where the property has been secured to him. The old watercart will, no doubt, be taken care of, and looked at with much interest by William Sewell, Esq.

The News from the East.—On Wednesday, in consequence of the successful news from the East, and more particularly the treaty of peace with China, orders were sent from the War Office to the chief of the Ordnance department that feu-de-joies should be fired by the Park and Tower guns. It was stated that, in consequence of the receipt of official news from the East, to the effect that the war in Affghanistan was at an end, and the ratification of the treaty with the Chinese, a day would be appointed for a general holiday and illumination, with fire-works in the Park and other amusements, similar to the proclamation of the peace of 1814.

A Chinese Ambassador to England.—Only think what a sensation a real live mandarin would create among all and sundry the ladies patronesses of the last new monster that may chance to show his face, or his pigtail, as the case may be—in the world of London. Yet such an event would not seem altogether improbable, if reliance may be placed in the following extract of a letter from a naval officer in China, dated towards the end of August: "On the 29th all was signed by the commissioners, and a private ratification in the Emperor's hand to the same. He therein expresses that he takes it as a compliment his own signature had been demanded, is highly satisfied with all arrangements, and has asked, if he should send a mandarin to the British court, would he be well received? The admiral, it is said, has replied that, should he wish to do so, a frigate should be placed at his service, and of course he would be well received."

Intercourse with China. The first attempt on the part of the English to establish an intercourse with China seems to have been as far back as 1596, when three vessels were fitted out in charge of Benjamin Wood, bearing letters from Queen Elizabeth to the Emperor. These ships, however, were lost on their way out, and no renewal of the project seems to have been attempted. The oldest record of the Company, at Canton, is dated April 6, 1637. Five ships were then sent out, under the command of Captain Weddell. They first arrived at Achem, in Sumatra. This fleet arrived off Macao, May 28th. These ships were, after some bloodshed, supplied with cargoes, but no farther trade ensued for many years. Leave was some time after given to the English to trade, but they have never enjoyed anything approaching the facilities and means of commerce that have been rendered out, but certain by late recent treaty with the Celestials. It is to be hoped that the Chinese will be found more faithful to engagements in this instance than on former occasions. Perhaps the recent exhibition of British power with their country will do much to make them fear to provoke a renewal of hostilities by any breach of the treaty entered into.

The trial of the several persons implicated in effecting the escape of General Vandersmissen came before the Correctional Police at Brussels on Thursday. The general's son was condemned to be imprisoned for twenty-four hours, and one of the turnkeys for six months. The other turnkeys and the director of the prison were acquitted. Madame Vandermissen, who suffered judgment to go by default, was condemned to twenty-four hours' imprisonment.



FINE ARTS.

Sketches in Affghanistan. By James Atkinson, Esq. London: Graves, and Co.

As a work of art, this volume is entitled to every consideration. The sketches are original and spirited, and moreover illustrate a series of scenes and incidents, rendered by recent events most interesting to all who value Britain's honour, or feel gratified by British triumphs. The natural features of Affghanistan are bold, and afford a variety of those materials in which an artist delights when making up a picture. The passes in the mountains, narrow, precipitous, and impeded by those obstacles which might be expected in a country where man has done so little; the picturesque costumes of the treacherous Affghans, with their antique arms and rude accoutrements; the well-known uniform of the British soldier jumbled into strange contact with loaded camels, and slow-stepping elephants; enormous jutting crags stretching across desolate looking passes, with here and there strange hiding-places, from which peer forth faces in which the passions of hatred and revenge are written in their direst characters; figures crouching over some rocky bluff, busy numbering the host of enemies, and singling out each his victim from the throng below, unconscious all the while, that their position is commanded by the muskets of the unbelievers, and that the deadly tube is already levelled to reduce their number: all these subjects afford scope for the artist's pencil which in this work have been right ably handled. But, independent of the artistic claims of this volume upon the attention of the connoisseur, the sketches gain adventitious interest from the recent war waged in the scenes they depict. In one we have a sketch of the unfortunate Sir W. Macnaghten receiving the submission of Dost Mahommed Khan: in another, a view of the Bala Hissar and the city of Cabul, a spot rendered celebrated in the dark annals of military reverses. Having, however, received permission from the publishers to avail ourselves of Mr. Atkinson's sketches, we shall not fail to give our readers evidence of the spirit, correctness, and character with which he has executed them, by transferring a few to our pages; and, with a passing compliment to Mr. Haghe, not less sincere because hastily paid, upon the first rate style in which the lithography is executed, we conclude our notice of this valuable addition to pictorial literature.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

On Saturday last Congreve's comedy of Love for Love was revived at this theatre, with a previous announcement that it was "adapted" to modern representation, which simply means that certain passages offensive to the delicacy of the present day were omitted, and wisely too, for, in the first place, the curtailments did not in the slightest degree injure the progress of the story (if story or plot there be); and, in the next, we agree with Pope that

"Immodest words admit of no defence,
For want of decency is want of sense."

As to the propriety or judgment exhibited in the "revival" of a comedy which has become obsolete by common consent we must make a few remarks. An audience of the present day can have but an imperfect sympathy with the characters and manners of the age in which Congreve lived. Wit of the most polished keenness, repartee of the most pointed epigram, and satire of the most biting severity abounded on all sides, alike between friends and foes. He was the most brilliant in society who could wrap the grossest indecency in the neatest double-entendre, the greatest gallant he who could make unsuspecting virtue (a commodity synonymous with ignorance in those days of profligacy) listen to ribaldry and obscenity without a blush, and the best author he who could depict all this upon the stage, aided by the greatest number of new and before undreamt of indecent characters, situations, and dialogue, invented by his own mis-directed genius. Intrigue was the groundwork of al. the comedies of the age, and licentiousness the language in which they were uttered. The clearest perceptions of the head were constantly in quest of pruriency and immorality, while the heart was left to slumber in a torpid apathy to all that was truly good or ennobling to our species. It is no defence of such re-productions as Love for Love to say that they are faithful pictures of their times as they are for that reason the more objectionable; such times have given way to succeeding ages of better morality, and any attempt to resuscitate them, even in a picture, has the tendency of recalling them altogether. It is true many passages of the broadest indecency have been omitted, but, though the soul of the piece is a sinful one, expel it and you destroy in a great measure the spirituality of the author. In a word, such compositions should sleep with the manners they were written to flatter and uphold. We should much prefer to see the catering hand of the liberal lessee expended for the encouragement of the aspiring dramatic genius of the day, whereof there is no lack, bearing in his mind Horace's maxim, Sint Mecœnates; non decrunt, Flacce, Marones.

The acting of the comedy throughout was excellent. Of the ladies Mrs. Stirling, Mrs. Nisbett, and Mrs. Keeley deserve especial notice; the Miss Prue of the latter was a most genuine performance. Miss Faucit tried to infuse some of her native sensibility into the character of Angelica, but she was not quite at home in the part. The part of Ben did not sit well upon Keeley's pecuniaries, nor was the part of Valentine well suited to Mr. Anderson.

The getting up of the comedy was admirable; it excited a good deal of broad mirth, but it was more laughed at for its occasional farcical improbability than any thing else. It was announced for repetition amidst general applause.

MUSIC—ORIGINAL PAPERS.

DR. ARNE.

"Renowned in his day, he yet doth live."

While it is the pride of all other nations to applaud and boast of the possession of genius amongst their compatriots, even where that genius has not been of the most transcendant brilliancy, it is the peculiar province of England to underrate, nay contemn, the productions of her own artistes in almost every walk in which they have chosen to be "wooers of the varied nine." Poetry, perhaps, has obtained in some degree an exemption from this unjust, unnational prejudice and persecution, but that, perhaps, is owing to the fact of their being little or no inspirations of that muse in these our times (worth instituting a comparison with our own) to be found on the Continent. It is the reverse with her sister, Music. Great and glorious are the names that daily spring up in Italy, Germany, and France, each crowning the lyre with new bays of his own growth, which a discerning and liberal public transfer from the art to the artist into wreaths of honour for himself, holding up to his own reflection the mirror which he had polished and improved. Here, alas! it is the reverse. We have aspirants enough, and of the highest order of genius too, but where is the fostering hand of patronage to succour and encourage them? Heartless, from being frequently "damned by faint praise," they either renounce altogether the pleasing task of inventing new "concords of sweet sounds," or fly to more hospitable shores for that welcome which their native land denies them. For this state of things the general public are in a great measure censurable; but there is a lurking and still more dangerous cause existing among the artistes themselves, and that is an unwillingness (the soul of which is illiberality) to admit the claims of their countrymen to be ranked in the first walks of creative music. This feeling not only affects contemporaries, but retrospects to some of the worthies whose strains delighted the ears of our great-grandfathers (when England, with all its modern importations, was more musical than she is now), and to none, perhaps, with more asperity than to the great man whose name heads this paper. The opera of Artaxerxes, which was the best opera of its day (English or foreign), and still lives as the test lyrical drama of a new vocalist, particularly female, has received from some the no less insultingly-descriptive term than "twaddle." Is the opening duet 'Fair Aurora' twaddle? Does the duet 'For thee my dearest' deserve this epithet? Why is it that 'In infancy' still delights; or who that has remarked the animation that suddenly kindles in an audience at the bold commencement of 'The soldier tir'd' can dare to call it twaddle? The passions throughout this opera are most faithfully depicted, and nothing is wanted to give it some of that variety with which modern opera too much abounds but some concerted pieces and choruses. It may be asked here, why did not Arne compose such morceaux, seeing that the drama abounds with many splendid situations for their introduction? In answer to this we must say it was not the custom of the stage in his time—it was no deficiency of genius in him (for who has written better vocal part-music?)—it was a thing not known; and we must not deny all merit to the doctor because he did not invent, or use, if he knew it, an accessory to effect which is carried to unmeaning extravagance by the moderns. But let us turn from Artaxerxes altogether, and see what other twaddle Arne has perpetrated. Shall his 'Where the bee sucks,' in The Tempest, be so designated? or his most exquisite 'Blow blow thou winter wind,' a melody which the great Cara Maria pronounced to be a masterpiece of "truth and feeling in song," be insulted by a term of the lowest possible denunciation? Some of his glees, rounds, &c., exhibit his versatility in a most agreeable variety of character; and his songs in many of our popular operas show that he possessed the inventive faculty of a great musician, namely, melody. Had he lived at the present day, we have no doubt that his partition or score would have been as highly coloured as any we are in the habit of being presented with by our contemporaries. Perhaps his pure taste might not have been corrupted so far as to prefer stunning the ear to filling it with gentle concords; and perhaps again those who so illiberally call him a twaddler may not achieve their century's fame like Thomas Augustine Arne. By the way, in these days of dramatic revivals, would it not be worth the while of some cautiously respectful musician to put a new "getting up" of Artaxerxes on the stage? Covent Garden has a vocal company that could do it every justice.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT-CHAT.

RUBINI.—It is confidently reported that this unrivalled tenore is engaged for next season at her Majesty's Theatre, in conjunction with Grisi, Garcia, Viardot, Mario, and Lablache. We rejoice to learn that the latter is so far recovered from his recent severe illness as to have appeared in Donizetti's new opera on Thursday, the 18th inst.

SPOHR. The Fall of Babylon, the last composition of this celebrated composer, which had been announced for performance at the St. James's Theatre on Friday, the 19th inst., was unavoidably postponed in consequence of King Arthur requiring the attendance of Mr. Phillips and the greater number of the chorus singers at Drury Lane. We sincerely hope that the committee of management may not suffer from the postponement.

MR. CHARLES KEMBLE.—We rejoice to hear that this gentleman is convalescent. His exertions during the rehearsals at The Tempest, it is said, were the cause of his serious relapse.

MISS ADELAIDE KEMBLE.—We regret to state that this accomplished vocalist is indisposed at her residence in Chapel-street, Grosvenor-square, and has not been able to perform during the present week.

MISS CUBITT.—This promising young vocalist has supplied the place of Mrs. A. Toulmin in the provincial engagements with M. Thalberg. Mrs. Toulmin has retired in consequence of the delicate state of her health.

MR. BLEWITT is busily engaged composing the music of the pantomime at Drury Lane, and Mr. R. HUGHES that of the Garden. Their respective tasks could not possibly be in better hands.

MRS. ALFRED SHAW.—The distinguished artiste is engaged for Mr. Wright's annual concert at Brighton on the 30th inst. Mrs. Anderson, the celebrated pianist, is also engaged, and a host of other professionals of first-rate celebrity.

NEW MUSIC HALL. It is confidently rumoured that a new suite of public rooms, including a spacious music-hall, is about to be erected on the site of the Fleet Prison! If true, what an agreeable change from its present horrors! We also express a hope that it will be conducted on more liberal principles than some others we could name, and that it will be a true temple of harmony, not disgraced by the discord that we have frequently seen prevail in a similar building.

REVIVAL OF MUSICAL TASTE IN ENGLAND.—The following opinion, as delivered by the pope on his visit to this country in 1791, conveys anything but a pleasing impression of the state of music amongst us at that time. We may congratulate ourselves upon a much advanced state of the art in our days: —"After dinner there was a ball in three different chambers. The first was allotted to the haute noblesse, by whom only minuets were danced. I could not possibly remain there, both on account of the heat and the detestable music performed by the orchestra, consisting of two scrapers and a violoncello. In the second chamber they danced country dances; the band was somewhat better, because the trumpets and the tamborins drowned that of the violins; the third chamber, which was the largest, had a band somewhat more numerous and less vile. The gentlemen were seated at several tables in drinking parties. There was some dancing, but not to the sound of music, because the songs heard at the tables, the toasts, and the singing, and the gabbling, and clamouring, totally prevented the instruments from being heard!"

MADAME SCHROECKR.—We learn from Berlin that after the performance given by the command of the King for the benefit of this distinguished artiste, and to commemorate the 50th anniversary of her first appearance on the stage, his Majesty ordered that she should be presented with the gold medal of the "Arts and Sciences," and a pension of 1000 thalers (£150). The celebrated actress is about to retire to large estate which she possesses near Breslaw.

M. LISZT.—Honours of the most distinguished kind continue to be showered upon this great musician wherever he chooses to roam on the Continent. He has just been appointed Keppelmeister extraordinary to the Grand Duke of Saxe Weimar; a situation the duties of which oblige him to reside three months of the year at Weimar, to direct the court concerts. He has, however, lately been heard to say that he intends shortly to vacate his sovereignty of the pianoforte to take up the harp, the poet's favourite instrument in all ages, with the resolution of vindicating its pretensions to its highest meed of celebrity. This undertaking cannot but prove deeply interesting to all lovers of romance, as well as to musicians. It is also his intention to compose a grand opera, on a subject selected by himself, the libretto of which has been entrusted to one of our leading English lyrists, previous to its translation into German.

LISZT AND RUBINI.—These two great artistes, of whom it may be said ils duo turba sunt—a host in themselves—after a week's stay at Coburg, took their leave on the 8th instant. Nothing could have surpassed the enthusiasm with which they were received, both by the court and the public. At their first concert their prices of admission were nearly quadrupled, and still crowds willingly attended to hear the greatest musical treat of the age. They were honoured by invitations to dinner at the palace of Callenberg by the hereditary Prince, and the day following they received the like distinction from the reigning Duke, who, not content with this mark of his favour, subsequently presented to each of them, through Baron Graben, the cross of the order of Ernest of Saxony. Of a verity, our continental neighbours know how to appreciate and reward genius.

M. BERLIOZ. The "Funeral Symphony" of this rising composer, which was written for the occasion of the removal of the dead who fell in the Revolution, and was first performed in July, 1840, on the anniversary of that great event, was revived at Paris on Monday, with some additions to the orchestra, by the author, and was received with the most enthusiastic demonstrations of applause by all the dilettants of Paris. The subject in itself is of a nature calculated to arouse the sympathies of the French, and kindle them into the highest raptures of commendation; but, where nothing of the kind prevails, the merit, the genius of the composer have found their way; for we learn that at Frankfort and several other towns in Germany concerts are in preparation, to which Berlioz has been invited to conduct his own splendid composition. We hear, also, that it will shortly be produced in this country.

HERALD.—The opera of Zampa, by this celebrated and early-lost genius, has been revived at the Opera Comique with still greater success than it experienced even in the life of its composer.

ITALIAN OPERA, PARIS.—A new singer, Mdlle. Nissen, has made her début at this theatre in the part of Adelgisa in Norma with such success that she was rapturously called for, even after the first act. Her physique is not of the greatest power, but she possesses a most finished style. She is a Swede by birth, and a pupil of M. Manuel Garcia, who of name alone is sufficient to inspire vocalists. Grisi was, as usual, the unrivalled Norma.

GRAND OPERA.—A new opera (the libretto by M. P. Lauchet, the music by M. Dietch), entitled Le Vaisseau Fantôme, has just been produced here, and with complete success. To those English who are resident in Paris, and Frenchmen who are conversant with our modern literature, some names in the dramatis personæ of this piece would at first lead us to suppose that it was founded on one of Sir Walter's romances, the names of Minna, Troil, &c., together with the chosen locality (one of the Shetland Isles), being identified with "The Pirate," but there the resemblance ends, for there is no connection whatever with the simple plot of the opera and the wild and characteristic story of the novel. The music, though not of the starling class of the great masters, is far above mediocrity—composed with great fidelity to its subject, and evincing that M. Dietch is a classical and sound musician, thoroughly acquainted with effect, and how to produce it without straining after absurdities and anomalies, a besetting sin in many a greater composer. Independent of the author's and composer's pretensions, the artists who produced some splendid scenery not a little aided the success of the piece; while of the execution of the music by the principal vocalists (foremost amongst whom, as usual, stood Madame Dorus Gras), the chorus, and the orchestra, we cannot speak in terms too approving. A pleasing ballet also enlivened the scene, and the ensemble was received with the most unqualified testimonies of approbation.

OPERA COMIQUE.—Auber has a new opera for this house, which will be ready by the 10th of next month. It will be succeeded by another, by Balfe. M. Scribe is dramatic scribe to the two composers.

MADEMOISELLE RACHEL.—This young tragedian has made another great "hit" in the late M. Lemercier's revived tragedy of Fredegonde et Brunchant. The Parisian critics who are unshackled by a certain clique against this lady pronounce her to be the "greatest actress of our day." They might say more than this—she is of the same school, and fit to have played with our impassioned and unequalled Kean.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE VIOLET.

Pallentes violas summant.um tactas colore.

BY J. A. WADE, ESQ.

I.

I have a violet,
That a lovely one
Gave me one night;
Its scent is gone
Its beauty, too,
Is faded!—
The sweet blue
That made it
Such a beauteous bell
Now lies within its wither'd cell
Pale and blighted!
In my foolish brain,
That luckless hour
When by the moon
She gave the flow'r,
A hope came on—
'Twas Heav'n!
That hope is gone—
'Twas giv'n
By the sweet look that gave
The violet—in my heart's grave
'Tis now benighted!

II.

What was that hope?
A silly dream,
That plunged me deep
Within a stream
Of joyfulness
That cheated
Of happiness
That fleeted,
And left me, sad and lone,
My early disappointed mean
To mad for ever!
'Twas that her love
From that sweet look
I yet might have
But it forsook
My hapless mind
Ere morrow—
And left behind
The sorrow
Of knowing I could be
Her very heart's idolatry,
But shall—oh! never!

W.

SONNET TO RA.

So young, so fair! Hast thou a cause to mourn?
Is Sorrow's hand already on thy yoke?
Are the soft joy-strings of thy light heart torn,
That thus thy lids are fill'd with pearly tears?—
Or was't the drooping of thy lily brow,
That sudden shook the dew from out the cells
Of those dark violets, thine eyes, whence now
It falls adown each rose-cheek? no!—there dwells
A melancholy in thy mien, that I
Would not see there for all the breathing earth;—
For thou art, sweet! my Heav'n beneath the sky.
Strange, then, that Heav'n should give to Sorrow birth!
'Twas LOVE, in frolic, sent those tear-drops so,
That I might kiss them off and dry thy woe!

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

General Sir Wm. Clinton will succeed General Sir George Townshend Wyker as Lieutenant-Governor of Chelsea Hospital.

The following alterations have been made in the reliefs of regiments, ordered last August:—The 2nd battalion 97th to go to the Ionian Islands, to relieve the 88th Regiment, which is to be moved to Gibraltar, to take the place of the 5th Foot, ordered home. The 2nd battalion 42nd to go to Malta, to take the place of the 19th, which is to go to the Ionian Islands, to relieve the 1st battalion 42nd, which is to join the 2nd battalion at Malta. The 1st battalion Rifle Brigade to go from Malta to the Ionian Islands, to take the place of the 77th, which is to relieve the 33rd at Jamaica, in order that the latter may succeed the 70th in Canada, proceeding home. The 33rd is to be withdrawn from the West Indies, and sent to Halifax, to relieve the 64th, which is to return home. The practical effect of this arrangement is to diminish the force in the Windward and Leeward Islands to the extent of one regiment.

A Hampshire paper says that so numerous are the men-of-war seamen now unemployed that the crew of the Pique were paraded in a few days. Hundreds of fine able-bodied seamen will be entirely lost to the service unless a sea-going ship is soon commissioned to receive them.

The following vessels, with the 25th regiment on board, have arrived at Madras, viz.:—The Neptune on the 25th of September; the Ocean Queen on the 26th of September, from the Cape of Good Hope; and the General Kyd on the 4th of October, from Gravesend.

LYMINGTON.—The mails of the ship Prince Albert, Captain Bruton, from Madras, were landed at this port on Tuesday. The letters brought by her were contained in three immense chests. A steps came in to her and took them to Southampton, from whence they were forwarded to the General Post office by railway.

PORTSMOUTH.—Letters from the Inconstant, 36, Captain Michell, contradict the report of that ship being ordered home. She was at Malta on the 8th instant, preparing to proceed to the coast of Syria, having taken on board her marine's provisions. The Vanguard, 80, Captain Lord John Hay, may be daily expected from Gibraltar, having on board the late governor, General Sir Alexander Woodford, G.C.B., and suite. The brigantine Arrow, by letters of the 25th August, was in Simon's Bay, Cape of Good Hope, preparing for sea, reported to proceed to England, viâ the west coast of Africa. The Arrow has been relieved on the South American station by the Pandora brig, Commander Sullivan, destined for surveying the coast near the Falsland Islands. The troop-ship Crocodile, Mr. Elson, master, was in Caraise Bay, Barbadoes, on the 8th October, retiring to proceed to Jamaica, en route to England. The Caracas, 26, Captain Lewis Jones, has proceeded to Chatham to be paid off, having landed her treasure, consisting of dollars and gold bars, and amounting to £36,000 dollars. Commanders Festing and Kenney took passengers, also seven invalid officers and seamen from the squadron. If found fit, she is to be re-commissioned. The Samarang, 26, has been commissioned for surveying service in the Chinese waters, to be commanded by Captain Edmund Heaver, who late brought home the Sulphur from that quarter. The St. Vincent, 120, is being stripped and otherwise getting ready to receive the flag of the new Admiral, Sir Charles Rowley, G.C.B. The Victory, 104, harbour guard ship of Rear-Admiral Hyde Parker, C.B., has been rumbled to her old moorings off Common Hard, from off Cold Harbour, Gosport. The Resistance, 42, Commander Patey, is in the harbour ready for service. Her ultimate destination is Quebec, but she will, in the first instance, go to Malta with a detachment of the 42nd Regiment. She will sail at the end of the week. The Brigantine Dolphin, late in command of Lieutenant B. Bisson, who died on the passage home from the west coast of Africa, remains at Spithead, and, it is expected, will go to Chatham to be paid off.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

The fine steam-ship Columbia, Captain Miller, took her departure from Liverpool on Saturday last with her Majesty's mails and a fair number of passengers for Halifax and Boston.

ST. PETERSBURG, Nov. 8. The river navigation was interrupted by ice on the 4th inst., when the bridges were removed. There had been previously a severe gale from the eastward with snow, and the ice made its appearance so suddenly that several lighters with goods for vessels at Cronstadt have been prevented from proceeding; some are fast in the ice between this and Cronstadt, and two are reported aground or lost. The ice is again in motion, but it is doubtful whether the loaded lighters will be able to make their passage to Cronstadt.

ST. UBES, Nov. 12. -Part of the wreck of a vessel built of oak (supposed British, and apparently laden with hazelnuts, the coast being strewed with them), has been driven ashore in sheets.

DESTRUCTION OF A LARGE STEAMER BY FIRE.—The following has been received at Lloyd's —"New Orleans, October 12. -The ship Hero, Captain Eleazer Smeaton, which arrived here yesterday from Havanna, reports that, on Thursday last, at about one o'clock in the morning, they were surprised at observing the reflection of an extensive conflagration in the horizon. They immediately made all sail in the direction from whence it proceeded, when, after going ten or twelve miles, they discovered it to be a vessel on fire. Upon coming up to her, at about seven o'clock, she proved to be a very large ship, unquestionably a steamer. The fire by that hour had almost consumed the deck, the masts had fallen overboard, and she was rapidly burning to the water's edge. They cruised round the wreck for an hour or two, till she went down, which took place almost instantaneously. Upon first coming up, no person appeared on board, nor was any boat about. They, however, saw a barque bearing away to the westward, which, it was supposed, must have received the crew and passengers. From the mark of an anchor, which was hanging at the cathead, and the appearance of several spars which were overboard, they judged the unfortunate steamer to be English." The New Orleans Bulletin, of the 13th of last month, contains a paragraph confirmatory of the above.

ARREST.—An English vessel, the Adventure, Captain W. Allen, was lately seized at Oporto, while on the point of sailing, with 1920 moedores (about £1,400) in silver coin of Portugal, an exportation which is contrary to law. The ship is sequestered, and the captain imprisoned.

LISBON, Nov. 21.—Part of the head of a vessel, marked in large gilt letters "James Gibson," has been picked up near here.

SOUTHEND.—SHIPWRECKS AND NARROW ESCAPE.—On the 19th inst. ships were driven on that dangerous and well-known sand, the Nore, some drawing their anchors, running into each other, bowsprits crashing and smashing in every direction. When the anxious, by looked-for daylight came, the water was covered with pieces of spars, masts, boats, spritsails, &c. A large brig, called the Robinson, was seen to be in a dangerous situation, when one of the look-out boats made to her, and remained by her but a little time, for they were obliged to hasten into the boat and leave her, as she fell down on her beam-ends, and became a total wreck in a few minutes. The boat succeeded in saving the ship's crew, eight in number, and landed them safely at Southend. The Caroline brought in a ship's long-boat, a seaman's chest, two hammocks, &c. The Duke of Wellington smack succeeded in getting a schooner off the sand, and took her to London. Anchors and chains are to be found in numbers under the Nore. The yawls are coming in with coals, &c., which have been taken from the ships that have been obliged to throw overboard; the Dart smack has brought in a ship's mainmast and rigging, and the Southend watermen have not been so busy for some time. The James and Susan yaw. put her boat off to a ship in distress, but could not make her, and was blown away for some time

LOSS OF THE RUSHEN CASTLE.—Information was on Saturday last received of the total loss of the Rushen Castle, Captain Carrall, which unfortunate event occurred on the night of Tuesday last in Port St. Mary Bay. The vessel was laden with a general cargo. On her passage from D nnk to Liverpool she has taken the bay for shelter, a strong westerly gale having sprung up, when in consequence of it increasing, the anchors and cables gave way and she drove on the rock at the entrance of the harbour, where, in the course of a few hours she became a total wreck. The crew and passengers happily were saved through the exertions of the coast-guard service, who are deserving the utmost praise.

LOSS OF THE RELIANCE EAST INDIAMAN.

We last week had the melancholy duty assigned us of recording the particulars of the wreck of the above ill-fated vessel, an occurrence which will long be explored, not only in this country or contiguous to the scene of the awful catastrophe, but all over the world wherever the heartrending details are communicated. The accompanying sketch represents the appalling situation of the doomed ship at a moment alike awful to actors and beholders; and subjoined we have given such further particulars of the fatal entabelevent as have been collected from the survivors of the crew, who arrived in London on Tuesday last.

The Madras steam vessel brought over the whole of the surviving members, with the exception of Dixon, the carpenter, who is still detained by the consul, Mr. Hamilton, for the purpose of identifying the dead; only twelve Lascars, out of the 109 persons lost, having been picked up when Captain Stock left.

The following statement was made by O'Neil, an intelligent foremast man, and one of the two Englishmen saved, who was on deck when the vessel struck:—

O'Neil states that they had remarkably thick and hazy weather for some days previous to the 13th instant, and on Friday they shortened sail, and the lead was kept going. At half past twelve at night one of the crew, named Thomas, whose watch it was on the forecastle, reported that he saw lights, and soon after they were distinctly observed by several others on the larboard and starboard. The second mate, Mr. Green, was on duty at the time, and said that those on the weather bow were a ship's lights, and added, "Harris, keep the light on the lee-beam is Dungeness. We shall be in the Downs this morning." They then steered north, and thought they were running for the Downs. Their course was east by north, as it was given at twelve o'clock, when the look-out was relieved. About one o'clock Captain Green and Mr. Wash, the chief mate, came on deck, and the captain immediately gave orders to wear the ship and heave the lead. As the vessel answered her helm, the quartermaster gave the sounding, "By the hard deep, six." At this moment the vessel was under close-reefed fore and main topsails; was paying off by the wind and gradually going round on the other tack. A seaman named Alonzo was at the wheel at this time, and as the vessel rounded her heel touched the bottom, and she struck heavily on the sand. The shock is described by O'Neil as being terrific in the extreme. His language was, "It struck me as if I had had hold of an electrical machine." The whole of the crew rushed on deck, and before any orders could be given she shifted slightly, and became more firmly embedded. This motion was repeated five or six times in rapid succession, and it was the opinion of the officers that the ship's back was broken by the force of the concussion. The line was getting strong in, and the captain immediately ordered signals of distress to be hoisted. It was the opinion of all on board that they were off the English coast, and the captain, seeing that there was no hope of saving the ship, desired several of the crew to cut away the mainmast. This was immediately commenced, and in a few moments it went over to leeward with a terrific crash. The foremast soon followed, and, in falling, broke the leg of a young midshipman named Forde; but the imminent danger of all had not prevented, even at this crisis, every attention being shown him; this fractured limb was carefully set by the surgeon, and the poor lad was conveyed to the captain's cabin, where he remained until the breaking up of the ship obliged some of the crew to place him on the poop. While Forde was lying in the cabin, O'Neil and two other seamen made their way there and took away a musket, a couple of pistols, and a bag of powder, with which they fired signals from the poop. O'Neil admits that those of the crew engaged in firing the signal guns got to the spirit casks and drank to excess. Subsequently, at the captain's direction, who, according to O'Neil, manifested the greatest coolness and presence of mind, lights were placed in the mizen rigging in order to point out their position to any boats that might come off to their assistance. The sea was now tremendous; and as the vessel rolled her bottom could be distinctly heard breaking up. The water rushed in, and her cargo of tea, becoming wet, burst up the decks, which for some time previous had been dangerous to stand upon, from the planks opening and shaking, whereby the feet of several seamen were pinched between the seams. Three hours had now elapsed since the vessel struck, and the day was beginning to break. The captain, with the officers and passengers, five of the crew, were on the fore part of the vessel, to which still held together, the sea making a breach right over her. Chests of tea floated one by one on the surface, indicating that a portion of the bottom was entirely gone. Orders were now given to cut away the long boat, and, from the injuries she had sustained from the falling of the masts and the rolling of the ship, she was found to be useless. There were two other boats on board, but their condition at this time, as O'Neil states, was such as to render them of no service. The Europeans among the crew were then desired by the officers to construct a raft; but this could not be accomplished. In fact, O'Neil admits that the crew refused to work at it. His statement is, "While some of them were working at it, one said to the other, 'Why don't you lend a hand?' 'I shan't work if you don't'—and they all left off together." Seven of the crew soon got a rope on the main mast, rigging it and gone to leeward, where, amidst the loose chests of tea and spars, and in a precarious position, they continued for some time. The vessel held together until eight o'clock a.m., rolling fearfully from side to side with the sweep of the ocean, and drenching the crew continually. About this time Captain Green, the first mate, Mr. Walsh, and several others left the poop of the ship to take refuge with the sailors in the floating spars and rigging of the main-mast; Captain Tucker and many others still remaining on the after-part of the vessel. Shortly before nine o'clock, as nearly as can be ascertained, the vessel parted midships, the sea breaking right through her, and in a few moments she was a complete wreck, portions of her timber floating about in all directions. Numbers of the crew sank immediately, and were entirely lost sight of amidst the breakers. Captain Tucker was among this number. The captain, Mr. Walsh, O'Neill, the sailmaker, the armourer, and several others still clung to the mainmast and rigging, which, being released from the vessel, floated towards the land. At this period, and, indeed, for some length of time previous, the people on the coast were distinctly observed running to and fro, but no boats put off to render assistance. The floating timber from the wreck wheeled round by the violence of the sea struck off many of the poor wretches who had taken refuge on those portions of it still above water, and the incessant fatigue which the crew had been subjected to for some hours rendered their efforts at swimming towards the shore, a distance of nearly three miles, extremely feeble. Captain Green, who was nearly sixty years of age, became so weak that he lost his hold several times, and fell into the sea. Mr. Walsh called out to the sailors, "Pull up the captain, boys," and he was raised on to the timbers more than once. The last time he was taken out of the water he was found to be insensible; but the men still assisted in holding him on. About half-past nine o'clock the loose spars became so exposed to the sea as no longer to afford protection against its violence, and the greater number of those who had sought refuge upon them were washed off. O'Neil, plunged into the sea and seized a plank; at the moment of doing so several sailors clung to him. He was compelled to strike them off to save his own life; but one of the Malays reached the shore with himself.

O'Neill states that as daylight broke men on horseback were observed on the shore; but he states most distinctly that no boat was put off, and no attempt whatever made to save the crew. Both the Malay and O'Neill were insensible on reaching the shore.

Two very affecting documents, which we regret our limited space obliges us to exclude, have been published during the week, in reference to this melancholy catastrophe: one, a letter written at sea by Captain Green to his brother, on the 4th instant, and received since the wreck; and the other written by one of the mates to his mother at Newcastle, which he intended sending on shore with the pilot, twenty-eight hours before the calamity occurred, and which was afterwards picked up on the French coast.

The French coast where the Reliance was wrecked is of shallow sand, and has no inhabitants upon it except a few fishermen. The French say they heard the first signals fired, and answered them by firing from the shore, and hoisting flags as soon as it was daylight. They further allege that they launched two boats, which made some progress towards the wreck, but were compelled to put back. Both O'Neill and the carpenter deny this, and the latter says it is true he saw them "fingering" the boats, but there was no attempt made to put them off.

It is the opinion of the survivors that had properly-appointed life-boats been launched all on board might have been saved; and, but for the expectation that daylight would bring assistance, many of the crew would have reached the shore.

With the exception of a French fishing-boat, the Reliance had not met a single vessel for some days previous to the wreck. This boat was met on the day before the melancholy occurrence, and was hailed to know how the land bore. The answer of the Frenchman was not understood, and the Reliance lay to that some one from the fishing-boat might come on board. At first it appeared the intention of the crew to send off a boat, but, after nearing the ship, she filled her sails and went right away.

The Reliance came on shore in six or eight pieces, the keel lying out at sea about half a mile. The portions of the wreck sold for 43,000*l*. The chronometers of the vessel were thrown on the beach, but the cases only were found, the chronometers having been stolen. A singular fact is that at the time the body of Captain Green was found his watch was still going.

The names of those brought over in the Magnet are John O'Neill, a native of Kingstown, Ireland, John Anderson, a Norwegian; Charles Boetz, a Prussian; and three Malays, all common seamen. On their landing at London-bridge-wharf they expressed their thanks to Captain Stock, for his kind attention to them while on board. Shortly after, by the direction of Mr. Robert Green, five of them were conveyed in a hackney-coach to the Sailors' Home, Wellclose-square, until arrangements could be made for their return to their several homes.

O'Neill, who is suffering from the injuries he received while on the wreck, is at present under the care of a friend residing at Shadwell.

The Boulogne Gazette of Monday night says that in a short time after the Reliance struck the bulwarks were beaten in by the heavy sea, and the gangway ports carried clean off. The pumps were tried, but at that time she made no water. At daylight the whole of the interior of the vessel was gutted, the beams even gone, the forecastle and poop alone remaining; but a British seaman's energy never deserts him. The third mate, boatswain, and ten men determined to try their fate in the only boat that would swim; the captain dissuaded them from the attempt, but one seaman replied "Well, sir, we must trust to Providence. If we land in safety, we will aid those lubbers (alluding to the parties on the shore) to launch that boat, and quickly come to your rescue." They started, but had not proceeded 300 yards when a tremendous sea struck her, and capsized the boat. For a minute or two they were seen clinging to her sides, and then all disappeared. At nine o'clock strength and hope were deserting all—the succour they expected came not—no boat left the shore—the effect of despair became visible. Some madly threw themselves into the sea to swim ashore, and quickly perished; some sunk, helplessly, through the openings in the wreck, and disappeared. Captain Green, Captain Tucker, the mate, and some of the midshipmen had kept together under the lee of the broken-up poop, that still adhered to the stern of the vessel, when the strength of Captain Green forsook him, and he fell into the sea.

VIEW OF FUNCHAL—ISLAND OF MADEIRA.

DREADFUL STORM AT MADEIRA.

In the last number of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS we had barely space to make mention of a most calamitous deluge which visited the Island of Madeira, and by which many hundreds of living souls were swept into an untimely eternity. Funchal, the capital of the island, suffered upon this occasion, it appears, more severely than any other portion of it, a circumstance which induces us to present our readers with the above accurate sketch of that now painfully-interesting spot.

It is with feelings of no ordinary regret we find ourselves compelled to place, in the same sheet with the glorious and peaceful tidings from the East, those sad and afflicting particulars of disasters by sea and land (of which the subject now under our observation is, alas! only a part), and which cannot fail to affect every human breast, however disposed to joyousness. On the 15th of October (as the accounts state) clouds began to envelop the mountains in the neighbourhood of Funchal, which brought on the following day severe thunder-storms, accompanied with heavy rain, almost continuing without intermission until the morning of the 24th of October, when the rain partly ceased. At 10 o'clock the Royal West India steamer Dee arrived, and landed fifty-two passengers for the island. She was, however, prevented from proceeding until the following day, as the Admiralty agent, who had come on shore with the mail, could not get on board again.

About midday the whole of the island appeared buried in one vast cloud, threatening total darkness; the barometer fell considerably. The air became very oppressive, with a strong sulphurous smell, and the wind veered about to nearly every point of the compass. At one o'clock the rain began to fall in torrents, and about an hour afterwards was observable an immense rising in the sea, about a mile from the shore, which was soon connected with a mass of dark clouds overhanging the bay, to all appearance charging themselves or drawing the water from the sea, for the space of about ten minutes, followed immediately by a heavy swell or rising of the ocean, which appeared high enough to sweep over the city; its force, however, was broken, and it subsided on the beach. The rain still continued in torrents, and at four o'clock the bridge was swept away, and the water rushed into the streets. The appalling sight that appeared in every direction was enough to make the stoutest heart quake with fear. Hundreds of men, women, and children, were wading their way up the stream, flying towards the mountains, whilst others were flocking to the town, not knowing where to go for safety, amidst the most dreadful shrieks and cries that could possibly be imagined. The water burst open the wine-lodges, and the contents were swept into the sea, whilst the streets in the neighbourhood were all overflowed with water, and the inmates of the houses escaped by ladders and over the roofs of the buildings. Upwards of 200 houses were thus destroyed, or became untenantable by this disastrous flood. A meeting was called on the following day (25th) by the governor, and food distributed to the poor; at the same time an arrangement was made to open several forts, &c., for their accommodation, until such time as they could provide themselves with other houses. The authorities also made every arrangement to prevent drunkenness in the streets, and robberies at night; but as casks of wine were rolling about in every direction, and whole streets of houses open to any one who wished to enter, the inmates having fled, many robberies occurred, and many scenes of intoxication. The rain continued to fall during the night of the 24th, but the following day gave signs of the storm abating, and in the afternoon it was fine, but with a strong breeze from the south-east, which continued until three p.m. on the 26th, when it blew a hurricane from the south, the sea rushing over the beach, and entering into the streets in the lower part of the city. Six vessels were at anchor in the bay, but it appeared utterly impossible for them to ride out the gale, as the sea broke with terrific fury over them, and the wind, being dead into the port, left no chance of escaping by making sail. At five o'clock the American brig Creole dragged her anchor and was soon on shore—the whole of the crew were saved; and about an hour afterwards the English schooner Wave was doomed to the same fate, the whole of her crew being saved by the exertions of Mr. Henry Crawford, who secured them ropes, &c., from a rock above where the vessel struck. It had now become dark, but a blue light was observable from one of the vessels, and cries were heard from another approaching the shore. This proved to be the Portuguese schooner Novo Beijinho; and every exertion was made to save the whole of the crew, but, unfortunately, four of them were drowned. Immediately afterwards a vessel approached burning a blue light, which came on shore alongside the Novo Beijinho; but, as the rain fell in torrents, and the wind was still blowing a perfect hurricane, it was some time ere she could be approached. She proved to be the brig Dart, of London; and by great courage and good management all the crew were saved. The daring conduct of the Portuguese on the beach in rescuing the crew of this vessel, particularly Senhor Jacinto de Freitas Lomelino, as well as the activity of Senhor Nuno Dias, Senhor Francisco Antonio Rodrigues da Silva, and of Mr. Unwin, all of whom were indefatigable in their exertions to save the unfortunate seamen, is the subject of great praise. The Sardinian schooner Gloria Madre Esperanza was found to have gone on shore to the east of Funchal, and not a soul saved or vestige of her left. At nine o'clock the wind veered to S.W. At nine a.m. the following morning the Success got out to sea, but the wreck of a three-masted vessel was found at Porto Cruz (north of Madeira) without any of the crew, or even anything to distinguish her name. It is utterly impossible to describe the state of the streets in the lower part of the city, and the wonder is that the greatest part of Funchal was not carried into the sea; at the mouth of the river N. S. do Calhao, a fruit-market, and a part of a fort, with the entrance to the Praça Academica, were entirely swept away, and the bed of this river, formerly thirty or forty feet deep, wasfilled up with immense rocks and stones brought down from the mountains, which, it is feared, in the present poor state of Portugal, can never be removed. Three rivers pass through the city of Funchal, taking their rise in the mountains, but the river N. S. do Calhao has now been the cause of the greatest part of the disasters, and the houses on its banks that are not swept away will remain untenanted, as the bed of the river is now nearly even with the streets, and liable at any time to overflow. The news from the interior, or, rather, the coast—for fromthe interior we have none—is awful. Half of Machio is swept away, and all the fishing-boats belonging to the village. In the parish of Madalena nearly all the houses and part of the population are gone; in Catheta many houses are washed away. Fayal and Porto Cruz have suffered much, entire vineyards having been swept into the sea. Santa Cruz has suffered less than others; but at Canico the disasters are great. The excellent road to S.A. de Serra has disappeared altogether. The village of Camacha is in a most deplorable condition: in fact, all the places have suffered more or less, and most of the roads leading from Funchal are utterly impassable. On the 26th the bishop, with the governor, and all the principal authorities, attended prayers in the Cathedral, after which they had a procession, carrying the figure of our Saviour on the cross, the size of life, as the Saviour of Miracles in having saved the city from being altogether destroyed.

The latest dates from Funchal are Nov. 2, which state that they are still without news from the interior of the island, but from all places on the coast the intelligence is truly distressing. Another Sardinian schooner was wrecked at Porto Santa; and the Aguia, from Lisbon, which was eight days off the island, had a narrow escape. The Success returned, and the following vessels have also arrived since the storm: English war-steamer Wilberforce, from Sierra Leone; ship Thames, from London; schooner Castle Loriam, from St. John's; American schooner Itho, from St. John's; Greek polacca Pelican, from Gibraltar; and the Portuguese schooner Aguia, from Lisbon.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XXI.

LORD ABERDEEN.

Place to the Minister' Here is one of the chief advisers of the Crown—England's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and just now fortunate enough to find himself in office at the successful termination of a couple of wars. Lord Aberdeen holds the position of Secretary for Foreign Affairs for the second time; and, under the Government of the Duke of Wellington, he was once Colonial Minister. It is probable that those who recollect his administration in the latter capacity are not accustomed to invest it in their memories with any beau ideal of statesmanship, nor, on the other hand, to execrate it with any peculiar spite. He pursued in it the old quiet régime of the Toryism of the day; and during all the struggles for emancipation he kept what he doubtless considered the unobtrusive path of duty, allowing debaters to blow their own fires, and colonists to work their own niggers, without disturbing them with more ministerial interference than a strict line of prudence warranted his laying down. He kept up the activity of office; but he never for ambition's sake pushed his vessel into a storm. He was not chivalrously busy, like Lord Stanley; nor unchivalrously sleepy, like Lord Glenelg. He would neither have given twenty millions to the negroes, nor have snored away his existence in a Downing-street arm-chair. He was simply a very useful and a very satisfactory Colonial Secretary.

As a Secretary for Foreign Affairs Lord Aberdeen is accounted by men of sound judgment and experience cool, sagacious, cautious, skilful, even wise. He has all the reflective foresight of the Scotch—is a word-keeper (one of the best attributes of a minister)—evinces marked discrimination in his mode of conducting official negotiations—and has that kind of positive merit which we award to a public functionary when we say "he knows his business." He has the quality of discretion; and the remark which the Lord Mayor made with reference to Sir Robert Peel's being "a safe man" would probably apply to Lord Aberdeen better than to any other member of the existing Administration.

We cannot better describe his lordship's personal appearance than by availing ourselves, of a slight sketch written by a gentleman, whilst at a visit at Gordon castle, where Lord Aberdeen was staying at that time.

"Lord Aberdeen has the name of being the proudest and coldest aristocrat in England. It is amusing to see the person who bears such a character. He is of the middle height, rather clumsily made, with an address more of sober dignity than of pride or reserve. With a black coat, much worn, and always too large for him; a pair of coarse check trousers, very ill-made; a waistcoat buttoned up to the throat; and a cravat of the most primitive negligé, his aristocracy is certainly not in dress. His manners are of absolute simplicity, amounting almost to want of style. He crosses his hands behind him, and balances on his heels. In conversation his voice is low and cold, and he seldom smiles. Yet there is a certain benignity in his countenance, and an indefinable superiority and high breeding in his simple address, that would betray his rank after a few minutes' conversation to any shrewd observer. It is only in his manner toward the ladies that he would be immediately distinguishable from men of lower rank in society."

The American boundary question is another feather in his cap, according to the way in which these successes are accustomed to be argued, and this and the Oriental triumphs make three as "good hits" as have achieved the reputation of many a minister. If the French treaty had come off, it would have been quite a glorious succession of diplomatic fortunes.

Lord Aberdeen is the fourth earl of his race, descended from the first peer, who was a judge. He is a Knight of the Thistle, a Privy Councillor, a fellow of the Royal Society, and much more. He is president of the British Institution and the Society of Antiquaries, and the Chancellor of King's College, Aberdeen. He has been twice married, first to a daughter of the first Marquis of Abercorn, and secondly to the daughter of the Hon. J. Douglas. He sits in the House of Lords as Viscount Gordon, with the second title of Lord Haddo.

GROUP FROM "KING ARTHUR."

Here is another episode of theatrical grouping selected from Dryden's dramatic opera of King Arthur, now so magnificently produced by Macready at Drury Lane. We have already expressed our opinion of the opera itself—of Dryden's not too finished lyrics—of Purcell's more inspiring harmony; and we have only here to indicate that point of its beautiful scenic illustration which our artist has selected for his theme. This, then, is a glimpse of the fairy land of the poem—the enchanted wood—by which Arthur is approaching the bridge, when the two syrens rise before him from the water with the following luring song:—

> Two daughters of this aged stream are we;
> And both our sea-green locks have comb'd for thee;
> Come bathe with us an hour or two;
> Come naked in, for we are so;
> What danger from a naked foe?
> Come bathe with us, come bathe, and share
> What pleasures in the floods appear;
> We'll beat the waters till they bound,
> And circle round, around, around,
> And circle round, around.

To this we add a portrait of Anderson in the part of the King, which he is just now sustaining with considerable applause. Mr. Anderson may be generally spoken of as one of the most promising actors of his day, having a good voice, an easy carriage, and very considerable power and energy in the developement of passion upon the stage. He acquired in the outset of his London career a habit of imitating the manner of Macready, but he is gradually divesting himself of the character of a copyist, and has given quite as many indications of natural originality as confirm the inference, that imitation, however good, is, to say the least, unnecessary. He has some stage blemishes of declamation, and would probably meet with higher appreciation were he in some measure to subdue his style.

MR. ANDERSON, AS THE KING.

Dr. Whitfield, the celebrated botanist, sailed last week for the African coast, in search of natural curiosities.

THE MURDER OF LORD NORBURY.—By a letter dated Poonah, September 29th, from a surgeon in one of the East India artillery regiments, which arrived by the last overland mail, we learn that the murderer of the late Lord Norbury has been discovered. It seems that the murderer was in one of the regiments stationed at Bombay. He was attacked with a violent illness, and, thinking himself on the point of death, made a confession before his officers that he was the man who shot Lord Norbury. By means of great medical skill the man had got better, and the Government had immediately taken the matter in hand, but had conducted everything connected with the affair with such secrecy, that nothing further had transpired.

TULIPOMANIA.—The sum of £640 has been lately given for the bulb of a new tulip, called the "Citadel of Antwerp."

THE POPE AND THE PACHA.—Seven Egyptian workers in mosaic (who are about to repair to Rome at the expense of their Government to perfect themselves in the art) are to be the bearers of a new gift to the Sovereign Pontiff from Mehemet Ali, viz., four large granite columns, recently found in the neighbourhood of Thebes, and covered with hieroglyphics.

Sir J. Hamlyn Williams, Bart., brother-in-law of Earl Fortescue, will, it is said, come forward in the Liberal interest for the representation of Carmarthenshire, vacant by the decease of Mr. J. Jones.

The Mahomedans resident in Paris are about to have a small mosque erected in the Quartier Beaujon, in which to celebrate their worship.

DEATH OF LADY CALCOTT.—Her ladyship, who was the wife of Sir A. Calcott, the Royal Academician, died on Monday at Kensington. She was the daughter of Rear-Admiral George Dundas, and relict of Captain Thomas Graham, R.N., and was married to Sir A. Calcott in 1827.

COUNTRY NEWS.

BADDINGTON.—Last week a determined attempt to commit suicide was made by a young woman, named Harriet Larby, at Baddington, near Midhurst. It appears she jumped down a well upwards of 70 feet deep, but her clothes partially buoyed her up; she went twice under the water, when she repented of the act and caught hold of a projecting stone about two feet from the water's edge. She remained in this state an hour, when her cries brought several persons to her assistance, and she was brought up from her perilous situation; and the only injury she received was a good ducking.

BATH.—Major Jebb, of the Royal Engineers, was despatched by Sir James Graham last week to Bath, officially to inspect the Bath new prison, and in company with the gallant officer examined the building in all the departments. He expressed himself satisfied with the arrangements, but gave an intimation that, to carry out fully the object of the Government in prison regulations, it was probable some enlargement would be hereafter required.

BRISTOL.—The amount collected at the anniversary dinner of Colston's Charity, Bristol, was upwards of £1000.

CAMBRIDGE.—John Frederick Mortlock, the young gentleman who attempted to assassinate his uncle, the Rev. E. Mortlock, a fellow of Christ's College (mention of which occurrence was made in our last edition last week), was brought before the Mayor and other magistrates of the borough, when, after hearing the witnesses for the accusation, the prisoner was committed to take his trial on the capital charge at the next assizes. It will be remembered that the prisoner made his escape from the window of his uncle's apartment, by fastening two hunting whips together, by which he descended into the college gardens; but he was apprehended a few hours afterwards at several miles down the river at Baitsbite, by some men connected with the lock in that neighbourhood, at whom he fired two shots, luckily without any fatal effect, whilst endeavouring to escape. The following is the history of this painful transaction as detailed in the evidence of the rev. gentleman, whose life had nearly fallen a sacrifice on the occasion. The Rev. E. Mortlock, having been sworn, gave the following evidence:—Is a fellow of Christ College, in the Cambridge University, and was in his rooms with Mr. Mitchell, of the Eagle, the previous evening. He was disturbed about a quarter past eight by the door of his room being burst open. The prisoner entered the room, witness sitting with his back to the door. Witness arose and faced the prisoner, who immediately presented a pistol, and drew the trigger. From the noise witness fancied it had gone off, but was mistaken, as the cap only had exploded. Mr. Mitchell was in his chair, and witness's nephew then drew a dagger from its sheath, and raised it as if to strike, and witness thinks he used a threat to use it if he was interfered with. At this moment Mr. Mitchell left the room, and the prisoner approached, and witness was collared by him. He at the same time used some strong language, charging him with robbing the prisoner of his property. Witness replied in a mild and collected tone, to the effect, "You are mistaken, John; I have no property of yours, I cannot have." Some further words took place on both sides; on his part with excitement and violence, and on that of witness with composure. It was followed by prisoner asking, "What is to prevent me shooting you dead this moment?" Witness replied, "It would do you more harm than it would me." His arm was all this while raised, and pistol pointed. The dagger was afterwards found on the floor. Witness still endeavoured to dissuade him from violence, being all this time held by the collar, with a pistol pointed at his body. Prisoner then asked if witness would swear or pledge himself not to prosecute or injure him. Witness replied, "I never have injured you, John; I have no wish to do so now." He repeated, in an imperious tone, the demand that he would not prosecute him by law. Witness again replied, "I will not injure you, and have never done so." Mr. Cartmell then entered the room, and the prisoner again repeated his inquiry whether witness would engage not to prosecute him by law; witness did not reply; and the prisoner lowered the pistol rapidly, so—(on a level with the abdomen).—Prisoner: No, it was not so.—Witness continued: He then immediately fired before he could repeat his previous answer. Witness felt that he was wounded, and, on examination, was surprised to find it so slight. It is a round wound, the circumference, and a little blacker, but black in the centre; there was a small quantity of blood issued; the ball has been since found; the trousers witness had on were pierced in two places where the flap is doubled over, and also the drawers and shirt (produced); there is a corresponding hole in each, and a small quantity of blood on the shirt; the ball was found by witness on the ground after taking off his clothes before retiring to bed (and after having had the wound examined by Mr. Ficklin); he supposed that it shook out of his drawers, to his great distress, as he had hoped that his nephew had made off without being discovered. (The witness here appeared much affected.) Witness then sent his servant, who entered, for Mr. Shaw and Mr. Cartmell, that they might see the ball, which he handed to Mr. Fisher, who marked and took charge of it; the abrasion on the skin is about the size of a shilling; witness heard the garden bell ring, which is a noise that prisoner has no doubt made making his escape from the window; the second pistol was cocked when he first raised it. The deposition of Mr. Mortlock was read over at the conclusion of his evidence, and the prisoner having been asked whether he wished to put any questions to the reverend gentleman, replied, "Yes. He mentions he has no property of mine, but, as the executor of my father, I wish to ask him if he was not a partner in the bank for many years?" Mr. Mortlock replied Yes; but the magistrates decided that the question had nothing to do with the offence.—Prisoner: Is the witness aware, and can he swear, that he ever dissolved partnership?—Mr. Mortlock could not answer that.—Prisoner: And what are the consequences? Why, that you and your brother are, as I am informed, liable to a criminal indictment at the Old Bailey.—Mr. Mortlock: It had better be brought.—Prisoner (warmly): I appeal to the magistrates on their consciences whether they do not know that my father was a partner in that bank, and of the truth of the circumstances I am stating?—The magistrates had nothing to do with that; it was out of their province; it is not any part of your province to protect the poor and oppressed? I put these questions merely to explain the position in which I stand with regard to these two relatives of mine.—Mr. Twiss objected to this as irrelevant; and the next witness, the Rev. James Cartmell, gave evidence to the fact stated by the first witness, and, after other corroborative evidence, the mayor said, "John Frederick Mortlock, you stand committed to take your trial at the next Lent assizes for felony." The young man was then removed in custody, saying, as he left the room, "He did not care how soon he was hanged." Altogether it was a most distressing scene.

A serious accident occured last week to an undergraduate of this university, on his return with some companions from Littlebury. The party consisted of two tandems, and a race commenced near Shelford. Arriving to a critical mo drags, and, after dragging the river for about three quarters of an hour, he found the body of deceased deeply embedded in the mud, close to Putney-bridge. He appears to have been about 30 years of age, five feet seven inches in height, and of light complexion. Verdict, "That deceased destroyed himself, but there is not sufficient evidence to prove his state of mind at the time he did so."

DREADFUL SUICIDE.—On Wednesday morning an inquest was held before Mr. Wakley, M.P., at the Cumberland Arms, Paddington-green, on view of the body of Joseph Johnson, aged 35, a carpenter in the employ of Messrs. Smith and Son, builders, Edgware road. William Harris, of 26, Parkplace, Paddington, stated that deceased was his lodger. On Tuesday evening last, witness, not having seen anything of deceased for some days, went to his room to see him. Witness found the door locked, and having knocked repeatedly without receiving any answer, he (witness) became alarmed, and caused the door of deceased's room to be broken open, when the unfortunate man was discovered suspended by a cord round his neck to the bed-post. The only cause that could be assigned for it was having come into the room at that time in a state of intoxication of his wife, who at present has about six months ago. Verdict, "Temporary insanity."

CORONERS' INQUESTS.

Mr. Payne, the city coroner, held an inquest at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, on Monday evening last, on the body of a stonemason, named James Lees, employed at the new Royal Exchange, who was suddenly seized on that morning with a violent fit of coughing and spitting of blood, which ended in his almost immediate death. Verdict, "Natural death."

Another case exactly similar to the above was inquired into before the same learned gentleman, at the Swan with two Necks, Lad-lane, concerning the death of Mr. James Badfield, a Lee Is and Yorkshire warehouseman, residing at N. 15, Milk-street, Cheapside, who was proved to have been afflicted with a cough for some months past. His house was found full of blood in the morning. Verdict, "Died from suffocation by the bursting of a blood-vessel."

On Monday evening Mr. Wakley held an inquest at the Wheatsheaf, Red Lion street, on the body of Mr. T. Burchett, who had, at one time, carried on the business of a pawnbroker, in Upper Marylebone-street, and afterwards [illegible]

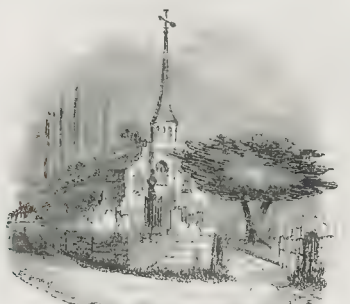
[illegible] tempted some time ago to destroy himself by throwing a knife into his throat, and afterwards had taken a large quantity of laudanum for the same purpose. On Saturday night last the deceased, on his return to his lodging, took out of his pocket a bottle of laudanum, from which he drank about two ounces of laudanum, in the presence of his wife, and told her it was brandy; but, on looking at the bottle, she discovered that it was labelled "Laudanum—poison." Mr. White, of Lamb's Conduit-street, was sent for, and, on arriving at the deceased's house, he found a quantity of blood in the water-closet, which he supposed had been vomited by the deceased, but all his efforts to counteract the effects of the poison were unavailing. The deceased continued in a state of stupor until Sunday morning, when he died. Verdict, "Destroying himself."

An unfortunate man, named William Marshall, of respectable connections, was committed to Newgate some time ago, on a charge of stealing a bundle of spectacles from a shopkeeper at Hounslow, which had such an effect on his mind that he gradually sank from the period of his committal until he expired a few days ago. An inquest was held on the body, when a verdict of "Natural death" was returned.

On Tuesday an inquest was held at St. George's Hospital, before Messrs. Gel and Higgs, upon the body of Sarah Wetherson, aged 34, whose death had been occasioned by her husband, a Chelsea pensioner. After hearing the evidence, the jury returned a verdict of "Manslaughter" against Robert Williamson, the husband, who was fully committed for trial.

Serious on a Gentleman Unknown.—On Tuesday an inquest was held before Mr. Wakley, at the Royal Oak, Putney, on view of the body of a gentleman found drowned. Robert Hathaway, waterman, stated that on Saturday morning he observed the deceased walking on the bank of the Thames, on the Middlesex side of Putney-bridge. He appeared to be suffering under violent mental agitation, and continued to walk up and down the bank of the river for upwards of half an hour, all which time he was using the most violent and extravagant gestures. Witness went away for about ten minutes, and then, on returning to the spot, he missed deceased, and was at the same time informed by a boy that a gentleman had just that moment thrown himself into the river. Witness immediately procured

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.



SWANSCOMBE CHURCH.

Swanscombe is one of the many picturesque villages which so pleasantly margin Old Father Thames as he flows steadily on between Kent and Essex to the sea. The fatal Niger, the mighty Amazon, the picturesque and historic Rhine, the classic Tiber—each and all have their scenes, their stories and associations. Each by turn claims notice, and each has goodly claim to attention. But commend us, and all Englishmen, to the Thames.

Swanscombe, whose church is here chosen for illustration, being well surrounded by wood, has a highly-picturesque appearance from the Thames, which forms the northern boundary of the parish. It is near Northfleet, about four miles from Dartford, and no great distance from Gravesend—Greenhithe, a spot familiar to the river tourist, being one of its hamlets. A Kentish village, with now about a thousand inhabitants, it has its share of Kentish history—half true, half legendary. Its name is said to be a corruption of Swaneskemp—Sweyn, King of Denmark, having landed near, and fixed his camp upon, this spot, in the days when the sea-kings of the north gathered a goodly portion of their revenues from our early ancestors. At a later period William the Norman here received a foretaste of the spirit of the men of Kent. They enclosed the Conqueror and his followers, bearing boughs in their hands, "which casting down, they prepared for battle, demanding the enjoyment of their former rights;" which, says the old chronicler, "they speedily obtained." No need to prompt the memory that Shakspere has employed this incident in Macbeth.

The history of the manor is too long to be here written, but is interesting, and gives a fair sample of the chequered stories attached to many an old baronial possession. Given originally to Odo, the Bishop of Bayeux, it passed, on his disgrace, to the family of Montchensie, one of whom was a chief leader of the rebellious barons who seized their King, Henry III., after fighting the battle of Lewes. Taken prisoner himself, at Kenilworth, bowed his life and lands to his sister's relationship to the monarch's half-brother. He was slain fighting against the Welsh, under the then regent, the Earl of Cornwall. A subsequent owner of Swanscombe, Aymer de Valence, attending the Queen into France, was murdered, in revenge, it was said, for the death of the Earl of Lancaster, at whose condemnation De Valence had sat two years before, at Pontefract. Still later, an heiress, entitled to these lands, was held prisoner at Kennington, in Surrey, and induced to give up her claims to Hugh le Despencer, Earl of Winchester, who, at ninety years of age, was, with his son, publicly executed, for taking part with the Queen against Edward II. Later still, the manor was granted to an Earl of Kent, who, in Edward the Third's reign, was "charged with treason, and, through the malice of Queen Isabel, executed for treason against the late King." And in this way goes on for some centuries the history of Swanscombe Manor—now handed over by a powerful baron, who, in the changing aspect of the times, becomes a traitor, the axe making way for a new proprietor; who, in his turn, by the fortune of war or other accident, loses at once station and life.

Swanscombe Church is the subject of our sketch. It is chiefly in the early English style, is dedicated to St. Peter, and, in old times, was much "frequented by companies of pilgrims, who resorted thither for St. Hilderforth's help." This saint was a bishop, and had here a shrine, with his portrait in the upper window of the south side. He was supposed to have the power of curing insanity. The church contains a number of tombs to the memory of the later possessors of the manor, and of other inhabitants of the parish—as one always wishes, and almost expects, to see in an ancient village church.

THE CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XVI.

HORNSEY CHURCH.

In a beautiful country of hill and dale, delightfully interspersed with green lanes and quiet hedge-rows—diversified, too, by the meanderings of the New River, on its course to supply the good citizens with water—each hill-top having broad prospects over a fine country, with London and its hundred towers and spires mingling in the perspective,—stands the suburban village of Hornsey. In place of the smart villas and snug cottages which now thickly stud this neighbourhood, there stood, in old times, an extensive forest—Haringay Forest—the only abode of consequence being one belonging to the then Bishops of London, which stood in a park fashioned from the surrounding woods. In this lodge, in 1586, Thomas of Woodstock and other barons assembled to league themselves against the minions of Richard II., and commence that system of resistance which ended only by the death of that unfortunate King. Nor is this Hornsey's only historical association. It was here that the citizens of London, in deputation, met Edward the Fifth, and subsequently Henry the Seventh, when those monarchs respectively approached the capital after their succession to the crown.

The appearance of the church is picturesque; and, seen from many points of view in the neighbourhood, enters pleasantly into the prospect. It boasts considerable antiquity, and, notwithstanding it has recently been "repaired and beautified" (those church-warden processes so often fatal to the structures submitted to them), yet the evidences of its early formation may readily be recognised. It has, to a certain degree, been rendered a classic object, from Goldsmith having in his wanderings in the neighbourhood bestowed the offering of his praise upon it; and, at a later day, Geoffrey Crayon has embalmed it in his pages. It offers but few architectural pretensions, but one may well dispense with those more chaste and elegant proportions which are properly required in a church located in a great city,—the seat of art and civilization. Here, in one of the most beautiful of London suburbs, nothing could more pleasantly harmonise with the sylvan neighbourhood than the old Gothic outline of the church which forms the subject of our sketch.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussee d'Antin, Nov. 23, 1842

Mon cher Monsieur,—Our winter has set in upon us in earnest, and with it returns the reign of velvets, stuffs, satins, cashmeres, and that endless variety of thick fabrics which seem meant to bid defiance to the cold and fogs of this to us very triste season of the year; nevertheless, the influence of climate seems to have little effect upon the taste or fancy of our fashionables, or upon that of our artistes, whose fertility of imagination, and tasteful execution, would appear to be quite inexhaustible. Among the many pretty things which we have seen since our last letter, and which are not more pretty than uncommon, let us mention the redingotes and the evening dresses now in fashion, and which are made of velvet of the colour aile de mouche. Several of these which we have observed on the persons of some of our most fashionable people, trimmed with English point lace, are about the most elegant things of the sort in the world. Not less beautiful, however, is another toilette of brocade, with flowers on a silver ground, worked in with rose-coloured silk. This, together with a redingote in blue satin, entirely surrounded with delicious embroideries, intermixed with points d'Alençon, following all the windings and sinuosities of the true pattern, were dresses worthy of the royal destination for which they were intended. We must not forget to speak of the pékins of all sorts which are still the fashion here, but of which the most recherché are those in broad stripes shaded in two colours. These are very much worn as robes négligé, either for the morning or evening costume; and some, I have remarked, have this advantage, that, by being made to close at the neck, or to be turned back at pleasure, they are equally suitable for either. The same may be said of the furs continue to be the mode for winter costume. They are made upon every shape, and in such beautiful fashion, that even the countries of the north, from which they originally came, have sent to Paris to be made up according to the styles now in vogue; indeed, during this present week, we have seen many pelisses and witschouras which are about to return to Russia after having been altered to suit the taste now prevailing here. Velvet flowers with purple foliage are much in fashion this winter, but not more so than feathers, which have never been more worn than during the present season, though it is said that they are very scarce and very dear. Passementerie also continues in great favour, more especially a particular description in velvet, which surpasses everything of the kind we have yet seen. Canaisis embroidered with this fashionable ornament are extremely handsome, and not more handsome than elegant. If, however, you would see the most poetical, the most recherché, and the most charming of our winter fashions, let me recommend to your notice the coiffure Petrarch. This is composed of a veil or long piece of lace, which is joined to a little crown of rose laurel, and which is worn sightly inclined to one side, but rather low on the forehead: the long but light ends of the lace floating upon the neck have a most elegant and charming effect. Nor must I omit to mention the coiffure à la Anne of Austria, which is equally becoming for those rather more advanced in years. This is of bright green velvet, intermixed with gold tissue, and terminated with large gold tassels, and harmonizes remarkably well with the superb fabrics of which our dresses are now composed.—Adieu.

THE MARKETS.

Corn Exchange.—During the present week we have been very moderately supplied with English wheat, yet the demand for that article has ruled excessively dull, and, in order to effect sales, a decline of from 1s to 2s per quarter has been submitted to by the factors. From abroad our receipts of wheat have been small. The transactions have been so unimportant that the rates have remained almost nominal. Good malting barley has supported its value, but grinding and distilling sorts have had a downward tendency. The malt trade has ruled heavy. Oats, beans, peas, and flour have been purchased on easier terms.

Arrivals.—English: wheat, 3680; barley, 2220; oats, 1520; and malt, 3110 quarters; flour, 1610 sacks. Irish: barley, 720; oats, 4130 quarters. Foreign: wheat, 2000 quarters.

English. Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 40s to 52s; ditto white, 57s to 60s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 49s to 57s; do white, 58s to 59s; rye, 34s to 38s; grinding barley, 27s to 29s; malting do, 34s to 36s; Chevalier, 42s to 51s. Suffolk and Norfolk malt, 46s to 54s; brown do, 40s to 44s; Kingston and Ware, 50s to 62s; Chevalier, 64s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 21s to 24s; potato do, 23s to 25s; Scotch and Irish oats, black, 17s to 18s; do, white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, new, 34s to 36s; do, old, 34s to 38s; grey peas, 36s to 38s; maple, 33s to 34s; white, 30s to 32s; boilers, 32s to 37s; per quarter. Town made flour, 46s to 47s; Suffolk, 38s to 40s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 36s to 38s; per 280 lbs. Foreign.—Free wheat, 50s to 62s. In Bond.—Barley, 20s; oats, new, 15s to 17s; do. feed, 14s to 15s; beans, 26s to 26s; peas, 32s to 37s; per quarter. Flour, America, 22s to 24s; Baltic 22s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—For linseed and rapeseed we have had a steady sale at full prices, but in all other kinds of seeds scarcely anything has been doing.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 48s to 57s; Baltic, crushing, 42s to 45s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 45s to 46s; hempseed, 35s to 40s; per quarter; coriander, 10s to 18s per cwt; brown mustard seed, 10s to 11s; white do., 10s to 10s 6d; tares, 4s 6d to 6s 0d per bushel; English rapeseed, new, 30l to 33l per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, 10l to 10l 10s; do. foreign, 7l to 7l 10s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, 5l 5s to 5l per ton.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 49s 8d; barley, 33s 1d; Oats, 17s 10d; rye, 31s 8d; beans, 31s 6d; peas, 34s 2d.

Imperial Averages of Six Weeks which govern Duty.—Wheat, 49s 8d; Barley, 28s 5d; Oats, 17s 11d; Rye, 31s 7d; Beans, 31s 11d; Peas, 33s 9d per quarter.

Duty on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s 0d; Barley, 9s 0d; Oats, 8s 0d; Rye, 10s 6d; Beans, 10s 6d; Peas, 9s 6d.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5½d to 6d for the 4lb loaf.

Tea.—The market remains in a very dull state, and it is impossible to give accurate quotations owing to the want of transactions. The public sales of 60,000 packages will commence on Monday next.

Sugar.—For the best kinds of sugar we have had a fair inquiry at full prices, but all other qualities have been much neglected.

Coffee.—The market for coffee is still dull, and prices have a downward tendency.

Cocoa.—For West India the inquiry is steady; but other sorts hang heavily on the market.

Fruit.—We have a steady business doing in this article, at moderate prices.

Cotton.—The market is active, and about 7,000 bales have changed hands, at rather improved rates.

Saltpetre.—The quantity on offer is small, without much business doing.

Indigo.—This article is in good request, and several parcels have sold at an advance of 6d to 9d per lb.

Shellac.—The demand continues good, at full quotations.

Oils.—The oil market is firm, at last week's figures.

Tallow.—There is not quite so much business doing in tallow, and prices are easier. 48s 3d is the value of P.Y.C. on the spot.

Provisions.—The Irish butter trade continues very dull, at further depressed rates, with heavy stocks. Foreign butter, bacon, &c., partake of the general dulness.

Coals. Adair's, 16s; West Hartley, 16s 6d; Holywell Main, 17s 6d; New Tanfield Moor, 16s 6d; Ord's Redheugh, 16s 6d; Lambton, 20s 9d; Stewart's, 21s 3d; Adelaide, 20s 9d; Hartley, 16s 6d. Ships arrived, 181.

Potatoes. The Borough and Spitalfields markets are heavily supplied with potatoes, which move off slowly, at from 20s to 70s per ton.

Hops.—All kinds of hops command little attention, while the duty is called as high as £163,000.

Smithfield.—We have to report a decided improvement in the demand for each kind of stock here, at the following prices:—Beef, from 3s 2d to 4s 4d; mutton, 3s 4d to 4s 4d; veal, 3s 4d to 4s 8d; and pork, 3s 8d to 4s 6d per 8lbs., to sink the offal.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—The supplies of slaughtered meat have been tolerably good; while the demand has proved inactive. Beef, from 3s to 3s 6d; mutton, 3s 4d to 4s; veal, 3s 8d to 4s 2d; and pork, 3s 8d to 4s 6d per 8 lbs., by the carcase.

MAL-ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

To those who read the daily journals with attention, or indeed possess themselves, from any channels, of a knowledge of the current intelligence of the times, it cannot but be a fertile theme of deprecatory remark and observation that justice, in the domestic life of the land, is unevenly and ungraciously administered in all its minor jurisdictions; and that the anomalies of magisterial decisions, above all others, demand imperatively public discussion and reform. At one time the work of oppression is laid at the door of the harsh and irritating poor-law—at another, tyranny becomes oracular by the voice of some ill-conditioned Dogberry of the bench; but, no matter from what source the injury to the community may spring, it is alike distressing and humiliating to know that it really does abound, and that, with such profusion and profligate corruption of judgment as call up the daily indignation of society, and furnish continual impulses of displeasure and of shame. The evil, indeed, which we are resolved lustily to denounce, and never to leave unwatched until it is met with something like a remedy, is now of so crying an order that no terms can be too strong for its reproval, and, as it bears its iron oppression, from the nature of their circumstances, principally upon the poor—as it, in fact, most crushes those whom the indulgence of society should mercifully and tenderly protect—we cannot help suggesting separate appeals to the Home-office in the individual cases in which a palpable violation is done to public justice, and a claim for direct remonstrance against those particular magistrates whose indiscretion or stupidity runs into a licence that eventually amounts to crime. Within a few columns of our daily reading, spreading over a period of less than a single week, we are enabled to glance at as many instances of strong grievance in the administration of our domestic law as should make us ashamed that they could happen in a Christian country within any period of time, and which really cause the blood to boil in the veins of honest manhood, with the terrible aspect of atrocity which they so recklessly present. And it will be found that nearly all the examples of cruelty are monopolised between coroners, magistrates, overseers, and the minor functionaries of legal authority in the land.

It was only last week that we hastily noticed the committal of a young maiden to Northleach gaol for the crime of modesty, because, in the natural sensitiveness of a truly English purity, she objected to go nightly through a man's bedroom to her rest. She was sent for fourteen days for this simple exercise of an honest maidenly virtue to learn a first lesson of wretchedness and crime in one of the most loathsome prisons with which this country too unhappily abounds. Since we called attention to the case the whole press has rung with indignation at its infamous injustice; and now we ask, why is not inquiry instituted and the magistrate dismissed? But examples in all forms thicken.

Two men walk along the high road when a rabbit, which one of the men catches, runs across it from the Duke of Marlborough's demesne. The gamekeeper challenges him, and he lets the rabbit run away, himself foolishly following its example. The gamekeeper then turns and takes into custody the innocent companion of the fugitive, and, although the constable of the parish gives evidence of his respectability and good conduct, the magistrate sentences him to fourteen days' imprisonment for innocently walking with a man who had picked up a rabbit on the high road and let it go! Why is not this magistrate reproved?

Again, a seemly-looking girl, but in rags and wretched, and in vens little more than a child, applies to a metropolitan workhouse for relief, and is told by the overseer that "if she would put on shoes and stockings and a clean frock, and stand at the corner of the street, she would not long want relief from the parish." This diabolical insinuation was recorded before the magistrate; it has wounded all the better feelings of every nature that has been shocked by its recital; and why is not the overseer dismissed? It is very hard that our poor should have brutality saddled upon their miseries under any conceivable sanction of the law.

Again, a horrible case is described in Tuesday's Herald of dreadful starvation and distress on the part of a poor man and woman, and the death, from them, of an infant, of which the latter had been only lately confined. The man earned one shilling a-week in his destitution, and the woman and child were starved upon the pittance of charity accorded to them by another poor creature who herself wanted bread. This fact was thus touchingly told in the evidence:—

"A deal of dogs have lived better than they have lived. She has had a sup of tea or thin water porridge; I have seen her sup tea without sugar, and porridge as thin as it could be poured out of the pan. She knocked for me through the wall on the Friday (a week) after her confinement, and when I went in I found her crying, and she said her husband had been at Wilsden, and, as there was no board sitting, he could get no relief. I carried her some food in, and I have done so when I wanted it myself; and one day I got nothing to put in my mouth from nine o'clock in the morning until nine o'clock at night, in consequence of giving her what I had."

Now, let us take the testimony of the father himself about his efforts to obtain relief for the two wretched creatures who were starving in his fireless home:—

"I then, on the same day (Monday), went back to Mr. Mackley, and told him how we were, and desired him to come and see my child. He said he would come; but he did not come that day. I went the next day, and he did not come. I went on the third day, and Mr. Mackley said his young man might go down with me, and see what was the matter with the child. He did come, and on Wednesday (the same day) I asked relief of Mr. Mackley, and he said I might apply to the Keighley board, which would be held that day. I did apply to the Keighley board, and they said I must apply to the Bradford board on the Friday. I went to Mr. Mackley again, thinking that he would be going to Bradford; and he said that there was not going to be a general board, and that if I went I should not get relief, and that he was himself not going. He said that I might get relief at Ling Bob on Monday when the board met. I went to Ling Bob on Monday, and they said they could do nothing for me"!

The result was the death of the child—a coroner's inquest—a verdict, under the circumstances, of "Natural Death," with a warning from the coroner to the parish authorities that "it would have been an awkward thing if the woman had died instead of the child"—the plain meaning of which is that, in such an event, the crime of neglect would then have assumed the aspect of manslaughter! Now, in this distressing case, either the poor-law was or was not administered; and, at the latter conclusion, what becomes of the duties and responsibilities of your guardians, your overseers and your relieving-officers, your Mackleys and others, to whom the poor man in vain applied for help? Are they to continue with official impunity in places where death has already resulted from their guilty negligence and callous inhumanity? If so, what a shadowy phantom is that thing we call "Justice for our Poor"!

The only other example of social propriety outraged by the authorities is of a very different but a very horrible kind. It will be recollected that we sometime back recorded a dreadful case of periodical infanticide, involving six victims, on the part of an unnatural mother and her paramour. That woman is since dead, and the coroner's jury have returned a verdict of wilful murder against Thomas Yapp, the man with whom the wretched murderess had so long held the dark companionship of crime. The woman was dying, and in the agonies of dissolution and remorse, although there was abundance of evidence without hers to convict her survivor, the authorities committed the improper and brutal alternative of thrusting that bad being, the cause of all her crimes, into her chamber, and there extorting from her what, alas! was only an appalling and bitter perjury, presenting another fearful verification of the wise man's words, that "Love is strong as death." The Times newspaper, in one of its stern, strong, common-sense leaders, has condensed a narrative of this shocking fact with truth, argument, and power, which our readers will admit and admire as they read. It reflects boldly upon the conduct of the coroner, magistrates, and superintendents of police:—

On the 1st of November a coroner's order, issued apparently not without an eye to the clergyman, forbade admittance to the sick woman's chamber to every one except her sister and two policemen, who stayed with her day and night. On the 9th, in consequence of a strong remonstrance from the clergyman, urging the useless cruelty of this treatment of a woman, who would probably die before she could be executed, the prohibition was withdrawn, but in two days was reimposed. Meantime the prisoner had had to receive a different kind of visit. It appeared on Friday, the 11th of November, that the magistrate's clerk, a county magistrate, and the superintendent, had been to see her, bringing the man Yapp with them,—that they had demanded a repetition on oath in his presence of all her previous statements,—and that she, on oath, we presume, had absolutely denied all she had hitherto said. Since this period (must not we say owing to this treatment?) our authority describes the woman's state of mind—at first submissive and penitent—as hardened into a state only to be called diabolical.

RAMSGATE PIER.

Ramsgate Pier is chiefly built of Portland and Purbeck stone, and is one of the most magnificent structures of the kind in the kingdom. It was begun in the year 1794, extends about 800 feet into the sea before it forms an angle, and is 26 feet broad at the top, including the parapet. The south front is a polygon, each face of which is 450 feet in length, with octagons at the ends. The entrance measures about 200 feet. The harbour contains an area of 46 acres; which, after this work was finished according to the first design, became choked up with mud, for want of a backwater. Under the direction of the celebrated engineer, Mr. Smeaton, many improvements have been effected, and a cross wall erected in the uppermost part of the harbour, with sluices, and the pier has been extended 300 feet from the extremity of the former head. These alterations greatly facilitated the entrance of ships in hard gales of wind, for whose reception and safety on this exposed coast the work was originally undertaken. A large ornamental stone building has been erected for a clock-house; and there is also a good dry dock, with convenient storehouses. A new lighthouse stands on the west head, which is furnished with argand lamps and reflectors. Within the harbour, as you approach the promenade, is a handsome obelisk, erected commemorative of the honour done to this place by George IV., in embarking and landing here on the occasion of his visit to Hanover in 1821. Ramsgate is the resort of fashionable company during the summer, for the purpose of bathing and festive recreation.

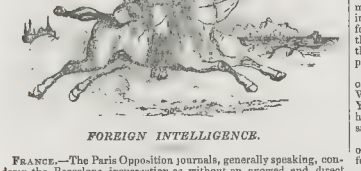
And now is this frightful result unnatural? Is it not the plain consequence which was to be apprehended by any man of common thought and feeling from the reckless treatment which she has received? A woman is carried off (and rightly) to prison, sick, weak, agitated, awakened to a sense of her guilt, and open to the influences, and relying—it may be superstitiously—on the offices of the minister of religion upon whose guidance that sense of guilt has thrown her, but scarce conscious, and still less reconciled to the consciousness, that she has sinned, and will be required to repeat, what is to sacrifice the life of herself and her former paramour. Does it not seem sheer fatuity—with whatever object—for the officers of justice, after separating her from those beneficial influences to which she had in part surrendered herself, to bring before her in person this very man, whose presence of all men in the world she had most to dread, and to demand of her to repeat on oath, in his presence, and for the avowed purpose of taking away his life, those statements, the substance of which they already possessed? Did they suppose the human mind to be made of clay or wood, or did they suppose this miserable woman to be purified from all human feeling, so entirely possessed by a sense of right and justice, that she would tamely resign herself to such treatment? Did they expect to find her willing to consummate her sacrifice, when studiously presented to her in its most revolting aspect? Or did they think that she, a woman on the brink of eternity, surrounded by, and absorbed in, such appalling realities and recollections, would be lulled into acquiescence by the authority of a magistrate and policeman? What did they think, what could they expect, but precisely what has happened?

The woman is dead, and the case, with all its dreadful enormity, speaks for itself. We will add nothing to the able comments of our contemporary, but remain content with allowing it to close the long list of examples of manifest mal-administration of justice in several aspects which a mere glance at the journals of the day has enabled us to array before our readers. They are melancholy evidences of individual misconduct, which take a wide and broad effect upon the happiness and confidence of the community, and are evils which unquestionably require the interposition of the higher authorities to rebuke and put down.



FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—The Paris Opposition journals, generally speaking, condemn the Barcelona insurrection as without an avowed and direct object. They differ as to the merits of the existing Government in Spain, but agree as to the folly and hopelessness of the recent insurrection. As to the Ministerial press in France, including the Débats, it maintains a studied silence, from which it would appear that the Government has not yet come to any decision as to the line of conduct which it shall adopt, or whether it will cautiously abstain from all interference.

Considerable excitement prevailed in Paris with regard to the re-election of General Jacqueminot, whose promotion to the command of the National Guards had caused a vacancy in the first arrondissement. At the catechism of the Opposition candidates, at a meeting held on Saturday (at which General Jacqueminot declined to be present at the advice of his committee), all these gentlemen protested hugely against England. Shouts of laughter were produced by an elector's sally, that "all the English were not at the other side of the Channel." M. Boinvilliers was very angry because M. Guizot had defended the British navy from some Opposition inventions in the Chamber. Count Girardin thought that France no longer existed in the map of Europe. M. Portalis, however, raised the enthusiasm of the Anglophobians to the highest pitch, by the following sentence in his speech:—"I oppose the present Ministry, not because M. Guizot, the directing genius of the Cabinet, was at Ghent—not because he was the editor of the Ghent Moniteur—not because he was the secretary of the Abbé Montesquieu, but because he was Ambassador in London, where he betrayed his Government. (Cries of "Bravo, bravo!" for some minutes.) I oppose the Ministry because it is in office, thanks to English influence. I oppose it because it is sustained by British influence. (Bravo, bravo!)"

The Marseilles Sud, of the 22nd ult., pretends to know from an undoubted source that, in the treaty with the Chinese Government, it has been stipulated that the cities and ports in the interior of China should be opened to all the European powers, who are to have the right of being represented by the consuls of their nations.

The Moniteur Algeria, of the 20th ult., states that the Governor-General was to leave on that day, to commence a fresh campaign against the Arabs. The next day the Duke d'Aumale was to join the column at Medeah. General de Bar was to command in Algeria during Bugeaud's absence.

The Presse, of Sunday, devotes three columns calling upon M. Guizot, even at the risk of a rupture with England, to propose the abrogation of the treaties of 1831 and 1833 for the suppression of the slave trade. The Presse warns M. Guizot that he may be hurled from power for ever by his refusal to take this course.

SPAIN.—We observe by the Madrid journals that the news from Catalonia had not caused so deep a sensation in Madrid as might have been expected; and we find that the feeling of the Cortes was almost unanimous as to the necessity of strengthening the hands of the Regent in his efforts to put down the insurrection. A rumour was current in Madrid of an intention to abridge the period of the Queen's minority, and to hasten her marriage, in the hope that the constitutional Government would thus be strengthened. No fact, however, is mentioned to give probability to this statement. In the address of the deputation of the Cortes to the Queen, on the occasion of her fête day, it is indeed said that the arrival of the period when she will assume the reins of power will be hailed with delight, as a guarantee for a cessation of the evils under which Spain suffers; and it was probably this expression that gave rise to the rumour in question.

The papers of the 20th ult. contain an account of the message of the Regent to the Chamber of Deputies relative to the insurrection at Barcelona, and of the communications of the despatches of Van Halen, who declares that he did not bombard the city until the inhabitants had refused to send rations to the troops. In the Chamber of Deputies M. Serrano moved a vote of confidence in the Regent, and of the assurance of the support of the Cortes in his efforts to put down the insurrection. This led to rather an animated discussion, but without any display of ill feeling to the Regent. The Opposition deputies contented themselves with stating that, as with them the first object was the salvation of the country, they would not refuse their co-operation in that object, but that they did so without compromising their sentiments as to the way in which the general business of the state was conducted. The motion was divided into two parts. On being put to the vote there was a majority of 67 to 14 in favour of the first part; and on the second part, which involved the great question of the co-operation of the Chamber in the attempt to put down the insurgents, the vote was almost unanimous, the majority being 110 to 2.

A telegraphic despatch from Bayonne announced to the French Government, that at two o'clock in the afternoon of the 21st ult. the Regent quitted Madrid to march against the Barcelonese insurgents. The Spanish capital was quite tranquil on the 21st, and the Government had received advices of the state of affairs at Barcelona; consequently was aware of the extent of the defeat sustained by Van Halen, the captain-general.

There was nothing from Saragossa to afford evidence that the Infante Don Francisco de Paulo at this date had taken any part in the insurrection.

The official despatches which have just been received from Madrid leave no doubt that the much-talked-of treaty of commerce between England and Spain has at length been signed.

PORTUGAL.—By the intelligence received by the Lisbon mail of the 21st ult., it appears that the Ministers had succeeded in securing the return of most of their candidates in the late elections for deputies, which would strengthen their power. At the same time public credit was improving, and the new issue of Exchequer Bills was taken up by capitalists. It does not appear that they have yet made any further approximation towards a settlement of the tariff treaty with England.

The brig of war Don Pedro had been sent to Madeira with succours for the sufferers by the inundation. A committee had been formed at Lisbon, with the Marquis of Fayal at its head, to collect subscriptions; and their Majesties have contributed themselves three contos of reis.

The Brazilian frigate and a Portuguese corvette had sailed from Lisbon for Rio.

A fine Liverpool brig, the Bridget, has been most unwarrantably seized by the piratical custom-house authorities, on account of her having a couple of bags of contraband buttons on board. It is quite right that a fine should be imposed, but the seizure and condemnation of the entire vessel and cargo is an unheard-of overstretch of arbitrary power, and a gross violation of the law of nations.

GREECE.—Accounts from Athens of the 7th ult. state, that the new customs law had driven away the Ipsariots, who had returned to Turkey rather than continue under King Otho's rule. The Greek press still cried out loudly for a constitution, and complained that the situation of the people and country had not improved since they had shaken off the Ottoman yoke.

UNITED STATES.—The packet-ship, Captain Delano, which sailed from New York on the 7th ult., arrived at Liverpool on Sunday evening last.

The yellow fever was very prevalent at Mobile, and daily increasing. Its ravages were principally confined to strangers, and the residents who had left the city in consequence were advised not to return until the frost had set in.

The elections in Ohio, as far as they could be ascertained, had gone in favour of the democratic party by a considerable majority.

Mr. Webster had paid a visit to the city of New York, and at a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce he made a lengthened speech, in which he recapitulated most of the topics introduced into his former speech at Boston, congratulated his countrymen on the settlement of the boundary question, and took a favourable review of the acts of President Tyler, and the policy which the Executive had pursued.

Two steamers had arrived out. The Caledonia, which left this port on the 18th Oct., arrived at Boston on the 2nd ult., and the Great Western, which sailed from Bristol on the 22nd Oct., arrived at New York on the 6th ult. The packet-ship New York, which sailed hence on the 8th Oct., arrived out, after an excellent passage for a sailing-ship, on the 2nd ult.

The election for the state and city of New York would take place on the 8th, and upon its result would depend in a great measure the future complexion of Congress.

Mr. Dickens's book had arrived out, and given great offence to our transatlantic neighbours. The statements contained in it leave no doubt, they say, that the offensive article in the Foreign Quarterly Review on the American press was the production of the same pen.

Freights were very low, and the rate of exchange was also unusually low—6 per cent. Business, as usual, continued dull. The next meeting of Congress, which would take place the first week in this month, was looked to with much anxiety.

The new Orleans papers of the 25th Oct. have advices from Campeachy to the 14th, and from Merida to the 9th. The inhabitants of the Island of Carmen had declared for re-union with Mexico. The first brigade of the Mexican invading force was there, 3,000 strong, waiting reinforcements from Vera Cruz and Tobasco. It was not thought that Campeachy could make any effectual resistance. It is again alleged that Santa Ana is to command in person. 700 Mexican troops had landed at Champtoon, twelve leagues from Campeachy, and were fortifying themselves. A body of 1300 men had been sent to dislodge them. The Mexican squadron was hourly expected to arrive before Campeachy.

Part of the Mexican force that took San Antonio some time ago was commanded by Colonel Seguine, formerly a member of Congress in Texas. It will be remembered that at San Antonio a court was in session at the time, and that judges, jury, lawyers, &c., were all captured. It is said that Seguine, sent in the archives of that court there were deeds mortgaging all Seguine's property on the frontier to Col. Ogden. These documents Seguine destroyed. A trial also would have taken place that must have awarded the property to Ogden. But Seguine thus summarily put an end to the proceedings, and actually took Ogden prisoner! Dr. Smethers and others, who were witnesses to the mortgage, were taken out and shot, by order of Seguine, and fears were naturally entertained for the life of Ogden.

The news of the ratification of the boundary treaty in England has been received with much satisfaction in the United States. A salute of 100 guns was fired in New York, and all the shipping in the harbour were gaily decorated with flags in honour of the ratification.

A great fire occurred in Richmond, Virginia, in which tobacco, valued at 10,000 dollars, was destroyed. Braham and his son are going to the Havannah and British West Indies for the winter. Dr. Lardner is on a lecturing tour in the country, but not very successful. At Princeton, New Jersey, he could not get a class. Some mills were burnt at Levant, Maine, and, shocking to relate, two young ladies perished in the flames.

AMERICA.—The mail steamer Caledonia, Capt. E. G. Lott, after a passage of the usual certainty and rapidity, arrived at Liverpool on Tuesday evening. She sailed from Halifax on the evening of the 18th ult. The Acadia had reached Halifax after a remarkable passage of ten days and a half.

We do not find any matter of especial import in the details of intelligence brought by the Caledonia.

We regret to hear from Canada that Sir Charles Bagot, the Governor-General, has been seriously indisposed, but the last accounts represent him as somewhat recovering.

Mr. Edward Gibbon Wakefield has been elected to the Provincial Assembly; and, although party spirit yet continues with much virulence, there is little to remark on. All are awaiting the approaching meeting of the Legislature.

Severe shocks of earthquakes have been felt in various parts of Canada.

The elections for state affairs have just taken place in the various states, and the local squabbles attending them seem to have run so high, that no time or opportunity has been devoted to anything else.

NEW YORK, NOV. 15.—Commercial affairs, the currency, and the general stagnation of trade, remain in the same condition as by packet after packet we have described.

The great want of the country, especially of the agricultural and producing portions of it, is a currency; and, partially as a consequence of that want, prices are universally low, and all who have debts to pay see their property sacrificed at a depreciation really frightful.

(From the Savannah Georgian.)

The schooner Burlington, Captain Ellis, arrived at this port last evening from Givara, Cuba. She was bound to New York, and, owing to a stress of weather, put into this port.

The passengers of the Burlington have politely furnished for publication the following statement:—"On the 16th day of October appeared off the port of Givara a small sloop showing English colours, from which a boat put off and came into the harbour, having on board David Turnbull, Esq., one of the mixed commissioners of the African Board, with authority from the English Government to demand the liberation of not only the English blacks in this part of the island, but of all the Africans introduced since the treaty of 1821. Immediately on landing, dressed in full uniform, he called upon the commandant of the port, presenting his passport, and desiring if he could proceed immediately to certain plantations, which he named, with a view of prosecuting his intentions, stating that his vessel would lay off the harbour during his short absence. This the commandant positively refused, ordering, at the same time, the vessel to enter the port. On anchoring she was boarded by the authorities, and found manned with negroes—the pilot or captain of the said vessel, one Tom Carter by name, a free mulatto, a Spanish outlaw, and perpetrator of illegal acts on this side of the island, and for whom, for many years, the Spanish authorities have been on the qui vive. A guard was placed on board to prevent any communication with the shore. Mr. Turnbull then requested permission to proceed to the town of Holguin, where the governor of the district resides, desiring at the same time the protection of the authorities, and whether it were safe for him to go without arms, as he had nothing but his sword. The commandant assured him that he would be perfectly safe, and ordered a corporal and two men to accompany him, with strict injunctions not to allow Mr. T. to enter into any plantation, or communicate with any one on his route. On presenting himself at the governor's, he was recognised as the English Consul who had caused so much trouble in Havannah a short time ago, and who only saved his life by flying for protection on board of the English guard-ship here; and, in consequence of opinions and acts expressed by him to the injury of the planters of this island, was ordered off and forbid to return to any part thereof by the Captain-General. He was immediately arrested and placed under the surveillance of a double guard, no one being allowed to see or speak to him. Orders were likewise issued to place the crew and captain of the vessel in the fort, with the same restrictions, where they now are. Mr. Turnbull and company will be sent on shortly by a steam-boat, which is expected at Givara daily, to the Havannah, to be placed at the disposa. of the Captain-General, the Governor not being empowered to act in such a case."

The New York papers of the 16th and 17th ult., brought by the Great Western, Lieutenant Hosken, which arrived at Liverpool on Wednesday forenoon, arrived in London on Thursday. She accomplished the passage in twelve days and fifteen hours by chronometer; and, though uncommonly short, is not the shortest she has made between New York and Liverpool. The Great Western has brought only thirty-six passengers; among them are Mr. E. G. Wakefield and Lord Caledon.

The papers do not contain any news of public interest.

The ship Panama had arrived at New York from Canton. Her captain reported that he spoke, in lat. 25, long. 60, the whaleship Ontario, the captain of which reported that a French squadron had taken possession of the Marquesas group of islands, landed troops on them, and fortified two of the largest. The commander of the fleet had, it was added, sealed orders, which he did not open till he arrived off the islands.

Accounts had been received from the city of Mexico to the 15th of October. The Congress, which was in session, had rejected by a small majority, and for the second time, the proposed amendment of the constitution. The Federalists opposed the project, on the ground that its provisions savoured too much of centralism, and did not sufficiently conform to the good old constitution of 1824. The second rejection was considered a hard blow at the popularity of Santa Ana. He had changed the Mexican seat of government. Vera Cruz, for the present, is the seat of diplomacy.

The accounts from Texas come down to the 4th ult.; they breathe nothing but war. The Texans had determined, it is said, to carry on the war against Mexico "in right good earnest." A variety of details, movements, and skirmishes are given, but a repetition of them would not interest the English reader. The following, however, may be considered worthy of a place here—

After the taking of San Antonia, Caldwell, with 325 men, marched to the Solado, and encamped within six miles of the town. Thence he sent in a small force to drive out the Mexicans. They attacked the Texans about nine o'clock in the day, and fought until night. The loss of the Texans was 1 killed and 10 wounded: that of the Mexicans, 214 killed and wounded. This was on the 15th of September. On the 12th the Mexicans retreated, and were followed by the Texans. On the 14th they had a skirmish—the Mexicans rapidly retreated. An expedition was preparing, under the command of Caldwell, to go to the Rio Grande, and would destroy everything that could in any manner harbour the enemy. They were to leave some time during the present month. The following is a list of persons that the Texans killed and taken prisoners near the Solado, under the command of Captain Dawson, of La Grange:—

Killed during the Engagement—Nicholas M. Dawson, Tennessee; Zudock Woods, J. W. Pendleton, Missouri; Robert Berkely, Texas; E. Trimble, Missouri; J. W. Scallorn, Elam Scallorn, Tennessee; Asa Jones, Alabama; T. Butter, Tennessee; R. Sloan, Delaware; J. Cummings, Maine; T. J. Chure, H. W. Hall, Tennessee; D. Berry, Virginia; J. Bance, Tennessee; F. W. Brookfield, New York; T. S. Simms, Tennessee; G. A. Hill, Mississippi; C. S. Reed, New York; J. Alexander, Kentucky; J. F. Jones, Alabama; R. M. Eastland, Tennessee.

Taken Prisoners after the Fight—N. W. Fayson, Tennessee; David S. Kirnegay, North Carolina; Joseph Shaw, Indiana; Melun Hartell, Mobile; R. A. Barkly, Tennessee; Norman Woods, Mobile; J. C. Johenson, Mobile; William Coulterin, ——; Edward Martin, New York; Allen Morrell, Tennessee; Mr. Paterson, ——; John Bradley, Alabama.

General Wool and his army had continued their retreat, and, at last advices, the spies had discovered the Mexican army, numbering about 3000 at the Presidio del Rio Grande, fortifying. The spy company had driven in 3000 head of cattle, which the Mexicans attempted to drive off in their retreat. They followed the trail of his army about thirty miles beyond the Nueces, and found carts, waggons, and articles of furniture strewed along the road, that had been apparently left to expedite his flight. The spies say the trail indicated that he fled with great precipitation, and stopped to build camp fires only once or twice on the road to the Presidio.

The people of Texas are incited by a lively desire for revenge and justice upon the Mexicans. Hundreds and thousands of all classes have enrolled themselves. Even a minister of the gospel (Rev. Mr. Huckins) has attached himself to one of the companies, believing the protection of his country, his home, and his family, as not incompatible with his holy profession. Austin, Liberty, Harris, Jasper, and other eastern counties, the militia are ready to turn out at the word.

General Sumerville has so far recovered his health as to have started for the army. The time for its march to the frontier has been postponed to the 10th November.

Four British men-of-war touched at Velasco a few days since, and took in a supply of beef, &c. They were bound, it is said, for the Mexican coast.

The schooner Eliza, last from Galveston, was wrecked at the mouth of the Brazos a few days ago. She had a cargo of 18,000 dollars' worth of goods for Smith and Adriance, which are a total loss to the owners, as they were not insured.

The Montreal Courier of the 14th ult. states that Sir Charles Bagot, the Governor-General, was fast recovering from the effects of his severe illness. Mr. Mallory, who had successfully opposed Mr. Baldwin in the Hastings election, had been dismissed from his situation of clerk of the peace. His party attributed his dismissal to the circumstance of his having defeated the Government candidate, and the act had excited quite a sensation amongst the British party.

THE WAR IN INDIA. LORD ELLENBOROUGH'S PROCLAMATION.—The following important proclamation issued by Lord Ellenborough, the Governor-General of India, appeared during the week in a Government Gazette Extraordinary, and will be read, no doubt, with great interest, as affording an exposition of his lordship's Indian policy, and the conditions on which the British troops have evacuated Afghanistan:—

PROCLAMATION.

Secret Department, Simla, Oct. 1, 1842.

The Government of India directed its army to pass the Indus, in order to expel from Affghanistan a chief believed to be hostile to British interests, and to replace upon his throne a sovereign represented to be friendly to those interests, and popular with his former subjects. The chief believed to be hostile became a prisoner, and the sovereign represented to be popular was replaced upon his throne; but, after events which brought into question his fidelity to the Government by which he was restored, he lost by the hands of an assassin the throne he had only held amidst insurrections, and his death was preceded and followed by still existing anarchy. Disasters unparalleled in their extent, unless by the errors in which they originated, and by the treachery by which they were completed, have in one campaign been avenged upon every scene of past misfortune, and repeated victories in the field, and the capture of the citadel and citadels of Ghuznee and Cabul, have again attached the opinion of invincibility to the British arms. The British army in possession of Afghanistan will now be withdrawn to the Sutlej. The governor-general will leave it to the Affghans themselves to create a Government amidst the marches which are the inheritance of their enemies. To force a sovereign upon a resistant people would be as inconsistent with the policy as it is with the principles of the British Government, tending to place the arms and resources of that people at the disposal of their first invader, and to impose the burden of supporting a sovereign without the prospect of benefit from his alliance. The governor general will willingly receive any Government approved by the Affghans themselves which shall appear desirous and capable of maintaining friendly relations with neighbouring states.

Content with the limits nature appears to have assigned to its empire, the Government of India will devote all its efforts to the establishment and maintenance of general peace, to the protection of the sovereigns and chiefs its allies, and to the prosperity and happiness of its own faithful subjects. The rivers of the Punjaub and the Indus, and the mountainous passes and the barbarous tribes of A[illegible] will render the [illegible] army [illegible] an enemy approaching from the west, if, indeed, such enemy there can be, and [illegible] the British [illegible] The [illegible] means [illegible] of the [illegible] and [illegible] and [illegible] arms [illegible] the improvement of the country and of the people. The combined army of England and of India, superior in equipment, in discipline, in union, and in the officers by whom it is commanded, to any force which can be opposed to it in Asia, will stand in unassailable strength upon its own soil, and for ever, under the blessing of Providence, preserve the means to ensure it has won, in security and in honour. The Governor-General cannot fear the misconstruction of his motives in thus frankly announcing to surrounding states the pacific and conservative policy of the Government. Affghanistan and China have seen at once the force at his disposal, and the effect with which they can be applied. Sincerely attached to peace for the sake of the benefits it confers upon the people, the Governor-General is resolved that peace shall be observed, and will put forth the whole power of the British Government to coerce the state by which it shall be infringed.

By order of the Right Hon. the Governor-General of India,

T. H. MADDOCK,

Secretary to the Government of India, with the Governor-General.

COUNTRY NEWS.

BRISTOL.—THE ALLEGED MURDER AT MENDIP.—The inquest on the body of Samuel Brittan was resumed on Monday last, and, after the examination of several witnesses, the coroner summed up the evidence, and the jury, having deliberated for five hours, returned a verdict of "Manslaughter."

ALARMING FIRE NEAR BRISTOL.—One of the most extensive and destructive fires that has occurred in this part of the kingdom (the lamentable destruction of Queen-square, by the rioters in 1830, alone excepted) took place on Tuesday night last at Kingswood-hill, situated about four miles from Bristol, on the extensive premises of the Messrs. H. H. and S. Budgett. The stock consumed consisted of the refined sugar, valued at upwards of £1500, very large quantities of cheese, coffee, butter, &c., a large and valuable stock of flour, and other property of general merchandise. The Messrs. Budgett's firm was one of the most extensive in the west of England, probably in the kingdom. We understand that they are insured to a large amount; £8000 in the Phœnix, and other sums in various other offices.

CAMBRIDGE.—The prisoner Mortlock, who is confined in the county gaol of Cambridge, to stand his trial at the next assizes, for attempting the life of his uncle, the Rev. Edmund Mortlock, fellow of St. John's College, was examined, at his own request, with the greatest minuteness and labour, as to the state of his feelings. He is guarded and watched night and day, as it is said that the case is deemed a very high one, and that he cannot escape. About six years ago he was taken up on a charge of firing his uncle the banker's country residence, and he was discharged when the day of trial came on, in consequence of his uncle's reluctance to appear against him. On a subsequent occasion, when he was in custody for a breach of the peace against the same relative, the prisoner's mother refused to bail him unless the Rev. E. Mortlock would withdraw the allowance being continued to him which he had enjoyed previously to his misconduct. This was agreed to, and the prisoner gave a written promise to leave Cambridge.

CARLISLE.—Last week Wetherall Church was broken into by some thieves, and the stock of wine therein deposited carried off. The house of Mr. E. Blamire was broken into during the same night, and sundry articles abstracted from the larder.

HASTINGS.—On Monday afternoon a most determined suicide was committed by one of the men belonging to the Coast Guard service. It appears that, whilst on duty on the beach under the East-hill, Hastings, he was observed by some persons at a distance to place his blunderbuss against his side and discharge it. On running to his assistance it was found that the ball had passed through his heart, killing him on the spot. The unfortunate man has left a wife and eight children.

LIVERPOOL.—ATROCIOUS MURDER.—It is our melancholy duty to record a most atrocious and cold-blooded murder, which was committed on Sunday evening last, in the neighbourhood of St. Helen's. The victim is a young married woman, of highly respectable connections, and the wife of a painter who has lately been employed by Mr. A. T. Woods, of St. Helen's. The tragedy is aggravated by the supposition that the ruthless miscreant who perpetrated the terrible deed is her own husband. Suspicion at present is attached to no other person but Buckley, but he strenuously denies the guilt.

MANCHESTER.—THE BANK ROBBERY.—Edmund Burdekin, who absconded with £20,000 of the funds of the Manchester Bank of England, was seen in Albany a day or two after the arrival of the Britannia by an English gentleman who knew him personally. Both parties passed in the street without any token of recognition.

NORFOLK.—The town of Thetford, in Norfolk, has been thrown into a state of unpleasant ferment during the last few days, in consequence of a solicitor, hitherto considered of the highest respectability, having suddenly absconded, leaving liabilities incurred by him to the amount, it is supposed at the lowest, of £20,000. He had appointed Friday last for meeting some very heavy mortgage accounts, and for handing over the amount for a farm which he had recently purchased, and his non-appearance on that and the following days led to the above unpleasant discovery. His absence has almost created a panic in the neighbourhood, as from his extensive transactions in mortgages, conveyances, and other monetary matters, it is impossible to calculate at present the extent of his defalcations.

NORTHAMPTON.—A new line of railway is about to be formed from Northampton to Peterborough, notices for which have been duly given in all the local papers, and most favourably received by the proprietors of land on the intended line.

NOTTINGHAM.—A meeting of the magistrates of Nottingham, at which upwards of forty were present, took place at Southwell last week, to consider the propriety of increasing or diminishing the rural police force in this county. The Earl of Lincoln occupied the chair. An increase was carried by 14 to 12, all the rest refusing to vote. The new force is to consist of a chief constable, four superintendents, five inspectors, and 72 policemen.

NEWCASTLE.—BURGLARY AND ATTEMPTED ASSAULT.—Early in the morning of Saturday last, a well-dressed black lad, who gave the name of Miss Jane Robinson, a middle-aged lady, residing at Gateshead Fell, and, presenting themselves at her bed-room door, knocked her money. On her evasion of their demand, one of them struck her a dreadful blow on the head, and inflicted a severe wound. They then obtained about 30s. in silver, and decamped, being disturbed by the servant maid. A large reward has been offered for their apprehension. The house of Miss Robinson adjoins that of Mr. Ferguson, of the District Bank, Newcastle, and these houses stand far apart from the village.

ROCHESTER.—Thomas Cork, the superintendent of the Rochester police, has been committed to Maidstone gaol for embezzlement of moneys entrusted to him in his official capacity, there to remain until the amount of his defalcation be paid.

SUFFOLK. SINGULAR REWARD FOR THE DETECTION OF A FELONY.—A reward of £5 10s., and an acre of land for five years rent free, to any poor man, has been offered for giving information which may lead to the conviction of some persons who, on the 9th of November or early on the following morning, wilfully and maliciously cut down an avenue of young trees, the property of Richard Norton Cartwright, Esq., growing in the abbey grounds of Ixworth.

IRELAND.

THE AFFRAY AT SKIBBEREEN.—The eight policemen of the rearguard have been admitted to bail by the magistrates, Mr. Jones and Captain O'Driscoll, in the sum of £10 each, but are to be immediately removed from their present stations. An increased military force has arrived in the town, which is now occupied by 96 military, 1 major, 1 captain, 1 lieutenant, and 120 police; 2 pieces of cannon were expected to arrive every hour, 1 waggon of ammunition having already arrived. It was expected that a meeting of the landlords of the union would be held, to devise means by which the poor-rate may be peaceably collected. Much depends on this important meeting.

FURTHER RESISTANCE TO THE POOR-RATES.—Letters received in Dublin state, that the depôt of the 55th Regiment, and a troop of the 7th Dragoon Guards, at present stationed in Clonmel, were under orders to proceed to Carrick-on-Suir, in consequence of an expressed determination of the people of that neighbourhood forcibly to resist the collection of the poor-rate.

Mr. Henry Curran, the eldest son of Mr. H. Grattan Curran, of Dublin, was one of those who perished in the Reliance, East Indiaman, off Boulogne. He was a young gentleman of the greatest promise, and his loss will long be deplored by his afflicted family.

LORD LIFFORD AND ST. CLARE O'MALLEY.—It is said that the secretary of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland has written to Lord Lucan and Mr. St. C. O'Malley, calling on them to state whether the report of the petty sessions case at Castlebar, in which both peer and commoner figured so disgracefully, be correctly given.

The town of Tipperary has been thrown into a state of great excitement in consequence of the murder of James Scully, Esq., of Kilfeacle, which occurred on Saturday night last. This occurrence took and within three fields of the public road between Cashel and Tipperary, and almost in open day. Mr. Scully was a Catholic, a magistrate of the county, unmarried, and about 28 years of age. He is succeeded in his immense property by his brother, who accompanied him previous to the occurrence. Among the lower orders, especially, of this county the deceased bore the reputation of being a very severe landlord. Six persons have been taken into custody upon suspicion of being concerned in this diabolical outrage, but there is not a tittle of evidence against them.

COUNTY OF DERRY POLITICS.—It is rumoured that Captain Jones is about to resign the representation of the county of Derry in consequence of having received an appointment from Government. In that case (it is stated) it is not the Attorney-General who would offer himself to the constituency, but a gentleman who would unite in his favour the influence of his relatives, the Primate and the Marquis of Waterford, and also that of the Premier. The gentleman here alluded to is Lieutenant Dawson, of the Grenadier Guards, son of the Right Hon. G. R. Dawson, and connected with the county by birth and property; possessed too, it is said, of no ordinary attainments for the honour he aspires to.

SCOTLAND.

COURT OF SESSION.—The Glasgow Argus mentions that, according to Parliament-house gossip, the elevation of Mr. Patrick Robertson to the bench will not take place so soon as was at one time expected. Lord Meadowbank, it is said, has procured a medical opinion to the effect that he may still continue to discharge his present duties, and, as he owes certain parties a grudge for not making him Justice Clerk, he is resolved to deprive them of the patronage of his seat as long as he can.

EDINBURGH.—The Lord Justice Clerk received a letter from Sir James Graham, enclosing a letter addressed by Lord Stanley to the Home Secretary, stating briefly the account of the glorious news from China and Affghanistan, and on this authority the guns of Edinburgh Castle were fired, and the Lord Provost and magistrates caused the city church bells to be rung from one to three o'clock.

TERMINATION OF THE CONVOCATION.—The Convocation of the non-intrusion clergy, which has been sitting at Edinburgh during the last week, terminated its labours on Friday evening, on which occasion a public meeting was called in Lady Glenorchy's Church. A very large assemblage attended, the body of the church being principally occupied by the ministers and the elders. The sittings of the Convocation being private, a variety of statements were circulated as to the nature of the proceedings. The meeting was called in order to afford the Convocation an opportunity of explaining the course that had been pursued by them. The principal speakers were the Rev. Dr. Buchanan of Glasgow, and the Rev. Dr. Candlish of Edinburgh. Dr. Clason intimated that 479 ministers had attended the Convocation, and that in general great harmony had obtained. There were two sets of resolutions proposed; for the first of which 427 voted, and the second was carried with equal unanimity and cordiality.

DUMFRIESSHIRE.—We regret that it becomes our painful duty to record that the diabolical example set in some parts of England of destroying agricultural produce by fire has found imitators in this county, hitherto distinguished for the exemplary conduct of its population. On Sabbath last, between three and four o'clock in the morning, the guard of the mail from Dumfries observed flames to issue from a stack of wheat, in the stackyard of the farm of High Dargoals, parish of Old Luce, and immediately gave the alarm to Mr. Dougan, the tenant, who, with his servants and neighbours, promptly repaired to the scene of the conflagration, and, by the most extraordinary exertions, succeeded in saving from the flames all the stacks, except two, which were completely destroyed. Two men have been apprehended on suspicion.

Raupach, the popular German dramatist, and Tieck, the poet, whose popularity may almost be said to have been ratified by the verdict of posterity, have lately been raised by the King of Prussia to the dignity of privy councillors.

MR. WHITE'S LECTURES ON THE MUSIC OF IRELAND.—One of the immediate results of a diffusion of musical knowledge amongst the people of England will be the rapid extension of a taste for all that is elevated and refined connected with musical art, including the literary and historical. We therefore hail the appearance of such lecturers as White and Wilson on the minstrelsy of the sister kingdoms as men of experience and acknowledged ability capable of inducing in the national mind a love for harmony. These remarks are suggested by a series of lectures on the bards and music of Ireland, which are now being delivered with great eclat at the principal literary and scientific institutions of the metropolis, by Mr. F. C. White, a gentleman with whose fame as a melodist and lecturer we have long been made acquainted by the many honourable notices which have come under our observation in the American and provincial periodicals. His illustrations are given with harp and piano accompaniments.

M. Jullien, to whom the public are indebted for the introduction of promenade concerts into this country, opened the English Opera House last evening with the first of a series of twelve concerts, which are given previously to his departure for Paris. He has engaged a highly efficient band, and the arrangements for the evening appeared to give great satisfaction. We understand that at the last concert a splendid Caledonian ball will be given upon a very novel scale, and at which the Highlanders will appear who had the honour of dancing before her Majesty at Taymouth Castle.

BETHLEM HOSPITAL.—Our readers will recollect that some time since two of the lunatics at this establishment made their escape, one of whom was re-captured the same day. The other (James Grant) has only recently been heard of, being found at his mother's house, at Inverness, having walked all the distance from London to Scotland.

Horace Vernet, the painter, who was lately at St. Petersburg, where he was received with great distinction by the imperial family, is now gone to Circassia, in search of new subjects for his hippographical pencil.

It was on Tuesday communicated to the police that William Pink, the prisoner who escaped from the House of Correction on Monday evening, had been recaptured by Smith and Grey, two of the warders of that prison. The prisoner, it appears, is twenty-one years of age, and by trade a slater. He was convicted of stealing a cheese from a shop in the neighbourhood of Lisson-grove, Paddington, and sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment, eleven months of which had expired. By some extraordinary means he climbed, unperceived, on to the wall over the porter's lodge, proceeding thence along the wall, which is a very broad one, and descending into a small garden in Oldham's-gardens, Guildford-place, Bagnigge Wells-road. He immediately proceeded under cover of the dusk of the evening to a friend's house at Notting-hill, Bayswater, where he entirely changed his dress. The warders were in pursuit of him during the whole of Monday night, and on Tuesday morning, after having traced him to several of his old haunts, they took him into custody at the Black Horse public-house, Notting-hill, where they found him sitting unconcernedly over a pint of porter. He was instantly reconveyed to his old quarters in Coldbath-fields. He is a powerful as well as agile young fellow. It appears to have created very general surprise that a prisoner could have escaped so very easily from a place in which the rules of prison discipline are so stringent as the House of Correction.

KILLING TWO BIRDS WITH ONE STONE.—The treaty of peace with China will leave disposable a large land and sea force. A private letter from Bombay mentions that Sir Henry Pottinger had proposed to take advantage of these means, and to proceed to Japan and demand satisfaction for the long-continued insults we have endured from the Emperor, and to require admission for our ships to those islands on terms of mutual mercantile advantage. The cruelties exercised against the crews of vessels wrecked on these islands demand that some steps should be taken, and no more favourable opportunity has been afforded than the presence of our ships and troops in China, from which they can easily be directed upon Jeddo and other ports in Japan.

PRISON DISCIPLINE.—The commissioners for inquiring into the present state of the prisons in Gloucestershire have concluded their labours at Northleach and Gloucester, and proceeded to Littledean. The examination is strictly private, and no particulars will transpire until the publication of the official report.

A duel was fought with swords on Monday last, at Grenoble, between a lieutenant and a sub-lieutenant of the Orleans chasseurs, the result of a quarrel arising at cards. After a very few lunges, the lieutenant was pierced through the body, in the region of the heart, by the sword of his adversary; but, before falling, he had sufficient strength and resolution to return the thrust and wound the sub-lieutenant so severely that he was carried to the hospital in a hopeless state. The lieutenant expired on the ground.

IRISH HEROES.—We observe that our Irish contemporaries are taking an early opportunity of advancing the claim of the sister country, not to the Sycee silver, but to a great portion of the fame arising from the success of the Chinese expedition. It appears that Sir Hugh Gough is an indisputable Irishman, as is also Sir Henry Pottinger, who is claimed as a native of Belfast. The late Colonel Stephens, of the 49th, who died of fatigue and exposure to the sun, while engaged in the attack upon Chin-Keang-foo, on the 21st of July, was a native of Dublin, and son of the late Thomas Stephens, of Bride-street. He accompanied the expedition to Walcheren, and was present at the siege of Flushing, served in the Peninsula from March, 1810, to the end of the war, including the battles of Busaco, siege of Almeida, battle of Fuentes d'Onor, storming the forts at the battle of Salamanca (severely wounded through the thigh), siege of Burgos, action of Cabecon, battle of Vittoria, battles of the Pyrenees, Nivelle, Nive, Orthes, and Toulouse, besides several other minor affairs.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.—The first representation of the "Adelphi" of Terence will take place at St. Peter's College on Monday, the 12th of December. The second and third representations, with the addition of a prologue and epilogue, on Thursday, the 15th, and Monday, the 19th of December.

ACCIDENT TO LADY FREMANTLE SOMERSET.—We regret to state that her ladyship met with an unpleasant accident on Saturday last, at Deal Castle, by a heavy roller-blind (with an iron rod, &c., attached to it) falling upon her head, which was much cut and bruised. The effusion of blood that followed was very great, but we are happy to add that her ladyship is rapidly recovering.

We perceive that a new article of commerce has been introduced by the tariff. Nitron from Egypt, the duty on which amounted to a prohibition, is now advertised for sale by auction. It will most probably interfere with the manufacture of soda.

The Poor-law Commissioners have appointed Stephen Charles Denison, Esq., of the Inner Temple, barrister-at-law, to be an Assistant Commissioner, for the period of 30 days, for the purpose of inquiring specially into the employment of women and children in agriculture.

SEALS IN THE TWEED.—Since the close of the fishing season there have been two or three seals seen in the river. One in particular took up his residence nearly opposite to South Boils Fishery, where he has been ever since on the "look out" for salmon on their passage to the upper parts of the river. The bailiffs, hearing of the depredations committed by the notorious poacher, sent out a party in pursuit of him, and, after a capital chase of several hours, they succeeded in shooting him. On being brought to shore, he was found to weigh upwards of a hundred weight.

ENTRANCE TO THE BOLAN PASS FROM DADUR.

We this week present to our readers, from Mr. Atkinson's spirited and authentic Afghan sketches, two engravings of scenes of our Indian warfare –the one representing the celebrated Bolan Pass, and the other the Balla Hissar and City of Cabul from the Upper Part of the Citadel.

Leaving the encampment at Dadur for Kundye, a distance of eleven miles and a half, our troops entered the Bolan Pass, which is represented in this drawing, the road being rough and pebbly, between sand-hills, studded with flint and lime-stones of all sizes, the space in breadth between the mountains varying from three to four hundred yards to about thirty. As the torrent in the Pass runs deviously from one side of the gorge to the other, the army was compelled to cross it six or seven times, thereby adding to the hardships already experienced during the march to this Pass; and here, too, the British troops suffered great losses, by the continual discharge of musketry from the Beloochees, who had secreted themselves in dens hewn out of the stupendous mountains overhanging the Pass.

THE BALLA HISSAR AND CITY OF CABUL, FROM THE UPPER PART OF THE CITADEL.

The Balla Hissar comprehends nearly a fourth part of the city of Cabul, and is surrounded by a wall (the height being regulated according to the rise and fall of the mountains), with numerous bastions; but only two gates are now open; that to the west leading to the town, and the other on the east, called the Peshawar gate; both being closed at night. The upper part of the Balla Hissar is about four hundred and twenty yards by two hundred and fifty; the lower part is about one thousand by five hundred yards. The garden on the right is occupied by the British Envoy, formerly the residence of Dost Mahommed Khan; the building beyond is the Harem Serai, in which the Shah resides, although in a failing state. On the left of it is the Musjid Shahee, or Royal Mosque, in ruins, founded in the time of Akungeer. The roofs of the houses are flat, and but ill-suited to a climate in which so much snow falls. It was from Balla Hissar the British troops were recalled to the cantonment, dispirited and ill clad, and suffering most acutely under the deprivation of food, which scanty allowance they could only obtain by bribery and plunder during the night; and upon that same height they have avenged their former discomfiture, and planted the banner of their native land.

THE CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XVII

ST. BRIDE'S CHURCH, FLEET-STREET.

Crossing Blackfriars-bridge from the Surrey side of the river, the eye rests with peculiar satisfaction upon two spires which the most casual gazer would distinguish and select from the hundred which throng so closely upon each other in the City. That upon the right of St. Paul's, tapering so lightly and gracefully above its compeers, —small by degrees and beautifully less,—is the spire of St. Mary-le-Bow; the masterpiece of Sir Christopher Wren in that branch of his labours, and the owner of those famous bells whose sound is said to christen Cockney all those born within reach of the noisy music. The spire on the left of the bridge is claimed by Saint Bride's, and forms another of our architect's "records of a difficulty overcome." Second only to Bow in the elegance of its proportions, its symmetry and grace challenge and obtain a prompt approval. In its composition Sir Christopher introduced three styles, which yet blend harmoniously, and, with the adjuncts of vases, the outline is rendered gracefully pyramidal. In the two lower stories we have the Tuscan, in the next the Ionic, in the fifth the Composite. Before Franklin taught us how to carry harmless into the earth the electricity of a descending cloud, this spire, like most others, met with its mischances from lightning, having twice been struck. After one of the reparations thus rendered necessary, the steeple was shortened, and we do not, therefore, now see it in the elegance of its original proportions.

ST. BRIDE'S CHURCH.

Until 1824 the point of view from the bridge was the only one in which St. Bride's could be seen; and it is still one of the best. In that year a fire occurred in Fleet-street, and by the destruction of the adjoining houses it was discovered that an architectural ornament had been hidden up; and, a subscription being set on foot, the present approach, as shown in our engraving, and known as St. Bride's-avenue, was formed. The body of the church externally offers little for notice or comment; the interior is reached through the chief entrance by a porch formed within the tower, and containing amongst others the monument of Alderman Waithman, for many years one of the representatives of the City in Parliament,—a service repaid by an obelisk to his memory, erected not far from the church, and opposite the shop in which he, from being a poor country youth, gained a goodly fortune, and held the highest offices to which his fellow-citizens could raise him. The church internally consists of an area divided by columns into nave and aisles, and a recess forming a chancel. The last is profusely decorated, and its window has a copy in stained glass of the 'Descent from the Cross' by Rubens. The original picture is at Antwerp,—in the cathedral,—and the first feeling upon viewing this copy by Mr. Mass is one of surprise that he should have allowed himself so bold a licence in heightening the contrasts of the original. Upon glass it is rather a Rembrandt than a Rubens, the light being given almost entirely to the central figure, the accessory group being shrouded in one gloomy shadow. Still must considerable credit be given, and, when the material upon which the artist has had to work is taken into consideration, perhaps he is entitled to all the praise which has been awarded him.

The original church of St. Bride was a much less imposing structure than the present. It was founded at a very early date, and received its name from St. Bridgid, "a pious virgin of Kildare, in Ireland." St. Bride, as she has been called in England, had, also, like other saints, a holy well, whose water was supposed to be imbued with miraculous virtues in the cure of those who drank it when afflicted with disease. St. Bride's well was second to none in reputation; and the youthful Edward the Sixth, when he founded the hospital,—since converted into a prison,—named it Bridewell, from its neighbourhood to the well-known spring. The curious or thirsty wanderer through the narrow ways between the end of Fleet-street and Blackfriars may have detected a niche in the high graveyard wall, containing a most unpoetical-looking pump. That is the present dispenser of the holy water to those who are not scared from drinking it on account of its half-buried position below the thickly-crowded graveyard.

In the days when the nobility had their town houses in the city of London, the Earl of Dorset's abode was where Dorset-court now stands. To induce the parish not to bury on the south side of the church, under his windows, the earl gave them a piece of ground on the west side of Farringdon-street, to be used as a cemetery. But the Great Fire which destroyed so many noble houses, antique churches, and rich warehouses, enveloped in its ravages the mansion of the Earl of Dorset, with that of his near neighbour, the Bishop of Salisbury, and the old church of St. Bride; and since that time burials have been made round the church as they had been before.

Like all our London churches, St. Bride has its memories of men whose names live after them. In the old church, one of the fathers of printing, Wynkin de Worde, found a resting-place, and Baker, too, the author of the "Chronicles of the Kings of England," was buried, after an incarceration in the Fleet,—where many a bold heart had been broken before, and many a clear head has since been half crazed. Sir Richard Lovelace, also, after being a pattern of cavaliers and soldier-poets—after losing his fortune and his best years in the service of his unfortunate master, Charles the First, and bequeathing to after time some of the best of the fanciful conceits which were the poetic fashion of his age—his king dead, his mistress, his divine Althea, married to another, his fortune gone, his health broken down by imprisonment and reverses—poor, sick, and hopeless—died in a miserable lodging in Shoe-lane, and found a grave at St. Bride's. Close by, the heart and hand of Sackvil, the Lord Buckhurst of Elizabeth's reign, had previously been buried.

The present church contains the tombs of Nichols, the author of the history of Leicestershire, and of Richardson, of "Sir Charles Grandison" and "Pamela" memory,—books which in their day outvied all modern parallel in popularity, but which are now perhaps never looked at except from curiosity, as affording a picture of bygone manners. A modern literary name is associated with St. Bride's, in that of the present incumbent, the Rev. Thomas Dale, who received the living in 1835, unsolicited and unexpectedly, at the hands of Sir R. Peel. He is a poet and a master of the English language of no ordinary calibre. His style is chaste and pure, and his lectures popular. His poems have chiefly partaken of a devotional character.

THE CHINESE EMPIRE.

We have this week deemed it a duty rendered incumbent upon us by the course of events to present to our readers a Map of China, the late seat of our successful operations in war, and now of our triumphs and commercial enterprise in peace. The public will be able to gather from our geographical engraving an exact idea of the new country which is opened to the speculation of our merchants and of the locality, of the fresh possessions which are ceded to the British arms. We shall at the earliest opportunity add to our present illustration drawings of those Chinese features which are of most immediate interest to the people of this country. A contemporary has well opened up the extreme importance of the whole subject:—

"The splendid advantages which the treaty of peace concluded with China will, without doubt, bring to England place her at this moment in a truly elevated position. With the highest exultation and devout thankfulness has the news been received throughout the kingdom, not only on account of the military successes by which it has been preceded, but because further bloodshed is stopped, and because the honour accrues to British arms alone of opening a mighty empire and its resources to ourselves, and the other nations of the globe.

"For a period of many centuries China and its people appear to have remained jealously secluded within the limits of their own territories, and the pale of their own institutions. Intercourse with foreigners, from the earliest times of their history, seems scrupulously to have been avoided; and, though anciently it is supposed that they in some slight measure traded with the Pharoans, that they sent some of their silks and perfumes to Solomon and Sesostris, that they corresponded with Amenophis, and sent a bill of lading to the younger Menes, yet these few instances are rather conjectural than certain, and may be set down in the light of extraordinary exceptions to what was otherwise an undeviating rule. In modern times the same disposition has reigned quite as absolutely as regards their bearing towards Europeans, who, except by their own intrusiveness and perseverance, which has in repeated cases been checked by the 'flowery natives of the Celestial empire,' have never been able to become acquainted with more of the circuits of this 'kingdom and its provinces' than with a few straggling specimens near the quays and custom-houses of Canton and Macao.

"Preserving thus, from time immemorial, their independence and their institutions, and tenaciously adhering to their own religion, habits, and customs, in spite of attempts at innovation by the Missionary and the Jesuit, the people, while Europe, in common with other parts of Asia, has been shaken by rapid changes, political commotions, and tumultuous revolutions, have remained in apathetic quiet; the other kingdoms of the world have been convulsed with tempests, while no wave of its turbulence has made the slightest pressure on their shores. So long as confined to themselves, and uninterfered with by foreigners or intruders from without, so long this most singular of the Asiatic nations sustained itself in a state of permanent stability, characterised by a calm, orderly, and unmoved tranquillity.

This ancient and long-enduring state of things is now about to be disturbed, and the revolution which will be effected in this respect is mighty. A large family of the human race, which for centuries has been isolated from the rest, is now about to enter with them into mutual intercourse. Vast hordes of population, breaking through the ignorance and superstition which has for ages enveloped them, will now come out into the open day, and enjoy the freedom of a more expanded civilization, and enter upon prospects immeasurably grander. The mighty extension, also, on the other hand, of the political and commercial influence of England is almost as enormous and unequalled as the most ample imagination could desire. The expectations of a nation have rarely been opened to more magnificent and glorious views."

THE COLOSSEUM PRINT.

We have now to call the attention of our readers and subscribers to the promised prospectus of our Colosseum Print—a superb and original work of art, produced upon the grandest scale—which we pledged ourselves to present to all the readers of the

who should have punctually subscribed to the paper during the first six months of its existence. The great success which we have achieved now enables us to go to an extent of surprise that we are sure will more than crown the highest expectations of the public.

THE COLOSSEUM PRINT

derived its title, in the first instance, from an intention of presenting a magnificent engraving of LONDON AT ONE VIEW—to reflect, as it were, a similar grand picture to that so long exhibited at the Colosseum. The better taste, however, of our artists and advisers reminded us that we should thus exclude that wondrous leviathan of our metropolitan architecture,

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL;

and to this important recollection was added a suggestion that a much finer field of what may not inaptly be called "Panoramic glory" was presentable from another lofty eminence of London, which it, however, required official authority to enable us to reach.

TWO SPLENDID VIEWS OF THE METROPOLIS

have been the result of the altered proposition, taken north and south, from the summit of the

DUKE OF YORK'S COLUMN,

by the generous and nobly-granted permission of General Maitland, for himself and his co-trustees, who thus confided to us an exclusive right that stimulated our proprietors to a degree of exertion which they hope will prove worthy of the signal mark of favour they have received. Their

COLOSSEUM PRINT,

which will really be, in its superb dimensions, what the term "Colossal" is in reference to size, will then present two

ORIGINAL ASPECTS OF LONDON.

The upper or south view will comprise all that magnificent sweep of picturesque objects which stretch from the Surrey shores of the Thames, as far as they are visible on the right, to beyond the Tower of London, with its adjacent forests of shipping on the left. The splendid range of manufactories which skirt the river, grow upward from their far distance to the gazer's eye, until they are closed with, and encircled by, the venerable Abbey of Westminster, at once, with its solemn religious grandeur, absorbing mind and sight. But that fine pause of contemplation over, and away travels the eye, using as it were a kind of memory to bring present the old familiar features of the "City of the World." Look at the beautiful range of bridges spanning that river, which, though its waters are but silver, has been designated, for their burthen, the "river of gold." Mark the long lines of streets, the grand public buildings, the spires of old and new churches pointing to the sky, the Monument, the ancient and fortalice Tower, and 'mid all, and above all, the eternal grandeur of St. Paul's! And these objects are so woven into the picture, that they are not parts of a confused mass, but prominent beauties of such a clear and well-defined architectural panorama as was never before embodied in the forms of art turns the gazer upon a still more broad and open district of the metropolis. It stretches over the beautiful Parks; includes the Royal Palaces and mansions of our nobility; involves the finest streets in the world, Regent-street, Piccadilly, Portland-place, Whitehall, Trafalgar square, and the superb gathering of aristocratic clubs; and, in a word, concentrates within its focus all the palatial magnificence of western London to contrast with the staid and solid greatness of its commercial aspect; endless evidences of ill-accordance on the one hand, and on the other an expenditure whose lavishness might startle kings.

THE LOWER OR NORTH VIEW

Such are the two sections of the UNRIVALLED PICTURE which we are about to present to all good-will to our readers, and now the only other points connected with it which we wish to impress upon their attention are

ITS UNDOUBTED FIDELITY AND TRUTH.

It is, in plain terms, a Mirror of the Metropolis, and for its reflection we are indebted to the light of the sun!

M. Clanet was expressly commissioned by us to construct a Daguerreotype apparatus, whereby we have obtained a series of drawings that are as it were "impressions of the city itself," with all the niceties of perspective preserved, and an accuracy of detail never before equalled in panoramic art.

NOTICE.

THE COLOSSEUM PRINT will be ready on New Year's Day, when all persons will be entitled to receive it who have subscribed for six months from the commencement of the paper, or for six months previous to the publication of the print, or who pay a six months' subscription in advance from the time of the issue of the plate. This is the definite and distinct answer to all correspondents who have addressed us on the subject, and is a general guide to the public at large. The engraving is upon so grand and magnificent a scale, that it cannot be finished in a sufficient number printed before the time appointed for publication. Our subscribers have already so increased that the time requisite for printing becomes most important, and any delay that has arisen is attributable only to the necessity for such careful and deliberate arrangement as will make disappointment next to impossible.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1842.

No one who has watched the progress of society in Ireland can have failed to observe the marked improvement which has taken place during the last few years in the social and political condition of the people of that country. Outrages of all kinds, Agrarian as well as religious (if it be not an impiety to apply so sacred a term to such disgraceful and unchristian conflicts), which used to startle and afflict the civilised communities of other portions of the world, have, for some time past, ceased to distinguish the behaviour of our Irish fellow-subjects, and have happily given place to the pursuit and cultivation of peaceful objects, which cannot fail ultimately to place a country so blessed and endowed by nature amongst the most cherished and respected nations of the earth. Nor is this conversion of the Irish people likely to prove a fleeting or an evanescent one, for, although sudden changes are generally to be distrusted, yet such has been the nature of the recent regeneration of Ireland—so interwoven and associated with the most solemn and religious ceremonies—that, making all allowances for the fallibility of human resolutions, it is hardly probable that a people so sensitive to pious obligations should be guilty of any very extensive moral apostacy. It is scarcely necessary to say that we here allude to the great temperance movement in Ireland, to which may be attributed a reformation without parallel in the history of any country; for, whatever may be the credit due to a paternal and indulgent government, and a merciful and impartial administration of the laws, yet neither Whig nor Tory has a right to ascribe to his policy an event which really springs from an innate and latent goodness in the hearts of the people themselves. In this condition of Ireland, opening, as it does, such a bright and glorious vista of the future, we regard with unfeigned alarm and regret—nay, with positive indignation—the introduction of any legislatorial measure which can tend to disturb the new-born harmony of a country made already too familiar with internal dissensions. It was not without grave, and, as it turns out, prophetic forebodings of evil that we contemplated the introduction of a poor-law into Ireland; but, respecting, as we did, the feelings and opinions of many distinguished and sincere friends of that country, we reluctantly resigned our misgivings in the hope that with a system of centralisation before their eyes, such as that pursued in England, as a beacon to avoid, not as an example to follow, the administrators of the law would be enabled to carry the provisions of the new measure into effect in such a manner as would convince the people that the relief of a starving population, and not the maintenance of a lazy and ill-mannered staff of officials, was the paramount object of the commission. As it is, however, we sincerely regret to observe that the Irish poor-law is likely to turn out a miserable failure, for, as was often predicted, it appears to suit neither the habits nor the genius of the people, and the consequence is that frequent conflicts have already taken place between the peasantry and the executors of the law, in which it is calamitous to add several individuals have lost their lives. The affair of Skibbereen, which appeared in the last number of this paper, is a melancholy record of the brief history of the Irish poor-law, and supplies a sad and painful commentary on the barbarities that are perpetrated in the name of charity. Whatever may be the opinions of coroners, or the verdicts of their juries, such an occurrence is a disgrace to the participators in it, for it is a quarrel in which victory is entirely without honour. We perceive by the newspaper reports of the law proceedings in the Dublin Four Courts that the poor-law is likely to become a fertile source of litigation in Ireland, the commissioners having already instituted coercive proceedings against local boards of guardians for the exaction of sums of money, demands which appear on the face of them to be exorbitant and unreasonable. The commissioners, it would seem, have their favourite architects and builders, who contract for the erection of edifices after certain plans, and, although it is clearly shown to them that local artificers of tried ability and experience are ready to do the work at a much lower rate, and give unquestionable security for the performance of it, yet such is the determination of the commissioners, or such the arbitrary rules by which they are governed, that the economical suggestions of the local authorities are contumeliously rejected. Now, with all respect to the commissioners, we take leave to say that this is neither a prudent nor a wise resolve. By such a course as this they throw the middle classes, wealthy farmers and opulent shopkeepers, into the arms of the dissatisfied working classes, and the consequence is that the machinery of the measure is either rendered wholly inoperative, or so clogged with the blood of its victims that human nature shudders even at the contemplation of it. In penning these observations nothing can be more foreign to our purpose than to encourage in the slightest degree anything like a systematic opposition to the law of the land. On the contrary, our earnest advice to boards of guardians would be to make any reasonable sacrifice rather than risk their property by submitting themselves to the guidance of some sharking attorney who seldom entertains any feeling in common with his fellowmen, and naturally delights in every occasion that brings grist to his mill, without reference to the object which he undertakes to achieve. At the same time we admire the manly honesty of those gentlemen who have the independence to maintain the trust reposed in them by their poorer fellow ratepayers as much as we despise the sneaking cowardice of those nonentities who are to be found in every community, and who are not content with abandoning their own rights, but are continually throwing cold water on the exertions of their colleagues. We repeat that the existence of this state of things in Ireland fills us with real alarm, as calculated to disturb the cheerful prospects which improved habits are already beginning to produce. We are also deeply concerned to see that signs of increased illicit distillation have latterly manifested themselves in several parts of Ireland, than which no mischief can be more seductive or pernicious, but, as we have already exceeded our proper bounds, we must make this matter the subject of a separate article.

FOREIGN POLITICS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, NOV. 29.

A French election affords but little fun and frolic, generally speaking, but one that is going on to-day for the first arrondissement has supplied some food for laughter to the English in Paris. As you are aware, General Jacqueminot, who is a devoted partisan of Louis Philippe, was lately appointed commander-in-chief of the National Guards. The citizen-soldiers fancy themselves as great as the line, and have been up in arms because a marshal of France was not placed at their head. Jacqueminot never got higher than a colonel's brevet under the empire, and owes his present position to a lucky marriage into M. Duchatel's family, and the Minister of the Interior is the man to take care of relations. Jacqueminot's appointment rendered his re-election necessary according to the electoral law, and hence the agitation we have been witness to for the last few days. On Saturday night there was a preliminary meeting of the candidates, in order that they might be examined by the electors as to their qualifications for the honour of deputy. The general, who is the unpopular candidate, declined to attend, but some half-a-dozen aspirants for parliamentary honour stood for a few hours a cross-fire of questions, which are to us of a very uninteresting nature, but that the principal diatribes were directed against England. Thus every candidate had to declare that he would oppose the Ministre étranger—"my Lord Guizot." One inspired elector with flowing black locks, and bearded like the pard, shouted himself hoarse with à bas les Anglais, à bas les Rois Rats—Down with the English, down with the roast beef." Ridiculous as this outcry is, I fear the general will lose his election, although the Ministry and Court have done all in their power to secure his return. Bribery is very little resorted to in French elections—that is, hard cash is not paid for votes—but corruption is enormous, promises of place, crosses of honour, &c., being bandied about unsparingly. This day the polling committees or bureaux are formed. It may not be uninteresting to state the mode of a French election. The arrondissement or parish is divided into sections; there are three in the present one, each having a president and three scrutineers. The Ministerialists have one list and the Opposition another, so that the choice of the bureaux is often an index of the final struggle. The voting takes place to-morrow. Each elector must have attained his 25th year, and pay 200f. (£8) per year direct taxes. If he be a member of the Institut, or a military or naval officer on his pension, £4 per year qualify him. This qualification is high in France, although it may seem so low in England. When the electoral college assembles to-day and to-morrow there will be no discussion of any kind. It is prohibited by law. The elector takes an oath before voting. The successful candidate must have, to be elected, one vote over the third of the number of electors on the register, and one vote over the half of those who actually vote. If two ballots take place, and there is no majority, then the two candidates who have had the largest number of votes go to the poll, and the electors must vote for one of them. If there should be by chance equality, the most aged of the candidates is declared the deputy. The candidate must have attained his thirtieth year, and pay 500f. (£20) taxes to qualify him for deputy

The struggle to-morrow will be between General Jacqueminot and M. Portalis. In the first ballot there will be votes for half a dozen candidates. If the general has not the majority the first turn he will be beaten, as his opponents coalesce to give their votes to M. Portalis, who is a dynastic Liberal. These details you will hereafter not find useless, for the election is destined to have a great effect on the state of parties. General Jacqueminot, out of the fourteen arrondissements of the Seine, is the only avowed Ministerial supporter, for M. Lefebvre, the banker, is a Conservative of the Molé party; and the general's defeat will inevitably cause the fall of the Soult-Guizot Cabinet.

The questions which are destined to agitate the ensuing session of the French Chambers are numerous, and it is necessary to mention them, that some notion may be formed of the programme of parties. The right-of-search question, or abrogation of the treaties of 1831 and 1833 between England and France, stands first; 2nd, the question of the customs union with Belgium; 3rd, the American tariff; 4th, the increased tariff of the German customs union; 5th, the sugar question—that is, whether the native beet-root sugar manufacture is to be preserved or abolished, for the effectual protection of the colonial and maritime interests of France; 6th, the ruinous state of the wine-growers; 7th, the reduction of public functionaries sitting in the Chambers; 8th, the extension of the electoral franchise to the capacities—that is, the members of the legal and medical professions, or to those who have taken degrees; 9th, the administrative corruption: this question has arisen from the Hotel de Ville disclosures; 10th, the colonization of Algeria; 11th, the state of the French navy; 12th, the affair of Pajol, or the new nominations in the command of the troops of the line, and of the National Guards of Paris.

To this category we must add the foreign relations, such as the dispute with Spain, the state of Syria, Don Carlos's continued captivity at Bourges, &c.

Then there will be the dynastic money questions, such as the allowance to be made to the Duke of Nemours when Regent, and the increase to be made immediately to the Duchess of Orleans, as the guardian of the Count of Paris and the Duke de Chartres. Money is to be asked also to complete the square of the Louvre, to rebuild the royal library, &c.

The King will return to the Tuileries next week. He purposes to give extra balls, concerts, and receptions this winter, as the dynastic tradesmen have been suffering from the long Court mourning. The Duchess of Orleans will wear the widow's weeds for the whole twelvemonth, and will receive no company until after the 13th of July next. The Duchess of Nemours is, however, to have as gay a circle as possible. The Duke d'Amaule will return from his winter campaign in Africa for the spring season in Paris. His coming of age on the 16th of January next is to be celebrated at Chantilly with great fêtes. You are aware that he will be enormously rich, inheriting, as he does, the wealth of the last of the Condés, the successor of the unfortunate Duke of Bourbon, whose mysterious death at St. Leu caused General de Feucherès, the husband of Madame de Feucherès, the mistress of the duke, to bestow on public charities all the property he derived from his wife's death. The Duke d'Amaule will keep up the splendid hunting establishment at Chantilly, although he is no sportsman. The Duke of Nemours has the racing stud of the late Duke of Orleans, but the future Regent has no affection for the turf.

The Prince de Joinville is on a marrying expedition to the Brazils, but his success is very problematical, the Orleans family not being liked at Rio Janeiro. The Princess Clementine, the King's youngest daughter, will remain unmarried. She will assuredly not be husbanded unless he will consent to live in France with her, and a royal prince to accede to this condition has not yet been found.

The King enjoys pretty good health, but the disorder in his legs (the oozing of blood from the veins) prevents his taking the exercise he desires. He is more nervous and irritable of late, and his memory has not been quite so striking as it was; but he is still his own prime minister, and works most actively at affairs, relieving his mind by discussing plans of improvements with his architect. The building and pulling down mania of his Majesty, indeed, seems to increase with his years.

The Ministerial saloons are all opened, but as yet have not been overcrowded. Towards the end of next month the peers and deputies will have arrived, and we shall be more lively, when there are the politically private as well as public receptions. Lord Cowley proposes, it is said, to follow the example of Lord Granville, and have an open night in the week, independently of the dinners and the special parties. It is to be hoped that will prove correct, as the English in Paris have no resource, for the season get more and more reserved in their invitations to perfide Albion. De Lamartine, the poet and deputy, is about the only French circle open to the English, save the Foreign-office, where M. Guizot is certainly very attentive to our countrymen. You published in the ILLUSTRATED NEWS of last week the details of the Brussels tragedy. M. de Sirey and M. Caumartin are well known in the fashionable circles here. The former was an inveterate duellist, who once killed a man under very equivocal circumstances, for which he was tried. In fighting with his adversary with swords the latter, in parrying thrusts, retreated and fell into a ditch, and whilst in a recumbent position M. de Sirey ran him through the body. M. Caumartin, the advocate, quitted Paris yesterday morning to take his trial at Brussels, having first offered to surrender himself to the authorities here, who, however, had no jurisdiction in the case. M. Plougoulon, a celebrated advocate, accompanies M. Caumartin, whose friends rely on his acquittal, as he will be able to prove that he was provoked, struck, and finally wounded, before he stabbed M. de Sirey. Caumartin was as much beloved here as his unfortunate victim was disliked

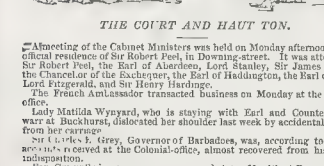
PARIS, Wednesday, Nov. 30.—The report current here of Prince Metternich's serious illness, and even death, is untrue. I have just seen a despatch of Count Fiahaut, the French ambassador, received here yesterday, in which his Excellency states that his Highness had been indisposed; but, adds the Count, he played his usual rubber with me last night. His dispatch is from Vienna, and is of the latest date from that capital.

I am happy to announce that Lord Cowley will open his saloons every Wednesday evening, in the Faubourg St. Honoré, during the season. He has a dinner party to-night, and Lady Cowley will receive in the evening a limited number of guests.

It appears by the Paris papers of Wednesday, that telegraphic despatches from Bayonne of Nov. 30th, Perpignan of Nov. 28th, and Madrid of the 29th of November, had reached the French Government. As we anticipated, the insurrection at Barcelona is virtually at an end. No sooner did the Captain-General, Van Halen, announce his intention of commencing the bombardment of the town on the 28th, than the insurgents exhibited a disposition to yield. The Brigadier Durando and the Junta will probably provide for their own safety before a full submission is tendered. The Velose steamer left Barcelona on the 28th for Port Vendres, with General Pastors. Lilmas, and other refugee functionaries remaining the revolt on board. The Regent arrived at Saragossa on the 24th. By a decree of the same date, the port of Barcelona was declared in a state of blockade from the river Belos to Llobregat. Madrid was tranquil on the 26th. The Emancipation of Toulouse announces the arrival at Barcelona of the Jemappe ship of the line with several steamers.

The Paris papers are almost exclusively occupied with the election of a deputy for the first arrondissement, which event took place on Wednesday. General Jacqueminot was the successful candidate by a majority of 147.



THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

The Cabinet Council of Ministers was held on Monday afternoon, at the official residence of Sir Robert Peel, in Downing-street. It was attended by Sir Robert Peel, the Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Stanley, Sir James Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Earl of Haddington, the Earl of Ripon, Lord Fitzgerald, and Sir Henry Hardinge.

The French Ambassador transacted business on Monday at the Foreign-office.

Lady Matilda Wyndham Wyndham, who is staying with Earl and Countess Delawarr at Buckhurst, dislocated her shoulder last week by accidentally falling from her carriage.

Sir Lascelles I. Grey, Governor of Barbadoes, was, according to the last accounts, received at the Colonial-office, almost recovered from his severe indisposition.

Earl Granville is now in a very improved state of health at Rome.

The Hon. A. Lascelles had £90,000 left by his late father, and he got £90,000 by his wife, who is the daughter of Sir R. Brooks, Bart.

The marriage of the daughter of the Duchess de Berry with the Archduke Stephen, son of the Palatine of Hungary, has been definitively decided upon by the Cabinet of Vienna.

Sunday last was the birthday of her Royal Highness the Princess Mary of Cambridge

We learn from our German correspondence that the rumours relative to the alarming state of Prince Metternich's health turn out to be unfounded.

A meeting of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners was held on Tuesday afternoon at their office in Whitehall-place. Sir Robert Peel, Sir James Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Bishop of London, and other commissioners attended

A deputation, consisting of Sir George Larpent, Bart., Mr. J. Komson Gladstone, Mr. John Travers, Mr. George Mosfatt, and Mr. W. W. Wickings, had an interview with Sir Robert Peel on Tuesday, at his official residence in Downing street.

The Governor of the Bank of England, and the Deputy Governor, had an interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in Downing-street.

The Earl of Haddington and other Cabinet Ministers had interviews with Sir Robert Peel, on Wednesday, at his official residence, in Downing-street.

Despatches for the Governor of Ceylon were sent off on Wednesday evening from the Colonial-office.

Despatches from Sir Charles Augot, Governor of Canada, were received on Wednesday, at the Colonial-office

On Wednesday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when Lieutenant Robert Reid, Esq., was appointed a provisional member of Council at Bombay.

His Imperial Highness the Archduke Frederick of Austria, accompanied by Baron Lederstern and Baron Koller, left Mivart's Hotel on Wednesday morning for Stratfieldsaye, on a visit to the Duke of Wellington.

The Marquis of Waterford has purchased the sporting stud of the late Captain Maddan.

The Marquis of Northampton, President of the Royal Society, arrived in town on Tuesday evening from his lordship's seat in Northamptonshire, to attend the anniversary meeting of the Royal Society on Wednesday at Somerset House.

BANQUET TO THE ARCHDUKE FREDERICK OF AUSTRIA.—On Tuesday evening the corporation of the Trinity House gave a sumptuous entertainment to his Imperial Highness the Archduke Frederick of Austria, on Tower hill. His Imperial Highness, accompanied by his Excellency Baron Neumann, the Austrian Minister, and attended by Captain Sir J. H. Pelly, R.N., M.P., was received on his arrival by Captain Sir J. H. Pelly, Bart., Deputy Master, and several of the elder brethren. The banquet was served up in what is called the "Experimental-room," and the repast was of the most sumptuous character. Sir J. H. Pelly, Bart., Deputy Master, presided, his Imperial Highness the Archduke Frederick being on the gallant chairman's right hand, and Sir R. Peel on his left. About sixty noblemen and gentlemen sat down. It was nearly eleven o'clock before the Archduke and party took their departure. In the course of the morning the Archduke Frederick was carried nearly two hours in going over the House of Correction in Tothill fields. His Imperial Highness, attended by Captain Fitzroy, R.N., M.P., and party, also visited Newgate, where the Archduke was received by the governor, and by him conducted through the different wards of the prison. Afterwards the Archduke and party went to the Post-office, in St. Martin's-le-Grand, and saw the interior of that extensive establishment. His Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge, the Duke of Devonshire, Sir Robert Peel, his Excellency Count Kielmansegge, his Excellency Baron Brunnow, Mr. Henry Goulburn, Lord Fitzgerald and Vesci, Admiral Sir Charles Rowley, Lord Colville, Lieut.-General Sir Andrew F. Barnard, and Captain Boldero, M.P., were among the visitors of his Imperial Highness on Wednesday at Mivart's Hotel.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS.—We understand that a letter has been addressed by Sir Robert Peel to each of the following noblemen and gentlemen, and that each has consented to be a member of the commission of metropolitan improvement:—The Lord Mayor, the Earl of Lincoln, Alexander Milne, Esq., Hon. Charles A. Gore, Lord Lyttelton, Lord Colborne, the Right Hon. J. C. Herries, Sir Robert Inglis, Bart., M.P., Sir Charles Lemon, Bart., M.P., Sir Robert Smirke, Henry T. Hope, Esq., H. Gally Knight, Esq., M.P., and Charles Barry, Esq.

THE SCOTTISH HOSPITAL.—A large party of the members and friends of this association dined together on Wednesday at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street. It was, we believe, the 117th occasion on which the supporters of this excellent society had assembled on St. Andrew's Day, to promote its charitable objects and to celebrate the recurrence of its anniversary. The Right Hon. the Earl of Haddington, (the First Lord of the Admiralty), one of the Vice-Presidents of the institution, occupied the chair, and was supported by the Hon. William Fraser, of Saltoun, and several other liberal friends of the society. During the convivialities of the evening a list of subscriptions amounting to £350 was announced.

ROBBERY OF THE LONDON JOINT STOCK BANK.—An unusual bustle was excited in the City in the course of Monday, in consequence of an extensive robbery committed upon the London Joint Stock Bank by one of the junior clerks of the establishment, named Edwin John Jordan. He is described a tall, thin young man, and he has been sent out on Saturday to collect the amount of the checks, and received at the Bank of England eighteen notes for £1000 each, one for £500, one for £300, one for £200, two for £100 each, three for £50 each, two for £40 each, two for £30 each, one for £20, and one for £5; total, £19,715. On Tuesday night we received information that nearly the whole of the property had been restored. Shortly after Jordan absconded he wrote to a friend upon the subject, expressing his regret at what he had done, and his willingness to restore the property, and in answer thereto an advertisement from his friend appeared in the papers of Tuesday, urging him to do so without delay. Whether, however, he waited to see that advertisement appears uncertain, as it is not at all known where he is; but, at all events, in the course of the latter part of Tuesday the sum of £19,415 was sent by [illegible] of his friends, who forthwith delivered the same into the hands of Mr. Ambrose Moore, one of the directors, and Mr. Pollard, the manager of the bank, about nine o'clock on Tuesday night. The amount advertised as stolen is £19,715; consequently a deficiency of £300 is unaccounted for.

FIRES IN THE METROPOLIS.—On Monday morning, about two o'clock, a fire was discovered by the police constable on duty passing in the cellarage underneath the premises known as "Holder's Hall," situate in College-hill, Upper Thames-street, in the occupation of a person named Richard Dellow, a basket-maker. With the aid of a plentiful supply of water the flames were confined to the cellarage, but not before that part of the premises had sustained considerable damage, and the stock was wholly consumed. The cause of the fire is unknown. There were several other fires in the metropolis during the night and Monday morning, which, however, were of a trifling nature.—On Tuesday evening a fire broke out at five o'clock at the well-known premises of Messrs. Warren, Russell, and Wyatt, blacking-makers, No. 30, Strand. The fire originated in the loft, among a large quantity of straw, kept there for packing blacking bottles. The premises fortunately being situated in the close vicinity of several stations, a number of engines were almost instantly on the spot, and a good supply of water being speedily obtained, such engines set actively to work, and in about an hour and a half the fire was entirely subdued. The premises of Messrs. Roake and Varty, booksellers, next to Messrs. Warren's, narrowly escaped. The blacking manufactory was much damaged, but the owners will not suffer, as the premises are insured, for the sum of £1,000, in the Phœnix and £2000 in the Sun fire-offices. The exact cause of the fire is not yet known.

EXTRAORDINARY SUICIDES IN ONE FAMILY.—On Tuesday a most singular attempt at suicide was made by a man of the name of Dobell, a leather-dresser, residing in Elm-street, Long-lane, Bermondsey. What attaches particular interest to the attempt at self-destruction arises from the fact, that about a year ago a brother of this individual, a respectable butcher in Bermondsey-street, drank a large quantity of arsenic, and, taking an opportunity to go up stairs as if to clean himself, nearly separated his head from the trunk with a large knife. Hardly two months elapsed after the inquest when another brother, a leather-dresser, living in Crosby-row, Long-lane, was found in a dying state in bed, having swallowed the immense quantity of one ounce of arsenic. He was taken to Guy's Hospital, but did not live long after his arrival there. It appears that in the case on Tuesday Mrs. Dobell had gone out on some trifling errand, and upon her return home found her husband in dreadful agony, and nearly insensible. A surgeon was called in, who ascertained that Dobell had also taken a large dose of arsenic, and that his life was in imminent danger. Having applied the usual remedies, he was afterwards taken to the workhouse. Dobell was so exhausted as to be unable to speak, and therefore to explain what could have induced the attempt on his life.

Another suspension bridge is projected across the Thames; it is to be between Cheyne-walk, Chelsea, and the opposite shore of Battersea.

The treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between her Majesty and the Republic of Bolivia, signed at Sucre, September 29, 1840, was issued from the Parliamentary Paper Office on Tuesday last.

POSTSCRIPT.

Saturday Morning.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT.—On Thursday, the Queen felt perfectly recovered from the cold her Majesty had been labouring under for these some days back, and Sir James Clark has been relieved from his attendance at the castle. Her Majesty did not leave the castle during the day. Preparations were being made for the departure of the Queen to Windsor.

HER MAJESTY'S RETURN FROM WALMER CASTLE TO WINDSOR.—Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and suite leave Walmer at an early hour this morning en route for Windsor Castle, viâ Canterbury, Rochester, Dartford, and Blackheath. Mr. Whitmarsh, of the Green Man Hotel, Blackheath, has received the command of the Earl of Jersey, the Master of the Horse, to have relays of post-horses for four carriages-and-four awaiting her arrival, at a quarter before two, when, it is expected, her Majesty will alight for a short time. Her Majesty will depart from thence to Windsor, escorted by a detachment of the 8th Hussars, through Greenwich, Deptford, New-cross, Peckham, &c., to the Great Western Railway, where a special train will be in attendence for the reception of her Majesty and suite.

It is stated that Lieutenant-General Sir Hugh Gough, G.C.B., with the greater part of the troops at present employed in China, will forthwith return to India; and that the command-in-chief will be entrusted to Major-General Lord Saltoun, G.C.H., C.B., at least until the payment of the twenty-one millions of dollars stipulated in the late treaty. The force under his lordship's orders will consist of a brigade at Chusan, a small garrison at Amoy, and two battalions (British), with artillery, at Hong-Kong, where, it is expected that the head-quarters will be established.

On Thursday, the Bank of England published the customary notice to lend money on the deposit of Exchequer-bills, India Bonds, and bills of exchange during the shutting of the books for the payment of the dividends. The rate of interest to be charged is the same as that of the last quarter, namely, 3½ per cent. per annum, and the money to be returned on or before the 17th of January. Promissory notes falling due by that day are also to be lodged with the securities, in order to avoid any difficulty respecting the precise time the Bank can reclaim the money.

FRIGHTFUL OCCURRENCE. On Wednesday evening as the Rev. Wm. Bathurst was delivering his customary Wednesday evening lecture at St. Giles's church, Oxford, his bands by some means got caught in the flame of the candle lighted at the side of the pulpit. Immediately, to the great consternation of the congregation, his face was enveloped in flames. Fortunately, however, he had the presence of mind to envelope his face in the velvet hangings of the pulpit, which had the effect of extinguishing the flames, not, however, till his neckcloth had also caught fire and his face was dreadfully burnt. Prompt assistance was given, and the rev. gentleman conveyed out of church.

On Tuesday evening last an atrocious attempt was made to throw the London mail train off the Birkenhead and Chester Railway, by placing a large beam of wood, called a sleeper, about 9 feet in length, in such a position as to come in contact with the engine; and it had actually penetrated the engine, but not the boiler, or it might have burst. The injury was not so extensive as to prevent the train from passing to its destination. A fellow of the name of Morton is in custody on the charge of having been guilty of this wicked act.

On Friday morning, at twelve o'clock, two privates of the 1st Life Guards, now stationed at Hyde-park Barracks, Knightsbridge, were taken to the strong-room for being drunk. One of the prisoners wrenched several stronc iron bars from the window of the room where they were confined, opened the casement, and, with one hand, laid hold of the sill of the next window, to endeavour to drop to the ground, but he missed his hold, and fell on the stone pavement. He was carried to the Hospital of his regiment with both his thighs broken, and otherwise dreadfully bruised.

A secret to state that a collision took place on the river Mersey on Wednesday night last, nearly opposite the Magazines, in consequence of which two fine steamers, the Royal Victoria and the PRINCE OF WALES, were seriously damaged, one life was lost, and [illegible] individuals were grously injured.

[illegible] LOSS OF LIFE AND PROPERTY AT SEA.—The Richard and [illegible] from Corunna to Southampton, laden with cattle, encountered a storm just as she left the Spanish coast, and became almost a wreck. The [illegible] was carried to the Hospital of his regiment with both his thighs broken, and otherwise dreadfully bruised.

[illegible] d by the late terrific storm at Falcha[illegible]reole. Wales [illegible]ne so notorious in our recent discussions with America. Early on [illegible]v morning several pieces of wreck, apparently of a foreign vessel about 150 tons burden, were washed ashore on the Mew. There was the main hatchway, part of a mast, and a few pieces of detached planks. On the hatch was cut "H. G. Nag. Net Y. E. Register." Same day part of the combings of a hatchway and a few deck planks, supposed to belong to the same vessel, were washed ashore near Macgwyn's Bluff. On Sunday night last, at Strangford, during a dreadful gale of wind from the south west, a ship belonging to Newcastle, named the Echo, commanded by Mr. Evans, and a crew of seven persons, was totally lost on the Cannon Rocks, near the North and South Light, and four persons were drowned. During the same night a double schooner named the Hope of Liverpool, with a cargo of coals on board, foundered in the Channel. Those on board save their lives by jumping into the stern-boat, which was in a few hours after picked up by a vessel, and landed safely at Strangford. On Monday morning last, at Newhaven, a vessel, supposed about 30 tons burthen, was found totally wrecked, on the rocks under the cliff, westward of the harbour of that port. From the name of Manuel being painted in white letters on a quarter-board, which was washed ashore in the course of the morning, she is supposed to be a French craft. All the crew are reported to have perished with the vessel. At King's road, near Bristol, on Wednesday morning last, a collision took place between the Brilliant steamer and the ship William Miles, whereby several persons nearly lost their lives. By the barque Venus, which arrived at Antwerp on Thursday last, the master reports having passed on the morning of Friday, the 16th of last month, the wreck of a large vessel, burnt to the water's edge. He bore round it several times for the purpose of discovering her name, but was unable to do so. The wreck was in lat. about 49, lon. 8. Among the accounts received by the Great Western steam-ship, which arrived at Liverpool on Wednesday morning, were those dated Nassau, October 22, and New Orleans, November 8, detailing the destruction of two vessels by fire—namely, the Maid of Arkansas, a steamer, and an American ship, the Ceres, Captain Cliffe, from Mobile to New York. That of the Maid of Arkansas, which is described to be a second-class steamer, took place at an early hour on the morning of the 3rd of last month, while on her voyage with passengers and a cargo of cotton bales to New Orleans. It happened off Carrolton, and the crew and passengers had great difficulty in escaping. The steamer was totally consumed. The loss of the other vessel, the Ceres, occurred on the 12th, off Cape Carnaveral. She was also laden with cotton, and was burnt to the water's edge. The captain saved the lives of those on board by running the vessel ashore on the west end of the Grand Bahama. She was insured for £2000. The Great Western also brings tidings of the loss of several other ships. The Trial, a fine three-masted vessel, master's name Le Blanc, from Prince Edward's Island for St. John's, Newfoundland, went ashore on the night of the 3rd of November, at Pomphit, near Antigonish, and became a total wreck. All hands, amounting to 28 persons, perished. On the 18th of the same month the ship Eliza, belonging to London, was driven, by a furious gale, off the east on to the south-east end of the island of Anticosta. About three hours after she slid off the rocks into deep water, and sunk immediately. Two seamen, and a passenger named Touton, were drowned, the rest of the crew reached the shore. On the 3rd of the same month the ship Mary, of Sydney, was totally lost near Manilla: the crew were saved. Amongst the other vessels wrecked are the Shamrock, on the Barnegas shoals; the Curlew, Capt. Ritchie, of Argyle; the barque Resolution, of London; the schooners George and Empress, and three others. The loss of the latter is stated to be £70,000.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT, FRIDAY. Robert Williamson, a hard-featured old man of 63, a Chelsea pensioner, described in the calendar as a baker, was indicted for the wilful murder of Sarah Williamson, his wife.—We have already given the particulars of this case when before the police magistrate. The Lord Mayor summed up the case with great minuteness, and left it to the jury to say, whether the prisoner had received such provocation as would reduce his offence to the crime of manslaughter only.—The jury, after a very short deliberation, acquitted the prisoner of murder, but found him guilty of manslaughter.—Sentence was deferred.

William Deacy, aged 40, a soldier, was charged with the wilful murder of John Berrick. The prisoner, by the coroner's inquisition, appeared to be charged with the offence of manslaughter. Mr. Charnock defended the prisoner.—Mr. Baron Parke, at the close of the evidence for the prosecution, said that there did not appear to be any foundation for the charge of murder, and he must confess that he was surprised, when the coroner's jury had returned a verdict of manslaughter only, that a charge of murder should be preferred against the prisoner.—Lord Chief Justice Denman said he quite concurred in the observations that had been made by his learned brother, and he thought that they applied equally to the former case. He would not help expressing his opinion, that, in such cases as these, it was most cruel to put an individual upon his trial for his life. A verdict of Not Guilty was then returned, and the court ordered the prisoner to be immediately discharged.

The grand jury having returned a true bill against Mr. Barnard Gregory, for publishing an alleged libel in the Satirist newspaper upon the Duke of Beaufort, Mr. Bodkin applied to the court to fix the amount of recognizances, and Lord Denman directed that the defendant should enter into his own recognizance in £100, and find two sureties in £50 each, to abide his trial.

FOREIGN.

ARRIVAL OF ESPARTERO AT BARCELONA.—We have received the annexed telegraphic despatches, which reached the French Government on Thursday afternoon, and are published in the Messager of that evening:—

"BAYONNE, Dec. 1.—The Regent left Saragossa on the 27th for Barcelona. The national militia presented him with an address of devotion and sympathy."

"BARCELONA, Nov 29.—The Captain-General no longer threatens Barcelona with a bombardment. Salvos from the fort of Montjuich announce the arrival of the Regent at head-quarters. The new Junta named last night is composed of the Bishop, and of the most influential and wealthiest manufacturers and proprietors; it is supported by the majority of the militia. Several members of the old Junta have taken refuge on board French ships of war."

BARCELONA—THE SQUARE OF THE PLAZA.

Spain has again become the scene of one of those outbursts of popular feeling which have before so frequently deluged her in blood, setting brother against brother and father against son; stopping the progress of improvement, and impeding the advance of trade. As it seems at present doubtful what the results of the struggle may be, and as the public gaze is now anxiously directed to Barcelona, we at once give some illustrations which will assist our readers in forming a correct conception of the scene of action. This insurrection is the more to be regretted since it has commenced in a city like Barcelona, which, next to Madrid and Valencia, is certainly the largest, most industrious, and flourishing in Spain. Placed on the coast of Catalonia, in one of the finest provinces of this fine country, the people of Barcelona have always evinced a spirit of commercial industry, joined to the desire for political liberty. In the last wars the Catalonians made a gallant stand for the cause they espoused, and, when their country was invaded by Napoleon, the natives of this province of Spain displayed the most devoted heroism, making sacrifices of life and property which truly told the intense sincerity of the feeling which prompted them.

This square is the chief one in Barcelona, and has been the scene of many a Spanish bull feast and many an auto-da-fé. Of these wholesale butcheries the neighbouring Convent of Dominicans contains some characteristic memorials. The walls of this building are ornamented with the portraits of no less than five hundred heretics—their names inscribed beneath each figure—enduring the torment of the flames. They are surrounded by demons, drawn in all the hideous and grotesque shapes which imagination could suggest, who amuse themselves by torturing and devouring the unhappy victims who writhe in vain struggles to escape. As a set-off against these fearful memories thus lingering about the Square of the Plaza, there is one of a character as glorious to Spain as the others are disgraceful. It was here that Ferdinand and Isabella, surrounded by a crowd of proud and wondering courtiers, received at the hands of Columbus the tribute of the New World!

THE FIGHT AT THE RAMBLA, BARCELONA.

The Rambla is the chief street in Barcelona, and usually displays a scene far different from that which our artist has here had to depict. The Rambla is the public promenade and chief highway through the city, and, in place of troops and artillery drawn up in order of battle, its pavement is occupied under happier auspices by the light feet of some of the prettiest maidens in Spain. Here may usually be seen the bustle of business, mingled with the glitter of fashion. Students in their dark habiliments and monstrous hats—officers in showy uniforms, the clergy—curates, canons, vicars—priests in garments black, white, blue, and grey, their heads shaved bare at the crown and round the neck and temples—with men of business and Spanish ladies, are the usual figures seen in the Rambla. How this state of things has been varied by existing disturbances is shown in our engraving.

THE BARCELONA INSURRECTION.

The news from Barcelona continues to wear the most alarming aspect, and it appears that in the account which we gave last week of the outbreak we greatly underrated the disasters which attended it. We find in a Paris journal (the National) the following details of the conflict, by which it appears that the loss of life was much greater than was at first generally supposed. The account is contained in a letter from Barcelona, the date of which is not given, but it was doubtless on the 18th ult.:—

"All the streets were barricaded. The troops have sustained great losses—two colonels, a lieutenant-colonel, six or seven commandants, 15 captains, and more than 100 inferior officers. The total amount of killed exceeds 500. The people have also lost great numbers. The bombardment from the fort of Montjuich has not done any great damage. The French Consul has afforded protection to his fellow-countrymen, and has also been serviceable to many Spaniards. The Junta has taken measures to preserve order. It grants, without hesitation, permission to all persons who do not belong to the town to leave it. The passport is in the following terms:—'Junta of Barcelona—Suffer to pass out through St. Anthony's Gate Citizen ——. The Nation and Liberty.' It is the 3d battalion of National Guards that has suffered most from the fire of the troops. Zurbano, in his sheep-skin jacket, as usual, determined to make himself conspicuous. He charged down the street of Fernando VII. at the head of the cavalry, but the charge was so badly executed that he lost a great many men, and received a brasera which nearly killed him. It is said that he has gone to Tarragona, to bring in the soldiers from that place."

Under the date of the 18th, the Presse has the following from Barcelona:—

"The Burgos provincial regiment, with Colonel Llegat at its head, has come into the town to join the insurgents. A report is current that Zurbano has caused two republicans to be shot. If this should prove to be true, General Zavala, who is in the hands of the insurgents, will undergo the same fate by way of reprisal. I open my letter to add that the guns are at this moment firing for the news which has arrived, that Saragossa has declared itself in favour of the insurrection."

We have been favoured with the following extract of a letter received by Messrs. Grafton and Co., the gas contractors of Paris, from their agent at Barcelona, dated November 18:—

"The Provisional Junta is actively endeavouring to profit by a success which has taken it by surprise. It is sending emissaries to Saragossa, Valencia, and Tarragona, in the hope of being able to create a similar movement. Should it succeed, adieu to the ancient kingdom of Aragon! Spain will lose four of her richest provinces. The Junta has sent to us to express its satisfaction at the manner in which the service of lighting the streets was performed during the three days. The fact is, on Tuesday, and particularly Wednesday, the lamps were lighted amidst volleys of canister shot, nor did we cease until the balls rolled about the lamp-posts. The inhabitants are hourly expecting the surrender of the celebrated fortress of Montjuich, which is situated upon a very high hill, commanding the town. On Wednesday we were honoured at the gasworks with a few shells, which fortunately burst in the air. You will probably be astonished at the ease with which the troops were vanquished. Alas! for weeks they had been almost starving, and when the conflict took place they had not an hour's provision in any of the barracks, and the National Guard is composed of the working classes, who are well armed, and have plenty of ammunition. When the troops capitulated they received from the town provisions and a month's pay. During the whole of the insurrection there was no political rallying cry. It was a deadly conflict between the troops and the National Guards, without reference to party or politics."

It appears that the heavy firing which was heard on the 18th, when our accounts of last week left Barcelona, arose from an attempt made by some troops of the Junta to cut off the communications of General Van Halen with the fort of Montjuich. The insurgents were repulsed with some loss, the garrison of the fortress throwing at the same time a few shells into the town. The assailants were easily dispersed, and the Captain-General was enabled to revictual Montjuich. This was most important, as this point commands the town. The shops were closed, and all business was at a stand still. Everybody was trying to conceal what was valuable, for the Junta would allow nobody to leave the town, to the great dismay of several capitalists and people of property who were about to emigrate.

A new Consultative Junta was formed on the 18th, composed of the most respectable and influential persons of the country; but this Junta will probably be overpowered by the partisans of the Republic, for, notwithstanding what is stated in the new proclamation, it is certain that the democratic party intends to push matters much farther, and to proclaim eventually a Republic. The following document, in the original words of the proclamation, shows what the Junta now demands:—

"Union entre todos los Liberales. Abajo Espartero y su gobierno Cortes constituyentes: En Caso de Regencia, una de uno. En Caso de enlace de la reina Isabel II., con Espanol: Justicia y Proteccion á la industria nacional."

Such, says the Junta, is its banner, and a curious one. It begins by calling for union among all Liberals, and then cries out, "Down with Espartero and his Government!" It asks for the constituent Cortes, and then, in case there must be a Regency, that several persons shall compose it. Then, in case the Queen marries, she must have a Spaniard; and, finally, justice and protection for the national industry are insisted upon. This conceals clumsily the designs of the revolutionists. They would upset Espartero, and accept, perhaps, Don Francisco de Paule in a joint regency, and, as a pis aller, allow one of his sons to marry the unfortunate Queen, but only to await a fitting opportunity to destroy the monarchy in Spain altogether. The hatred of these rabid democrats to England is immense. They think that they have effectually put a stop to any commercial treaty.

The Junta affects to display great anxiety for the protection of property. On the 19th it ordered a man to be shot, convicted of pillage, and it menaces instant death for any one caught in the act of robbery.

At this date it was understood that the Republicans were urging the Junta to proclaim a Republic at once. The Deputy Llenor, ex-President of the Junta of Vigilance, had been appointed commander of the National Guards. His opinions are of a violent nature, and his nomination is expected to lead to the proclamation of a Republic.

DECLARATION OF THE DIRECTING JUNTA.

"Catalonians!—Public anxiety demands and even insists on having from this Junta a frank and sincere manifestation of the object to which our efforts and our sacrifices tend. The demand is a just one, and we shall proceed to state to you, with all the purity of our sentiments, the symbol or motto which from this moment we mark on our banner, in the benevolent shadow of which there will not be a single liberal Spaniard who will not abjure all miserable party differences, and who, with the faith and enthusiasm inspired by the sacred name of liberty and justice, will not be prepared to join us in ensuring our independence, our prosperity, and our glory. Union amongst all Liberals; the overthrow of Espartero and his Government; the constituent Cortes in the event of the Regency, more than one Regent; in case of the marriage of Queen Isabella II., a Spanish Prince; justice and protection for national industry; such are the motto and banner that we display, and to its triumph is attached that of Spain. The Junta does not think it necessary to expose the reasons upon which it founds its desires and its hopes, for they are unhappily known to all classes of the Spanish people; they are the result of the Government, our visible and ruinous decadency, the menaces of tyranny, and, above all, the universal discontent, the clamour which is re-echoed in all parts of the Peninsula against the dark and wicked machinations of a fatal and abominable Government. We desire liberty, good laws, and a good system of government, and, with such a noble end in view for objects so sacred, we will contend with ardour and constancy till death. Courageous Catalonians, valiant and free army, all you Spaniards who hate tyranny, join yourselves with confidence and firmness to free hearts, and hoist with us the flag on which are inscribed the fine hopes of a people so frequently sacrificed and sold. Let us break the charm of the fatality which causes the misfortunes of our country, and consolidate once for all peace, repose, public justice, liberty, the condition of the labouring classes, and the grandeur of this unhappy nation."

The Constitucional of Barcelona, of the 19th ult., says:—

"We have been informed from good sources of the intentions of General Van Halen with respect to this capital. He does not intend to attack the city, unless attacked himself; and, should that occur, he promises to give notice of his intention to the foreigners who may be there, granting them a certain delay. No couriers have arrived. It is supposed that they have been kept back by the Captain-General."

The Papagayo of Barcelona states that the daughters of General Van Halen were arrested by the people as they were about to embark, and were placed at the disposal of the Junta.

The Gazette de France contains a letter from Perpignan, dated Nov. 20, in which it is stated that the Provisional Junta of Barcelona had ordered that any person found guilty of robbery, even to the slightest extent, should be immediately shot, and that the same punishment should be inflicted upon butchers, bakers, or other dealers, taking advantage of the insurrection to raise the prices of provisions. According to this letter the insurgents held the wife of Zurbano, and the entire family of another general, as hostages, with a menace of cruel reprisals in the event of any further attack from the troops. It is added, that in the insurrection 300 of the troops and 200 of the populace were killed, and that amongst the dead was the son of Zurbano.

Barcelona, Nov. 21, Five p.m.

Our position becomes daily more precarious. General Van Halen is making preparations to bombard Barcelona. In answer to the demand addressed to him yesterday by the French Consul, who went to the headquarters of the Captain-General, in order to be able to take precautions on behalf of 3000 Frenchmen in the town, General Van Halen has just replied, both to the English and French Consuls, that he had made up his mind to bombard the town without delay. The British Consul immediately warned his countrymen, numbering about forty, to embark, but M. Lesseps, the French Consul, protested strongly against this intention of the Captain-General, declaring that he was quite unable to afford a refuge to the French subjects, for there was only one brig of war in the port, which was quite insufficient to receive them, the more especially as since the breaking out of the insurrection the family of General Van Halen, as well as of several other Spaniards, had taken refuge on board the Meleager, under shelter of the French flag. If Barcelona should be saved the horrors of a bombardment it will be owing to the firm language of the French Consul. A new municipality has been formed this day, composed chiefly of men of the party which has just triumphed.

PROCLAMATION OF THE DIRECTING JUNTA TO THE ARMY.

"Brave citizens of all ranks in the army!—Perfidious creatures—bastard children of Spain—spread in every direction reports of the discussion and hatred which they allege to exist between the people and the soldiers now in Barcelona.* Atrocious and insidious imposture, happily contradicted by palpable facts, and by the unquestionable testimony of the entire population and of the country, who enjoy amongst them peace, consideration, respect, and assistance supplied to them by the Junta. The soldiers of the battalions of Almansa, of Guadalascara, of Africa and America, those of the artillery, and of the 12th corps of cavalry, can testify this.

"History will have a fine page when it mentions this sublime act and grandeur of soul. After the conflict Barcelona embraced its adversaries by displaying for them a just sentiment of affection. Such are the sentiments and character of the liberalism of the Barcelonese!

"By day and by night the soldiers pass to and fro in this capital with security and with every guarantee. He who says the contrary is an impostor. (Qy. bar.) Order and good harmony exist in Barcelona between the military and population. Let the calumniators come here! Let them make the strictest personal inquiries! They will be eye-witnesses of the care bestowed on the soldier, and the tranquility he enjoys. Similar treatment is reserved for all those who shall come and range themselves under the banner of the Junta.

"What do you then expect, valiant soldiers? Come and receive the kiss of your countrymen, and recognise at last the iron hand which wishes to plunge us in the most degrading misery.

(Here follow the signatures of the Junta.)

"Barcelona, Nov. 21."

PROCLAMATION OF THE JUNTA ANNOUNCING THE NAMES OF THE CONSULTATIVE JUNTA.

"The following is the list of members elected by the electors of the different quarters of the city to compose our wise, just, and paternal Consultative Junta, whose names, written in letters of gold, we shall bequeath to posterity. Henceforth we shall fearlessly pursue the perilous enterprise which our patriotic ardour has undertaken. Yes, the wholesome instructions of the Consultative Junta and its wise counsels will lead us, doubtless, to our safety and prosperity. We may truly state, that whilst we weep for so many unhappy victims we triumph! We have accomplished the revolution of the 19th of November; and, if our feeble forces have for a moment made us tremble for the result, we shall say with pride, 'With the support and intelligence of our Junta we are certain of victory.' What greater glory can there be, what greater happiness, than thus to reap together the same laurels! Such is our opinion, Barcelonese. (Signed) "THE JUNTA.

"Barcelona, Nov. 21."

* About 1700 men were left in the town after Van Halen's retreat, refusing to follow him, or were cut off by the populace.

The Imparcial of Barcelona, of the 22nd ultimo, gives an article from Tarragona, dated Nov. 20, stating that a deputation had left that place for Barcelona, to concert with the Junta, and that the people of Tarragona had announced that, if any attempt were made to bombard Barcelona, they and all Catalonia would rush to the plain round the capital, and oppose the troops with desperation.

According to the Emancipation of Toulouse, as soon as the insurrection at Barcelona was known at Igualda, the National Guard assembled and took up arms in the cause of liberty. The guards at Reus have also declared their determination to support their brethren of Barcelona. Two battalions of Esparteros which were in this town received orders to join the army of Van Halen, but the militia and the people opposed their departure, and compelled them to remain in the barracks.

One important item of our present news is the prorogation of the Cortes, on the 22nd, by a decree of the Regent. The act of prorogation of the Cortes is generally but a prelude to the dissolution; and it looked as if the Regent intended to resort to the latter measure when he had completed his task at Barcelona.

The following telegraphic despatch, which had just reached the French Government, was received by extraordinary express in London from Paris on Wednesday morning: –

"PERPIGNAN, NOV. 26.

"Oliton and the environs have recognised the Junta."

"BARCELONA, NOV. 24.

"The bombardment, which was to have commenced at noon, has been suspended. The Junta has had a conference with Van Halen, who demands the release of the regiments prisoners. The French and other foreigners have embarked on board the French ships. The consuls of all the powers had protested: those of England and France were still on shore."

"NOV. 25.

"The city is still threatened with bombardment. The National Guard have consented that the regiments taken prisoners should rejoin Van Halen without arms. The foreigners still remain on board the French vessels. Campredon has recognised the Junta. Terradas has failed in the Lampourdan."

This express brings us accounts from Madrid to the 24th November. No fresh intelligence had been received from the provinces. All was tranquil at Madrid. A report prevailed at Madrid that Mr. Aston had sent despatches of a very urgent nature to Gibraltar, which were supposed to relate to some demonstration on the part of the English navy in regard to the events of Barcelona.

"PERPIGNAN, NOV. 26.

"The insurrection of the Lampourdan has commenced; the peasants are rising at the voice of Terradas. He has stopped the diligence between Jonquera and Figueras, and taken the letters and journals. He has issued a proclamation to the Catalonians. Barcelona was still in the same state."

We learn from the Paris papers of Tuesday that the French Government received telegraphic despatches on the afternoon of that day, by which it appears that all the towns whose adhesion to the Barcelona movement had been announced have returned to their allegiance to the Queen's Government. General Van Halen, with his army, occupied Gracia, Sorna, and Sanz. Three members of the Consultative Junta had taken flight on the French territory.

Advices from Figueras of the 23rd state that order was quite restored by the energetic conduct of the mayor. Girona had also returned to its duty. Terradas, who, with 50 armed men, had stopped the diligence near Jonquiera, was hotly pursued. Definitively it appears, from these last despatches, that the insurrection was entirely confined to the town of Barcelona.

The Bayonne telegraph announces complete tranquillity in the Basque provinces, and in Aragon.

Montjuich will be the rock of the Barcelona insurgents, who had the inconceivable folly to allow this stronghold to remain in the power of the troops, although we now learn that it has been two days deprived of provisions, and defended only by two companies. The Captain-General will now confine the insurrection to the walls of Barcelona, and we should not be surprised if the insurgents capitulate before Espartero's wrath falls upon them.

BARCELONA, NOV. 25.

Llinas, having no longer the confidence of the people, has been dismissed from the command of the armed force, and has taken refuge on board the Meleager. Brigadier Durando, a Piedmontese officer of merit, has taken the command. There is a question of attacking Van Halen.

On the 21st, at Valencia, the National Guard had forced the troops to take refuge in the citadel, but on the 22nd the revolt was tranquillized, of its own accord, for want of a leader. The Captain-General, Pedro Chacon, has returned to Valencia.

FIGHTING AT THE GATE, BARCELONA.

In this engraving we give a sketch of one of many such scenes which Barcelona has displayed during the last fortnight. The Catalonians have always been celebrated for their courage, and in most Spanish popular struggles the women have not failed to risk all the dangers of actual fight. Where the fray has been thickest there have the Spanish women been found. In the present instance this has again occurred.

Our news columns have afforded particulars of the scene above given. It is but a specimen of those now occurring, and will serve to give some notion of those struggles in which the turbulent passions of the Spanish people are so constantly involving them—passions which misery and death, the inevitable results, would appear unequal to subdue or even control.

CHINESE DIPLOMACY.

Feeling, as we always do, anxious to gratify the curiosity of our readers, by obtaining for their entertainment sketches of every thing novel and amusing, even when they occur in the most distant regions of the habitable globe, we herewith present our friends with the sketch of an event which took place on board her Majesty's good ship Cornwallis, lying in the Chin-Keang-foo river, and which is made interesting, not so much on account of our recent victories in that quarter, as being descriptive of the habits, manners, and personal demeanour of our newly-acquired Celestial allies in their diplomatic character, and a living example of whom may be shortly expected at the Court of St. James's. We are indebted to a quondam barbarian (but now, in Chinese parlance, the officer of a "most honourable nation") for the accompanying pictorial embellishment, and to one of her Majesty's naval officers for the letter-press description:—

"Three high mandarins—the Emperor's uncle Yung; the governor of these two provinces, Elepoo; and the Tartar general, Isaphen, commander-in-chief—came off on the 20th, attended by a numerous train of mandarins of various classes, to pay their respects to the plenipo, admiral, and general. The Cornwallis was appointed the place of meeting. A steamer was in attendance on them to take them from the shore to the flag-ship. When they stepped from the shore to the steamer they were saluted with three guns from the Cornwallis, the number they fire themselves on such occasions. When they came on board the big ship they were met at the gangway by two naval captains and the secretary of legation, who conducted them aft to the poop, or rather near the poop, on the quarter-deck, where the plenipo, admiral, and general stood as stiff as crutches, in the full dress and toggery of their offices. When the fokies approached near, our big-wigs advanced a couple of steps towards them with majestic mien, the fokies chinchinned, the Englese took of their castors and bowed, and, when both parties were sufficiently approximated, they shook paws most cordially, and then retired to the cabin to rest after so much labour. The marines were drawn up on the quarter-deck as a guard of honour, the seamen dispersed around the upper deck, and the ship was full of naval officers, all in their full uniforms, which gave everything a brilliant appearance. When they came on the side they had not time to recover from the dazzling effect of what they saw, when the band struck up 'God save the Queen,' and completed their bewilderment. They were really astonished and amazed. They were afterwards shown round the ship, which they admired and wondered at much. you may fancy people who never before saw anything larger than one of their own junks brought for the first time to see a line-of-battle ship. They had some tiffin, at which some of the mandarins got drunk on cherry cordial and brandy, and all then left highly delighted and pleased. Our people went a few days after to return the visit of the Celestials. They were received in a joss-house outside the city wall. Nothing worthy of notice occurred. They had a guard of Tartar soldiers, a whole host of mandarins, a band, and a tiffin of sweetmeat and samchoo. A good deal of ceremony. This may give you some idea of the meeting."

THE FASHIONS.

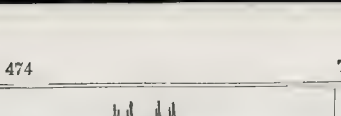
Paris, Rue Chaussee d'Antin, Nov. 30, 1842.

Mon cher Monsieur, The near approach of the new year has given to all our Parisian magasines an additional activity. Go where you will, everything gives token of the jour de l'an. In the shops long waves of gauze, rustling and sparkling in the midst of bronzes, of gold, of crystal, and of porcelain; cashmeres descending from their lofty stages, and spread upon vast tables, to display their magnificent arabesques; flowers and precious stones all speak of that season of festivity and happiness which is nowhere so well and, I may add, so kindly observed as in Paris. Truly may I call these things the forerunners of the jour de l'an, as we shall soon see the commencement of that series of wonders which Parisian industry elaborates all one year to celebrate the opening of another—wonders upon which taste is powerless to pronounce, and which it is equally only the power of the press to decry. To return, however, to the dresses of our Parisian beauties, and which we had almost overlooked in the bustle and excitement occasioned by other matters incidental to the season, I should remark that no very striking alteration has yet taken place in the style or fashion of our belles since I last wrote to you; and I should have been at loss for a subject, had there not appeared within the last two or three days one of the most elegant camails which can be conceived. This is of black velvet; the front bordered by a wide quilling of passementerie, four fingers wide at the bottom, but diminishing in width as it approaches towards the upper part. The bottom, and that part of it which surrounds the neck, are trimmed with the same passementerie, disposed in designs of a thousand different forms, and interspersed with rows of braiding. There is nothing else talked about, if we except the appearance of a very elegant paletot Russe in one of our select circles, and it is said that its advent is likely to work a complete revolution in the fashions of our Crispins, which have already become somewhat common. I remarked this paletot upon several of our most beautiful women, particularly upon Madame H. L., whose patronage stamps every thing she wears as possessing the charm of being uncommon and in the purest taste. I recommend you to give a drawing of this beautiful article, which, I think you will agree with me, deserves all the encomiums I have bestowed upon it. I have nothing else that strikes me as particularly new here, and I shall, therefore, leave you until next week, when you will hear further from HERMIETTE LE B.

It is rumoured that Mr. Justice Patteson (whose amiable lady's death is mentioned in our obituary) is about to retire from the bench. His lordship has for several years laboured under the harassing and increasing impediment of deafness, yet he has hitherto been esteemed one of the best practical judges in Westminster Hall.

POLAND.—Tuesday last being the anniversary of the late Polish Revolution, several meetings were held throughout the metropolis in celebration of that chivalrous event.

ARRIVAL OF CHINESE GUNS AT THE TOWER.—On Monday afternoon five brass cannon, captured by the British during the Chinese war, happily just terminated, arrived in a barge from the Royal Arsenal at Woolwich, and were landed on the Tower-wharf. Four of the guns are of large calibre, one of them being a 68-pounder, and the bore about 20 inches. All of them are splendid specimens of workmanship, and do not appear to have seen much service



CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

CAMBRIDGE.—Thomas Sater Auckland, B.A., of St. John's College, has been recently elected a fellow of Clare Hall, on the Pinpot foundation; and John Spurgin, B.A., of Corpus Christi College, a fellow on the Bowtge foundation. The following gentlemen have been admitted scholars of St. Peter's College:—Dickenson, Fitzpatrick, Golding, Parry, Smith, Stow, Suffield, Thompson; and also Druce, Hodgson, Owen, Woodley. Prizes were adjudged for mathematics to Thompson, and for classics to Stow, Suffield, Thompson.

From the curate of the Bishop of Chester it appears that within the last twelve years upwards of 170 new churches have been built within this diocese alone; by far the greater number being additional to those previously existing. The increase of accommodation appears to be—in Cheshire upwards of 21,000 sittings; in Lancashire, 90,000 sittings; and in Westmoreland, nearly 50,000.

The Rev. Dr. Warneford has promised £500 towards the endowment of a church, proposed to be erected on the Dicker Common, near Hailsham, Sussex, should his life be mercifully spared until the church is completed.

The Rev. Dr. Colls, of Trinity College, Cambridge, late Curate of Hampstead, and the Rev. T. E. Whytt, M.A., Curate of St. James's Church, Clerkenwell, have announced themselves as candidates for the rectory of St. James's Church, Duke's-place, City, vacant by the lamented death of the Rev. Dr. Povah. The living is in the gift of the Lord Mayor and Corporation of London.

Midshipmen: C. E. Rowes, to the Agincourt; George Stratton, from the Indus, to the Frolic. Volunteers First Class: W. F. Bent, to the Lucifer; H. Montagu, to the Vanguard; J. Marryatt, to the Samarang; G. B. Keene, to the St. Vincent; John Clark Sendy, to the Wasp. Clerk: Charles Richards, to the Samarang. First Engineer: G. Watson, to the Geyser steamer.

WARRANTS.—Gunners: W. Reid, to the Ocean; W. Stewart, to the Samarang.

COAST GUARD.—Lieutenant W. Southey; H. A. Finucane, to Cromarty, Lieutenant Marcus Knox. Removal: Lieutenant Harry Hill, from 48 tower to 39 tower.

SMYRNA, Nov. 9.—The French squadron, under Rear-Admiral La Susse, sailed hence on the 1st instant for Athens. It consisted of the two ships of the line, Inflexible and Santi Petri, the brig la Flèche, and the Fulton steamer. The British squadron, consisting of the Terrible, a short cruise along the coast, during which she rescued from a most perilous position the two English merchantmen, the Isabel and the Trio. The British corvette Magicienne arrived from Vouria on the 6th, and the Indus sail of the line from Malta on the 8th.

The Gorgon steam-vessel was commissioned at Woolwich, on Monday, by Captain Hotham; and Commander Hoskins, of the Devonshire, by Henry Baker, master, Mr. W. Coningworth, purser, Mr. John M'Donald, boatswain, and Mr. James Hinton, carpenter, have been appointed to her.

The United Service Gazette states that Admiral Sir Edward Owen, the naval commander-in-chief in the Mediterranean, has been recalled from his command, owing to his having introduced an unpopular system of naval discipline on that station.

GIBRALTAR, Nov. 17.—Her Majesty's ship Cambridge, 78, Captain E. Barnard, and Warspite, 50, Captain Lord John Hay, have been detained here nearly a fortnight by contrary winds. The Cambridge is to sail direct for England; the Warspite is to call at Cadiz, on her way, for the late Governor of Gibraltar, Sir Alexander Woodford, and family, who left a fortnight since in the Royal Tar steamer. Her Majesty's ship Formidable, 84, Captain Sir Charles Sullivan, Bart., is expected to sail for Malta about the 21st, having been relieved on this station by her Majesty's ship Rodney, 92, Captain Robert Maunsell, C.B. The Lord Bishop of Gibraltar, who arrived here from England in the Warspite, will take a passage to Malta in the Formidable. The French steam-frigate Asmodée, having on board his Royal Highness the Duke of Aumale, arrived on the morning of the 15th from Lisbon, on her way to Algiers, where his Royal Highness is to join the regiment of which he is Lieutenant-Colonel. A royal salute was fired by the ships of war here on his arrival, and the yards were manned. The Asmodée sailed last evening with his Royal Highness for Algiers. Ships at Gibraltar:—Rodney, 92; Formidable, 84; Cambridge, 78; Warspite, 50; and steam vessel Lizard.

MOVEMENTS.—The 69th have removed from Cork to Dublin. The 79th from Cork to Fermoy, to occupy the quarters of the 99th, for Dublin. The depot of the 88th, for Perth, to Dublin. The depôts of the 58th are now assembled at Chatham, and proceed in squads, escorting convicts to Botany Bay. More than twelve months will elapse before the entire corps leave England. The Cape will henceforth become regular quarters for a regiment of cavalry, to protect the frontiers. The 45th reserve at Limerick is to be consolidated with the 1st batt. at Cork, and it is supposed will proceed to China. The George the Fourth arrived at St. Helena with the 3d. Helena Regiment on the 4th October, after which the 66th proceed to Dublin, on being replaced by the 16th, whose quarters will be taken up by the 75th, on arriving from the Cape, where 186 of the privates have volunteered to the 91st. The [illegible] reports arrived at Portsmouth late from Quebec, with two troops of the 7th Hussars on board, after a long passage of thirty-one days. Both ships landed the hussars and their horses; and, as they are sadly out of condition from being between decks so long, they are now quartered in the town for a few days, after which they proceed to Chichester. Three other transports, with the remainder of this regiment, are hourly expected.

WINCHESTER.—The battalion of Coldstream Guards left per railway on Tuesday. They are replaced by the 3rd battalion of Grenadier Guards, under Colonel Hume, which are expected to remain here for some months. The battalion is nearly 600 strong, and have been recently at Manchester.

PLYMOUTH.—The 2nd battalion of the 42nd arrived at the Gosport terminus on Saturday, and marched upon landing between decks so long, they are now quartered in the town for a few days, after which they proceed to Chichester. Three other transports, with the remainder of this regiment, are hourly expected.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

YARMOUTH, Nov. 29.—The Rotterdam Packet, of Aberdeen, was wrecked on Hasborough Sand on the 24th inst.; crew saved.

GOOLE, Nov. 28.—The Integrity foundered on the Lynn Well on the 19th inst., with all hands.

COPENHAGEN, Nov. 22.—The Cristine Cecilie, from Praesto to Hull, put into Christiansand on the 12th inst., leaky, and must discharge.

ST. PETERSBURG, Nov. 15.—The Neptune, hence to Hull, got ashore to the N.E. of the lighthouse yesterday, but was assisted off and proceeded. The ice is quite firm at the bar.

WISBY, Nov. 10.—The Brithiof, from Christianstadt to London, got ashore at the Rolnecholm, on the east coast of this island, on the 3rd inst., and is expected to become a wreck; part of the cargo saved. The Fanourtina, from Chimanstadt for London, got ashore on the 4th instant near the same place, and is expected to become a wreck; part of the cargo saved.

ELSINEUR, Nov. 22.—The Elizabeth and Catherine, from Memel to Newport, put in here on the 20th inst., with loss of bowsprit, &c., having been in contact with the St. Harlampy, of St. Petersburg. The Elizabeth, of Harlepool, is putting back, still easy.

HAMBURG, Nov. 25.—The river is covered with ice beyond Stubnu; the Lightship off that place has quitted her station.

KALMAR, Nov. 23.—The Mary Turcan, got ashore on St. Petersburg to Liverpool, has put in here with loss of mainmast and considerable damage, and will discharge to repair.

DANTZIC, Nov. 30.—The George Clark, from Copenhagen to the Baltic, which went asaore on the 2nd inst., will be brought into the harbour overland.

PILLAU, Nov. 21.—The Blossom, from Konigsberg, is ashore on the Heerdgrunde. The Caroline Marie, from ditto, is on shore near Pesse.

SANDHANS, Nov. 17.—The Wilhelmina got ashore on the Langrocks near the Rokubles Reef, on the 15th inst., and is totally lost.

COPENHAGEN, Nov. 22.—The Julfrow Elizabeth, from Helbeck to Amsterdam, has put into Arendahl leaky, and will pumps choked.

GRAVESEND, Nov. 28.—Arrived, the Robert, from Miramichi; Harlequin Mariner, from Bologne; Emma and Emilie, from Ostend; Medemblick, from Medemblick. Sailed, the Abbey Hall, for Jamaica; Wellington, for New York; Osprey, for Hudira; Union, for Ostend; and Lord Strangford, for Hamburg.

MURDER OF SEVERAL BRITISH SEAMEN. A few days ago the ship Offley, Captain Lacelby, arrived in the river Thames from the South Sea whale-fishery, with 1200 barrels of sperm oil. We regret to learn that 17 of her crew, who had gone ashore on the islands, were barbarously massacred by the natives, and the remainder only saved their lives by plunging into the sea, and swimming through a heavy surf to the ship. During the voyage the Offley experienced very tempestuous weather. The following particulars of the dreadful massacre are taken from the ship's log:—On the 28th of April the vessel arrived at the Treasury Islands, when the second mate (Mr. Belcher) and the boat's crew went on shore to obtain water; and at that time they observed two natives only, who seemed to take no notice of their appearance, in consequence of which they left the water casks on the beach for the night, and on the following morning brought them on board all. They repeatedly visited the shore afterwards for water and wood, and did not receive the slightest molestation from the natives, until a scuffle took place between one of the chiefs and the captain. Three seamen having been detached from the brigan and the rest of the officers went on shore for the purpose of discovering their retreat; they succeeded in finding two, but of the other no tidings could be obtained, and they supposed that he had been murdered or carried away with a prisoner. No sooner was the arrival of the natives at the succeeding day. Her ship's crew were hailing, having previously landed the boat up upon the beach, when they poured down in great numbers, armed with bows and arrows and weapons of every description. They were instantly killed by arrows, and 13 others perished by their hands, but in what manner it was impossible to ascertain. The remainder of the crew plunged into the sea, and saved themselves by swimming to the ship. Among those who were murdered are the following:—The chief mate, Mr. Lake; the third mate, Mr. Chase; the ship's carpenter, the surgeon, George Donald, Charles Williams, George M'Kay, T. Greenwood, [illegible] Jones, J. Pearson, and another seaman named Jones. An attempt was made the next day by Mr. Belcher, the second mate, to discover the remains of the unfortunate parties, in so doing he nearly forfeited his life, for several natives, who were lying in ambush, rushed upon him and inflicted severe injuries about his body. When rescued, while swimming to the ship, it was found that he had been shot, for the arrow was still sticking in his temple, and was in an exhausted condition. He has since perfectly recovered.

SALVAGE CLAIMS. SPEEDY JUSTICE.—The Commissioners of Salvage for the port of Deal sat on Saturday last, at the Walmer Castle Inn, for the purpose of adjudicating upon the claim made by the crew of a Deal boat upon the owner of the brig Norval, of London, George Ferguson, master, of 180 tons, bound from Rio Janeiro to London, with a general cargo, for services rendered that morning during the gale. To show the expeditious manner in which these claims are settled, it may be observed that the master of the brig, with a portion of the boat's crew, landed at Deal between eight and nine o'clock, the commissioners were summoned to meet at half-past ten, and in less than three hours from the time of the master and the salvors landing on the beach the case had been decided. The commissioners present were Captain Holland, R.N. (in the chair), Captain Boys, R.N., and Messrs. Henderson, Culleid, Dixon, and Read. The boatmen having stated the nature of the claim, the commissioners deliberated in private for a few minutes, and awarded the sum of £44 to be paid to the boatmen for their services.

FOUR casks of claret, lashed to a spar, were found during the night of Friday week, off Walmer Castle, floating close by the Thunderer. On Monday they were brought on shore by a boat's crew of the vessel, and taken to the stores of the Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports. During the same gale which blew throughout the night, the topgallant-masts and yards of the Thunderer were obliged to be sent on deck. The French mail-packet Courrier, which left Calais on Sunday afternoon, failed to make Dover harbour, in consequence of the strong south-westerly wind blowing at the time. The packet landed her mails at Deal at ten o'clock; but from the heavy and dangerous sea the passengers remained on board, and were landed next morning at Ramsgate.

EMIGRATION FOR AMERICA.—On Tuesday forenoon the American line of packet-ship Wellington, of 703 tons register, Captain Chadwick, sailed from St. Katharine's Dock for New York. The number of cabin and steerage passengers does not exceed twenty; and, with cargo, the gross amount of freight from London to New York will be under £2 a ton.

THE WEST INDIA AND MEXICO MAILS. The following notice was issued on Tuesday at St. Martin's-le-Grand and the branch offices:—"The Clyde steamer, for the West India mails of the 1st December, not being ready to sail, will be detained until the arrival of the post of Saturday, the 3rd of December, at Falmouth. The Tay steamer arrived at Madeira on the evening of the 9th of November, and of the 10th inst.; she was prevented by a gale of wind from touching at Corunna."

VISIT OF HER MAJESTY TO WALMER CASTLE.

On Saturday the movements of the Court presented little novelty. The Queen and Prince Albert walked on the beach both in the morning and afternoon. Sir James Clark arrived at Walmer Castle at midnight.

On Sunday morning her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, with the members of the royal suite, attended divine service, which was performed within the castle. The Rev. Mr. Pennington, perpetual curate of Deal Chapel, officiated, and preached an admirable sermon from the gospel of the day. Her Majesty did not leave the castle during the day. The royal dinner circle included only the members of the royal suite.

The Downs, in consequence of the south-west winds, had become again studded with hundreds of outward-bound vessels to all nations, and exhibited the variety and activity of that branch of our commercial greatness. The weather was exceedingly fine for the season of the year.

The steamers from the Continent appeared off Dover harbour; but on account of the bar they signaled away. The consequence was that they were obliged to cut for Deal, or Ramsgate; and thereby the regular despatches for the metropolis were kept back for hours beyond their usual time.

On Monday there was a stiff breeze of southerly wind, with occasional showers. Towards noon, however, it brightened up, and became a little more mild. The Queen and Prince Albert walked in the garden; the Princess Royal and the Prince of Wales were also taken out for an airing in the garden. In the afternoon Prince Albert and Colonel Wylde rode out on horseback, and were absent from the castle for two hours. There was no addition to the royal dinner party, with the exception of the Hon. Mr. and Mrs. Anson. For the two previous days her Majesty had been labouring under a slight cold, which caused a swelling in her Majesty's face.

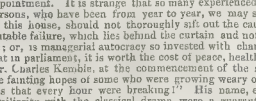
In reference to the report that a man dressed in the garb of a sailor had been seen prowling about the castle, with the intent of obtruding himself on the privacy of her Majesty, the circumstances, so far as we have been enabled to collect them, are as follow:—On Sunday morning, about eleven o'clock, a strange man in the dress of a sailor was seen at the entrance of Walmer Castle. Dr. Potts, of Portman-street, Adelphi, London, who, it is said, has had much to do in the treatment of lunatics, happening to pass, observed something strange in the man's manner. The doctor got into conversation with him, and the man, according to the statement of the doctor, talked wildly, and declared that he was Napoleon II., and also a Bourbon, and expressed an inclination to get into the castle. The doctor, however, directed his attention from this object, and got him to proceed to the True Briton public-house on the Walmer-road, and went to give information at the castle of his presence. On this Messrs. Russell and Stead, active officers of the London police, proceeded to the True Briton, where they found the man, whose name is Nichols, but, as they conceived he had committed no act to justify their apprehending him, he was suffered to go away; and thus the matter rests for the present.

On Tuesday the weather was more favourable, but her Majesty did not leave the castle, not having quite recovered from the effects of a cold. Sir James Clark still remained at the castle. The Princess Royal was drawn out on the beach in a small carriage. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Colonel Wylde, rode out on horseback from one til. three o'clock in the direction of Dover, and inspected the new lighthouse erecting on the South Foreland. Several of the household suite visited the Thunderer, all communication with the land and the castle having been prohibited since the case of small-pox occurred until Monday, the sailor being now well, and no other cases occurring. There was no addition to the royal dinner circle.

Captain Bullock, of the Government steam-packet Fearless, has nearly completed his survey of Walmer Castle, and the adjacent neighbourhood, which he has for some time been engaged upon, for the purpose of presenting to the Prince a correct drawing of this favoured spot.

On Wednesday [illegible] her Majesty nor the royal babes left the castle during the day. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, having expressed a desire to visit the refuge beacon, the Prince determined, upon the first favourable opportunity, to proceed to the Goodwin, with Captain Bullock, in the Fearless; and on Wednesday morning, there being but a very slight breeze, and with scarcely a ripple upon the water, [illegible] past noon, for the beach, where the four-oared gig of the Fearless was in waiting to receive him. The coast, steered by Captain Bullock, immediately put off from the beach, and his Royal Highness never having been on board an English brig of-war, he was first rowed by his desire to the Wasp, 16-gun brig, then at anchor a short distance from the Thunderer. The Prince was received on board the Wasp by Captain Drew and the whole of the officers; and, after inspecting the vessel with evident interest, left to proceed on board that steamer to the Goodwin Sands. He expressed his surprise at the confined nature of the officers' berths, and the small space for the accommodation of the crew, when compared with the extent of room on board the Thunderer. The steamer then made for Trinity Bay, where the beacon is fixed, passing upwards of 100 sail of outward bound vessels proceeding through the Downs. The scene at this time was extremely animated, and highly enjoyed by the Prince, who observed to Captain Bullock that it far exceeded, in point of variety and grandeur, anything which could be witnessed off the coast of Sussex. In the immediate locality of her Majesty's marine residence at Brighton;" to which," said the Royal Highness, "it cannot be compared for one moment." Upon arriving at the beacon the water was found to be too high to land on the sands. The Fearless remained off the refuge for nearly half an hour, during which time its uses, and the mode adopted to save the lives of shipwrecked mariners, were fully explained by Captain Bullock, the Prince evidently [illegible] very considerable interest during the description of its various details. The shaft or mast (40 feet in height and 12 inches in diameter) is sunk into the sand, through a strong frame of oak, in the form of a cross, firmly secured by four iron bars and bolts, and is now with several tons of ballast, chalk, &c. On the shaft is fitted an octagon gallery, capable of holding 30 or 40 persons, and never less than 16 feet above high-water mark. Beneath this gallery there is temporary safety for 20 persons more. Directions how to proceed, to those persons who may fortunately succeed in reaching the safety beacon, are given in eight different languages; and bread and water, with a small supply of spirits, are always left upon the beacon, properly protected from the weather. The Prince landed on the beach, close to the castle, between two and three o'clock. Several of the royal suite visited the Thunderer during the day.

In our column devoted to literature will be found some further particulars of the beacon, with two illustrative engravings.



THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

"King John" and "King Arthur" have made a compact to be doubly attractive at this house. The revived comedy does not seem to be over-successful, and it may be supposed that we shall have no further novelty before the Pantomime.

COVENT GARDEN.

Some malign star surely presides over the destinies of this theatre. No sooner do we trust to each new lessee's promises than we find them fleeting as those of his predecessors: the season, every year, under a change of management, opens with a brilliancy and spirit which indicate a successful career throughout to its close, but alas! ere it reaches its midway course, some unforeseen, some irremediable calamity interrupts its progress, and consigns all to gloom and disappointment. It is strange that so many experienced and practical persons, who have been from year to year, we may say, the lessees of this house, should not thoroughly sift out the cause of their inevitable failure, which lies behind the curtain and not with the public; or, is managerial autocracy so invested with charms that, like a seat in parliament, it is worth the cost of peace, health, and fortune? Mr. Charles Kemble, at the commencement of the season, revived the fainting hopes of some who were growing weary of "trusting to ties that every hour were breaking!" His name, experience, and familiarity with the classical drama, were a guarantee, which was gladly received, and implicitly relied on, for the production of genuine entertainment. In addition to this he brought forward another star to add its lustre to the brilliant constellation of his family. Miss Kemble had an extraordinary success; crowds nightly flocked to hear her; receipts not known for years filled the treasury; a new, and by no means inferior, attraction appeared in the person of Mrs. Alfred Shaw, one of the purest singers of any day in our memory, the theatre was as full as it possibly could be on the nights of their performance: on the off-nights "The Tempest," most admirably got up, was highly-attractive, and yet, in the zenith of apparent profit and fame, the lessee suddenly withdraws, or is withdrawn, and the whole concern is abandoned to the performers on a sharing or republican system. Now surely a simple inquiry (before the season commenced) into what should be the average receipts necessary to defray expenses, rent, salaries, &c., would lead a business-like man to proportion his outlay to his income; but the reverse has been the case, and will continue to be so as long as managers will obstinately dictate to a public's taste instead of catering judiciously for it. It may be said that they can be brought to like anything by frequent repetition of it, as George Colman, sen., effected with Mr. Keefe's farce of "The Agreeable Surprise," which was damned on its first representation. At the conclusion of the performance the manager put forth his head from behind the curtain, and addressed the audience as follows:—"What! you don't like it, don't you? Then you shall have it every night until you do!" Thus it is: the public is not in reality fond of spectacle out of place; they like it at Christmas and Easter, or oftener, in a good melodramatic afterpiece; and, if they have become connoisseurs in it, it is not that they love or respect it, to the injury of legitimate writing; but that, like the wine-bibber reduced to water-drinking, they must make comparisons and distinctions between inferior things (when they can get nothing else), from the force of habit, and thus, unconsciously, an interest is awakened for that which is comparatively worthless in itself. It is true, some of our immortal bard's most noble productions have been lately represented with an attention to scenic effect which was productive of the greatest fame to the scene-painter and machinist; but Shakspere's text ought to be illustrated in a very different manner: his "refined gold" wants no "gilding" at the hands of dealers in Dutch metal and spangles; it requires an actor of genius and corresponding feeling with the poet, to interpret and personate his characters in his many pictures of life—but where are we to find him now-a days?—where? We will leave echo to answer the question.

The best and wisest thing, therefore, for a manager of one of the great theatres to adopt is, a resolution to set his face against all translations, and encourage native dramatic genius. By so doing, he will exhibit pictures representing the manners with which we are most conversant; the stage will again be tne "mirror of nature;" and we shall see man as a cosmopolite of the world, in his true and various colours, instead of the improbable and monstrous caricatures in which he is supposed to be faithfully depicted by the transcendentalists of the best, though current, dramatic coin of our Gallic neighbours.

Auber's splendid "Masaniello" has been cut down, and produced as a something hybrid, between the opera of that name and the ballet. It was received, nevertheless, sans. con., and, no doubt, will have a run.

The return of Mrs. Adelaide Kemble has, in some degree, restored the theatre to its [illegible] within the last few days, it has been sadly "frequted." She seems to be in a delicate state of health, but sings with additional sweetness and spirit, as if she would do her utmost for the cause she has already so liberally supported. Her benefit is announced for Tuesday next, December 6th, on which occasion we heartily wish her all the support tant should be met by so distinguished and [illegible]erous an artiste.

THE ADELPHI.

A new trifle, called "You Know What," the imported introduction of Mr. Beazley, has been produced at this house, and proved highly successful. It cannot boast of much originality even in its original shape; but, reader, "you know what" queer things meet the public's approbation now-a-days.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

TO RA

BY J. A. WADE, ESQ.

Rosie! tis gone a twelvemonth by Since first I saw thy gentle face;—
I well remember the deep sigh
That made me turn to thee and trace
The sweetest, saddest mind portray'd
In thy dark eyes, my gentle maid!

Rosie! I lov'd thee from that hour,
Though vain and hopeless it may be—
But 'tis not in my reason's pow'r
To change that love one thought from thee!
E'en could I change it, —what might prove
A recompense for such a love?

'Tis my hope's nurture—my soul's life,—
Life worthless, but that thine imparts
A music to it through the strife
Of jarring tongues and hollow hearts,
That lullabies it far from this,
Into a world of dreamy bliss!

Rosie! they'd wake me from my dream—
They say 'tis vain to think of thee!—
Perhaps 'tis so—but still the stream
Of my heart's dearest love shall be
Onward for ever seeking thine,
Lit with the hope of "one day mine!"

Oh! Rosie! if that day were now—
Nay—turn not from me—give one sign
To tell my aching bosom how,
Or if 'twould glad thee to be mine!
Nothing but tears! - stay—stay—yet go,
'Tis [illegible]

Oh! Memory [illegible] murmurs
Within Joy's broken shell:
Why have I not, in losing all I lov'd,
Lost [illegible]

MUSIC.—ORIGINAL PAPERS.

WILLIAM SHIELD.

"A cunning man of melody most choice."—ANON.

Music and various are the elements whose union or confirmation is necessary to produce a bard-musician. By this term it is meant to separate the automaton, or mere performer of other men's inventions, from him who can dive into "the hidden soul of harmony," and from out its depth draw forth some treasure of his own discovery. Musicians, in the true sense of the word, may be divided into two distinct and self-existing classes, and they, in general, are found in their respective and mutual independence. The first, per excellence, may be termed melodists, the second harmonists: the former bring the organs of poetry to the aid of their tune (as parenologists have it), and abound with romantic sympathies and ideal associations: the latter have little more than the organ of constructiveness, which, however well developed, can no more enable them to invent a melody than to build a bird's nest. It is not here attempted to extol the melodists at the expense of the harmonists; on the contrary, where an union of these two sects takes place in one individual, the consequence is, that he is the perfect desideratum which cannot be supplied by either unavidually; but again, he is the greatest man who maintains the superiority of his poetry above pedantry, and makes harmony more the handmaid of music's queen melody, than her gouvernante or dictator. To invent a beautiful melody, it is necessary for a man to have "music in his soul," and all the operose difficulties that constructive musicians have had the art to pass off as easy efforts of their pen, prove little more than this—that they possess the "ars celandi artem." Be it understood that the assertion is merely made in contradistinction to the higher claims of the melodist, or those who, not despising harmony altogether, rather cultivate her as a guide—as a musical mentor, that may occasionally check the exuberance of a roving fancy, or an over-heated imagination.

He whose name heads this paper was one of those happy unions of melody and harmony. His airs or tunes were not formed upon any hackneyed mode, or infallible-recipe instruction how to effect his design. His compositions more nearly approximate national music, of the best kind, than any other (so voluminous) writer of the modern days, and in that lies the secret of their witchery. There is another "something" in his music, which need not be mentioned for his benefit, but which must be stated for the vindication of our own opinion, namely—it possesses the power of awakening associations that long had slumbered.

> "When through life unblest we rove,
> Losing all that made life dear,
> Should some notes we used to love
> In days of boyhood, meet our ear,
> Oh how welcome breathes the strain,
> Wakening thoughts that long have slept,
> Kindring former smiles again
> In faded eyes that long have wept."

To enumerate the thousand and one touching melodies which this great and most amiable man composed, would exceed our present limits. Almost every one, with a thorough taste for pure song, is conversant with his ballads. His canzonets (and, amongst them, "When Evening spreads her modest grey") are equal, if not superior, to any others, Continental or otherwise. "The Streamlet," "The Thorn," the music of "Rosina," of the "Castle of Andalusia," "Robin Hood," "Hartford Bridge," of but it is vain to enumerate all the various and beautiful emanations of this true melodist's mind. It is enough to state that, while they are thoroughly English, they will not suffer by a comparison with the more fashionable productions of the day.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT-CHAT.

NEW THEATRES.—Not content with about double the number of theatres in our metropolis, the Parisians have petitioned for "encore un autre," a "third Lyrical" but the "powers that be" have refused to grant a licence.

MADAME RONZI DE BEGNIS.—This celebrated vocalist is now in Paris, and in the full possession of her powers. Her re-appearance is anxiously looked for by all those who have formerly been delighted by her captivating style. It is rumoured she will shortly appear in an opera new to the Parisian public.

ROSSINI.—A new theatre has just been opened at Leghorn, which is to be principally devoted to the performance of the gran maestro's productions. It bears his name, which in itself is almost an assurance of success.

BEETHOVEN.—A new edition of the whole of this mighty musicians works has recently appeared in Vienna: it consists of fifty-six volumes, containing 4,500 pages. Is there no spirit of similar rivalry or speculation amongst our English music publishers?

CORELLI.—A new tenore has made his début at the Italian Opera, Paris, under this familiar and venerable name. He was received most warmly on his first appearance in "L'Elisir d'Amore." his voice and style being peculiarly adapted to that charming opera. more especially in the beautiful aria, "Una furtiva lagrima," which he sang with exquisite taste and feeling. His second appearance in "La Cenerentola" confirmed him as a decided favourite with the public, critics and all.

LABLACHE.—This clever singer, great actor, and most worthy man is now, we rejoice to hear, quite recovered from his late severe indisposition—an indisposition which, while it threatened his life, could not overcome his eagerness (during a partial restoration of health) to befriend and set an example to his professional brethren of zeal and liberality. We trust are long to hail him with more welcome than ever.

LISZT AND RUBINI.—This par nobile continue to reap "golden opinions" wherever they wend their musical way over the Continent. They have lately been most successful at Frankfort.

CURIOUS AUTOMATA.—Two extraordinary pieces of mechanism have just been produced by a M. Pradel, a celebrated watchmaker of Carcassone. They represent a boy and girl, about ten years of age; the former plays on the flageolet, either alone or in concerted music, with surprising accuracy; moreover, requires but a few minutes' consideration of any new composition which may be presented to him, and then performs it with all the skill of a master. The young lady is of a literary turn, in the respecting line, and pens down with fidelity whatever may be dictated to her. Some speeches of our Lords and Commons would not, we are of opinion, come off so gracefully as they appear in the columns of our daily contemporaries—mademoiselle having no talent at amendment or correction of her own or those figures have excited much astonishment by their wonderful performances. We hope to see them shortly in London.

M. ADOLPHE ADAM.—This justly-esteemed composer has recently produced a new mass at the church of St. Roch, Paris, which adds a new lustre to him as a contrapuntist fit to grapple with the severest style of his art. It was not expected, generally, that the author of light, lyrical, dramatic operas and ballets, by which he is commonly known, could turn at once from the gay to the grave with such glorious versatility, and produce a work of such noble magnitude and beauty as this mass is universally allowed to be. The subject we have always considered to be a highly poetical one, affording the composer of imagination some of the highest themes for the display of his powers, at once subduing the grandest sublimity and the most gentle beauty and tenderness. A vast concourse of musicians thronged the church on All Saints' Day, all concurring that the new composition of M. Adam justly authorised him to take his place in the first rank of composers in that noblest of all styles, cathedral music. M. Adam presided at the organ on the occasion.

THE MAGAZINES.

"Blackwood" contains some good papers this month. One amongst them gave us the satisfaction of finding that the judgment we formed of the "American Notes" of Mr. Dickens has been echoed by the best and ablest critics whose pens have been attracted to the subject. To the number already arrayed against that flippant book, "Blackwood" adds another authority; and we see also by the American papers just come to hand that, as we foretold, the Yankees themselves have received with much excitement, and very ill grace, the portraiture given of them and their country by the first of living bookmaker. He has put forth has a famous paper upon the Lays of Ancient Rome, in which he enters, [illegible] a literary giant, as he is, into the analysis and criticism of Mr. Macaulay's recent work. The translations of Schiller are continued; and amongst the remaining papers we have a very Walter-Savage-Landorish conversation between Southey and Porson, into which imagination certainly enters very largely. Had we space, some amusing extracts might be made.

"Fraser" treats us to a long dissquisition upon the recent movements in the Church, in which the various points of difference between the Tractarians and Anti-Tractarians are discussed, but with such caution that the reader can with difficulty discover which side the writer inclines to. The Life of Sir Murray Maxwell progresses in its eventful course; the present chapters giving us some stirring scenes of service off Corfu, together with his employment in the "Blackwood" adds another authority; and we see also by the American papers just come to hand that, as we foretold, the Yankees themselves have received with much excitement, and very ill grace, the portraiture given of them and their country by the first of living bookmaker. Reminiscences of Men and Things afford some portraits of Armaud Carrel, Henri Heinè, Arago, and Victor Hugo; whilst Nimrod gives us a few of his publishing adventures, which, by the way, are far less amusing to the public than his sporting.

The "Church of England Magazine" has some solid papers this month, with views and a description of Ripon Cathedral. The "Belle Assemblée" is still weak in its literary pretensions. The "Old Monthly" is rather easy still. It sank so low some while since, that it will require two and much good writing to place it in its old and once enviable position.—The "Farmer's Magazine" holds its own tolerably well in these new tariff times. The farmers must go a-head, as brother Jonathan has it, in the path of scientific improvement, to make up for the fall in prices which has resulted from opening trade for foreign produce, and which depression must still farther occur, should the manufacturing interest prove powerful enough to lessen the existing restrictions upon the importation of corn. Looking, however, at the portrait of the Durham Bull in this magazine, it strikes us that many a year will glide away before Denmark, Germany, or Spain, will find such stock as that for exportation.

EVERY BODY'S COLUMN.

GOETHE.

We learn from Weimar that the Emperor of Austria, the King of Prussia, and the King of Bavaria, who had conceived the idea of purchasing the house of Goethe, with the scientific collections that he left, with the intention of converting it into a national museum, having expressed a desire that the nation at large should take part in this project, the Germanic Diet has decided that it shall be carried into execution at its expense. A committee has been appointed to treat with the heirs of Goethe for the purchase.

SYMBOLICAL EPITAPH.

In a recent number of the Cambridge Chronicle is the following typographical curiosity:—"Death of a Printer. George Woodcock, the * of his profession, the type of honesty, the [illegible] of; and, although the  of death has put a to his existence, every § of his life was without a [illegible]."

The Bangor (America) Whig says:—"A Yankee in Boston has set up a one-horse thrashing-machine, for the convenience of parents and guardians having unruly boys. He'll lick an urchin, like thunder, for fourpence. Small dickings done for two cents only, and the most entire satisfaction warranted."

A SNAKE STORY.—A black snake, which had discovered the nest of a woodpecker, climbed up the tree, and, putting his head into the hole, swallowed the woodpecker. Alas! when he would have withdrawn, he found his throat so much distended by his supper, that he could not get back, and so he died with his length exposed, dangling from the woodpecker's hole, an admonition to all who passed by not to get into a scrape into which they had contrived how to get out of it.

The Moniteur Parisien relates the following trait of courage in a boy of 15, in a village of the Ardennes, the name of which it does not give. A mad bull entered one of the streets of the village, and was on the point of goring the boy, when the latter boldly laid hold of his horns, and jumped upon his back. The bull, with augmented fury, rushed into the river Meuse, which was near, and crossed it, without being able to get rid of his rider. The boy at length, sensible that he must in the end be destroyed if he did not adopt some extreme course, took out a knife and plunged the blade into the back of the bull near the head. The animal fell dead, and the boy returned to the village triumphant. Such is the story of the Moniteur Parisien—believe it who will.

The three great things that govern mankind are reason, passion, and superstition. The first governs a few; the two last share the bulk of mankind, and possess them in turns; but superstition is most powerful, and produces the greatest mischiefs. Goethe

ECLIPSES IN 1845

In the course of next year there will be three eclipses, viz., two of the sun, and one of the moon, of which only the [illegible] will be visible in England. The [illegible] phenomena will be an [illegible] of the sun, on Tuesday, [illegible], commencing at twenty minutes past seven in the evening, and being visible chiefly in the Great Pacific Ocean and in South America. The second is a partial eclipse of the moon, in the night of Wednesday, 6th December, which will be visible in these parts, commencing at eighteen minutes past eleven, and when two digits of the lower disc of the moon will be obscured. The third and last is a total eclipse of the sun, early in the morning of Thursday, the 21st December, and invisible here, but visible in the Chinese empire, Hindostan, the islands of Ceylon, Sumatra, Borneo, &c.

There are at present 3 dukes, 7 marquises, 31 earls, 1 viscount, 35 barons, and 3 legal barons (not judges), in all 82, who owe their origin to the profession of the law.

Among the 178,000,000 individuals who inhabit Europe, there are said to be 17,500,000 beggars, or persons who subsist at the expense of the community, without contributing to its resources. In Denmark the proportion is 5 per cent., in England 10 per cent., in Holland 14 per cent.

ORIENTAL INQUIRIES.

M. C. Ochoa, a young Oriental scholar, has been despatched by the French Government on a mission to Central Asia, to explore the region between Kashmir and Kafiristan, on the north-west of Hindostan. His declared object is to collect historical and geographical information, and to examine and compare the language and literature of the different tribes inhabiting that almost unknown tract of country.

IT TAKES TWO TO MAKE A SLANDER.

"My dear friend, that woman has been talking about you so again! She has been telling me awful stories you ever heard: why, she raited away at you for a whole hour!"—"And you heard it all, did you?"—"Yes."—"Well, after all, just bear in mind that it takes two to make a slander: one to tell it, and one to listen to it."

COMPASSION OF A JUDGE IN TEXAS

A very learned and compassionate judge in Texas, on passing sentence on one John Jones, who had been convicted of murder, concluded his remarks as follows:—"The fact is, Jones, that the court did not intend to order you to be executed before next spring, but the weather is very cold—our gaol, unfortunately, is in very bad condition: much of the glass in the windows is broken—their fingers are in such a dilapidated state that no fire can be made to render your apartments comfortable; besides, owing to the great number of prisoners, not more than one blanket can be allowed to each; to sleep soundly and comfortably, therefore, will be out of the question. In consideration of these circumstances, and wishing to lessen your sufferings as much as possible, the court, in the exercise of its humanity and compassion, do hereby order you to be executed to-morrow morning, as soon after breakfast as may be convenient to the sheriff and agreeable to you."

USE OF A BLOODHOUND

A few days ago a sheep was stolen from a field belonging to J. B. Richards, Esq., of Stonea, in the parish of Wimblington. A bloodhound, which is kept by the parishioners, was brought into the field. It immediately made its way to the spot where the sheep was slaughtered, and where the entrails lay; and from thence the hound proceeded along a drove for nearly half a mile, at the end of which he turned into a small piece of land belonging to Hopper, a blacksmith, and went to a mustard straw stack in the middle of the piece, where was found the carcase of a sheep, wrapped in a cloth, and put into a miller's sack. The dog then left the ground, crossed the road, and went to a cottage upon the Stonea land, in the occupation of R. Casting, Esq., where a man named Houchen lived. The house was searched by the gentlemen who followed the dog, and the bones of a sheep's head were found. Houchen's shoes were taken off, which corresponded exactly with the marks in the field. He was taken before the magistrates at Chatteris, but, as the skin could not be found, sufficient evidence could not be produced against him, and he was discharged.

FLEET PRISON.

The various records, books, &c., have been removed from this well-known place to the Queen's Prison (late the Queen's Bench), in conformity with the recent act. The Fleet, according to numerous authorities, has been a prison for state offenders ever since the time of William the Conqueror, anterior to the system of imprisonment for debt in this country, and formerly a prison for those committed for offences against the state; but since the time of King Charles I. (when the Court of Star Chamber was abolished) it became exclusively a prison for debtors under process from the Courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer and persons charged with contempts of the Court of Chancery. It was burnt down during the great fire of London in 1666, and again partially destroyed during the riots of 1780. It was a noted place for clandestine marriages previous to the year 1754, when the Marriage Act took place. The various registers were collected in the year 1831, and by order of Lord Sidmouth, the then secretary of state, deposited in the registry-office of the Bishop of London. The office of warden of the Fleet has been held from time to time, with that of keeper of the old and new palaces at Westminster, commonly called Westminster Hall.

THE VICAR OF BRAY.

The well-known story of the Vicar of Bray, a village in the county of Berks, is to be found in Fuller's Worthies [illegible] served under Henry the Eighth, Edward the Sixth, Mary, and Elizabeth; and was first a Papist, then a Protestant, then a Papist, and finally a Protestant again. "He lies here," says the historian, "some martyrs said, two miles off, at Windsor, and found the fire too hot for his tender temper. This vicar being taxed by some one for being a turncoat and an inconstant changeling, not so, said he, for I always kept my principle, which is this—to live and die Vicar of Bray."

AN APOSTATE'S NUPTIALS.

Prince Galitzin, an apostate to the Roman Catholic religion, through the reign of the Empress Anne in Russia, was punished for his conversion with unsolicited severity. This unfortunate nobleman was forced to marry a woman of low extraction, and his espousals were celebrated with every circumstance of burlesque pomp that ingenuity could invent. The bride and bridegroom were carried in a car of ice, drawn, on the back of an elephant, followed by a procession of rustics, two by two, habited in the costumes of the various nations from opening trade for foreign produce, and which depression must still farther occur, should the manufacturing interest prove powerful enough to lessen the existing restrictions upon the importation of corn. Looking, however, at the portrait of the Durham Bull in this magazine, it strikes us that many a year will glide away before Denmark, Germany, or Spain, will find such stock as that for exportation.

A CANARY-BIRD SINGING IN THE STREET.

A canary-bird belonging to George M'Lachlan, Borland-park, near Auchterarder, was taken by his son to the house of a farm where the young man was servant to a farmer in the neighbourhood. One Sunday, last summer, a person, whose features we do not envy, got access to it, and actually put out the eyes of the little songster. In this dark state it was restored to its owner, who, by careful attention, taught it to find its way to the seed-box and the water-glass. In time it became reconciled to its fate, and now it makes the cottage ring with its melodious notes. As it cannot distinguish night from day it continues to pour sweet carolings till all the inmates of the house are fast asleep, when it partakes a little of the general repose, but renews its song with the first breaking of the universal silence.

LITERATURE.

THE SEAPIE. London: Simpkin and Co.

This volume, like its naval namesake, is an olla podrida, a mixture of many things, but all possessing a nautical flavour. An omnium gatherum, it boasts prose and verse—the comic and the serious—yarns afloat and stories ashore—mingled to please all palates, and dished up with plates by Crowquill. In all such works the contents vary greatly in relative merit; but, taken as a whole, "The Seapie" forms an amusing volume; and when to its other claims is added the fact of the profits being appropriated to the "Shipwrecked Fishermen and Mariners' Benevolent Society," its claims to a place in the parlour library or the cabin bookcase will not be disputed. From the more serious portion of its columns we extract some information, with two views of which Prince Albert visited on Wednesday last, in company with Captain Frederick Bullock, by whom it was erected in 1840.

The great loss of life annually occuring on our eastern coast is universally known, and the Goodwin Sands, in particular, being situate at the very portal through which passes the most active commerce in the world, are the scene of the most frequent and fatal shipwrecks. There is no other spot, perhaps, on the face of the earth so well known for its dangers, or so much dreaded by seamen. Nor are its terrors diminished by popular opinion; on the contrary, it is commonly believed that the Goodwin Sands swallow up and engulf, irrecoverably, whatever is thrown upon them. But, however desirable it may have been thought to contrive such a refuge, the first experiments made towards it have always seemed to prove its impracticability; and if the refuge beacon now standing be remarkable for its simplicity—a mast, with a gallery capable of holding 30 persons, standing in the midst of the waves, with a frightful surf often foaming around it—it is only one of many proofs afforded by the history of inventions that the simplest means are often the last arrived at.

The refuge beacon erected on the Goodwin Sands, and which has now sustained, without injury, the violence of two most tempestuous winters, is the result of many attempts, of long, anxious, persevering exertions, and of favourable opportunities, afforded to Capt. Bullock by the Lords of the Admiralty. It is, in fact, a contrivance matured by experiment; its stability, therefore, is due, not to chance, but to the care bestowed on it. And, since the most competent judges pronounce it well calculated to attain the object in view, it is a matter of no small triumph to have established it firmly in so dangerous a situation. In carrying on the survey of the Thames it was found expedient, as the work proceeded seawards, and the receding landmarks grew indistinct, to erect fixed marks on the different sands. The first of them was nothing more than an iron bar driven into the sand, with a flag-staff affixed to it. This stood but a tide or two, and was succeeded by various modifications of the same simple plan, stays being added to support the staff; but in vain—the marks erected in this manner all yielded to the first gale of wind. It then appeared that some foundation was wanted to enable them to resist the force of the waves. To remedy this defect, the bar was fixed in a broad cross of wood, from the extremities of which chains were attached to the staff, and, after many trials, success was attained by this means. The results of the experiments above related, joined to the knowledge of the lamentable loss of life annually taking place on the Goodwin Sands, induced the persuasion that, since it was found practicable to fix a beacon on them, it was an imperative duty to erect one calculated for the preservation of life. It ought to be observed that the Goodwin Sands are, to a great extent, dry at low water, and, as vessels which strike on them seldom go to pieces in a single tide, the probability is that some of the wrecked crew would be enabled to reach the sand during that interval, and the safety beacon would then become their only refuge. It is well authenticated that numbers have reached the sands in safety, who were afterwards swept away by the returning tide before assistance could be rendered them. It is obvious that the essential principle of this beacon is, that it rests upon a base not easily broken or displaced, and that the mast, with its gallery, the only superstructure, offers little or no resistance either to the wind or waves, so that its strength lies in its simplicity. If it be objected that there is nothing in this mode of construction which holds out a promise of perpetuity, the answer is, that it can be replaced at a trifling expense; and, still further, that it has withstood the storms of two winters, one of them the severest on record for a long period. So long as it stands it holds out a chance to the distressed, and, if it falls, it can be easily renewed; at all events, it has successfully passed through severe trials, and exhibits, at least, a highly interesting experiment.

The detailed particulars of the Prince's visit will be found in their proper place in our columns.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XXI.

DOCTOR BOWRING, M.P.

We have here one of the reform philosophers of the age; a gentleman who has given his life to languages and liberalism; a traveller; a commercialist; a Benthamite; and a member of parliament of considerable public usefulness and no small repute. Doctor Bowring is one of the free-doctrine group of legislators of the Grote and Thompson school; a pet of the Whigs during their administration; and considerably respected by the Tories in a personal sense, although they do not set much store by his principles either of politics or trade.

John Bowring was born at Larkbear, near Exeter, on the 17th of October, 1792. His ancestors had been for many generations connected with the woollen manufacture, which, for centuries, was the "staple" trade of the west of England, but which the progress of machinery is gradually transferring to districts where coal is cheaper and more abundant. He received the ordinary education of the middle classes of society, and was taught the elements of the classics and mathematics at a country school near Dartmoor, whose wild and romantic scenery made on his young mind a stronger impression than the lessons of the dissenting teacher. Doctor Bowring had an intense desire to acquire languages, and, unknown even to any of his acquaintances, he mastered Spanish, Italian, and Portuguese, and made much progress in German and Dutch before he was sixteen years old. He thought that the best mode of learning another tongue was to watch that easy mental process by which an infant acquires its own, by proceeding from the simplest signs and sounds to the more complex and entangled; from the noun to the verb; from the root to its various ramifications and auxiliaries. In this way he acquired an easy command of most of the modern continental languages, having published translations which may be grouped under the following heads:—The Sclavonic, Russian, Servian, Polish, Bohemian, Bulgarian, Slovakian, and Illyrian; Scandinavian, Icelandic, Swedish, and Danish; Teutonic, Anglo-Saxon, High Dutch, Low Dutch, Frisian, and Allemannish; Esthonian, Lettish, and Finnish; Chingarian, Biscayan, French, Provencal, and Gascon; Italian, with its various dialects; Spanish, Portuguese, Catalonian, Valencian, and Gallician.

A great portion of Dr. Bowring's life, since the age of twenty, has been passed in foreign countries, where he has been engaged in several official missions. In 1828 he visited the Low Countries, in order to examine into the manner in which their public accounts are kept; and in 1830 he was nominated, with Sir Henry Parnell, to a similar mission in France. The reports he made on the accountancy of both countries have been laid before Parliament. In 1831 he was nominated, with Mr. Villiers, our then ambassador at Madrid, as a commercial commissioner, to examine, with two French commissioners, into the tariffs of France and Great Britain, with a view to the extension of the trading relations between the two countries. Though the modifications introduced were far less important than the real interest of both countries required, still they have led to an enormous increase in the trade with France. In 1834 Dr. Bowring was charged with a mission to Belgium; and in 1835 with one to Switzerland, his report on which led to some "sharp sparring" in the House of Commons, Mr. Goulburn objecting to the expenses of his journey being paid out of the public purse. The report, however, has been translated into several languages, and contains remarkable evidence of the powers and benefits of the free-trade principle, in enabling a country so disadvantageously situated as Switzerland to overcome every difficulty, and to bring her manufactures into the remotest markets in competition even with our own. Dr. Bowring visited northern and central Italy in 1836, for the purpose of extending our commerce with those parts.

PORTRAIT OF DR. BOWRING.

Our traveller was, in 1822, arrested at Calais, by a telegraph order from the French Government, and kept during several months in solitary confinement. The cause of his detention was never fully known; but he was probably suspected of being one of the links in the chain of European Liberalism, which caused so much disquiet to the despotic sovereigns of Europe. When he was claimed by the British Government, who insisted either on his release from imprisonment, or on his being subjected to some specific accusation, the charge laid against him was, that he had been a party to the attempt to bribe the keeper of the French gaol in which Rones and the young sergeant of the Rochelle were confined, an attempt which failed; for, though the sum agreed upon was paid to the mercenary gaoler, he kept the money, denounced the plot to the police, and the unfortunate victims were guillotined the following day. The real cause of Dr. Bowring's arrest was probably an idea of obtaining possession of important despatches, whereof he was the bearer, to the Governments of the Spanish peninsula, and which gave notice to those Governments of the intended invasion of Spain by the armies of that monarch, who had only a few days before assured the British ambassador, "on the word of a king," that the project of invasion never entered into his royal mind! Mr. Canning's urgency led to Dr. Bowring's release; but, although no indictment had been lodged against him, he was banished from France for ever. Tyranny, however, is short-sighted. It happened that the banished reformer did return to France; it was in 1830, when he was the bearer of the congratulations of the British people on the overthrow of that Bourbon despotism under whose vexations he had been a sufferer. A public dinner was given to Dr. Bowring at the Hotel de Ville, by Odilon Barrot, the Prefect of the Seine, and the proceedings, with the speeches made on the occasion, were reported at length in the Moniteur. At that time Louis Philippe made it his boast that in principle he was a republican, and said it was his highest pride to owe his throne to the "sovereignty of the people." Some curious conversation between the citizen King and Dr. Bowring found its way to the press at that period; and it was said, we believe with truth, that, at the first interview with Louis Philippe, the gilt chair in which he was sitting broke down, and he was saved from falling by the Prefect of the Seine and Dr. Bowring.

Dr. Bowring's literary labours have been unceasing, and he has devoted himself to commercial treaties with the most untiring perseverance. He was also one of the establishers of "The Westminster Review." He has sat in Parliament almost without intermission since the year 1835, and, although by no means a brilliant debater, has made a number of brief, pithy, effective speeches. He sat also on a great number of practical committees.

Dr. Bowring has received many marks of distinction from European sovereigns, amongst them a diamond ring from the Emperor of Russia, for his translations; a gold medal, with a laudatory inscription, from the King of Holland, in honour of his publications on Dutch literature; and he was made a knight of the order of Christ by the Queen of Portugal. He has been, and continues to be, on terms of intimacy and correspondence with the leading literary and political characters of modern times.

Her Majesty has been graciously pleased to pardon Sarah Stroud, aged 19, who was sentenced to death at the September Session of the Central Criminal Court, for infanticide and murder, and she has been discharged from custody.

THE MODEL PRISON, PENTONVILLE.—The commissioners attended this prison on Monday, for the purpose of fixing upon the dietary for the prisoners. The Earl of Chichester, Lord John Russell, Major Jebb, Mr. Russell, and Mr. Crawford attended.

Deciding Course—Bugle beat Leech, and won the stakes.

THE HON. GRANTLEY BERKELEY'S DEER MATCH AT CHARBOROUGH PARK.

This event, which for several months has excited an extraordinary degree of interest in the sporting circles of the metropolis and the west of England, from the novelty of its character, was decided on Tuesday last in the demesne of S. E. Drax, Esq., one of the members for Wareham. It is situated between five and six miles west of Wimborne, a town some three posts beyond Southampton, little known to geographers till her Majesty Queen Adelaide took up her residence at Canford Hall.

As you enter, a swelling champaign, dotted with small plantations, spreads on either hand, while in front the park sweeps upwards towards the mansion. The hill on which the house stands is clothed with a wood, round which a race-course is laid out, where stakes of a local description are annually run for. On the present occasion this course was appropriated to the visitors assembled to witness the match, who were required (the reverse of the ordinary practice) on no pretence whatever to venture without the ropes. At ten o'clock, when the gates were closed against all comers, within these ropes were equipages of mark to the amount of many hundreds, and people in thousands—in short a great company on foot and in chariots. The tedium of expectation was relieved about this time by the appearance of a large herd of deer driven across the valley that now lay between the spectators and the western boundary of the demesne to be ready for the hunting. Precisely at half-past ten, the hour appointed for the business of the day to commence, there approached from the mansion a very imposing cavalcade, consisting of Mr. Drax and Mr. Hussey—umpires for the match—the Hon. Grantley Berkeley, Mr. Drax's huntsmen and whips, and two grooms with spare horses for the party about to assay the wager of woodcraft. The umpires were clad in ordinary equestrian attire—Mr. Berkeley wore a suit of green, a velvet cap of the same colour, with a rich gold band, and, slung at his back, the implements of his craft. The servants of the hunt their frocks of jonquil-coloured velvet, with purple collars, and the grooms' liveries of crimson, which, added to the prevalence of grey horses, gave the cortège as gallant an appearance as may with propriety be exhibited in these degenerate days.

Having passed in front of the "lines," and offered courtesy to such of their friends as they chanced to recognise, bending to their saddle-bows like knights of old, the principals straightway addressed themselves to the encounter.

Whether for love or money, it was a gallant livelihood, and one which few men could have undertaken with more chances of success than Mr. Grantley Berkeley. The conditions of the match were, that in the doors or the day Mr. Berkeley should, with the aid of one dog only, pull down, "hobble" (that is secure by fastening the four legs together), five bucks, and to leave them in possession of the servants, by whom they were to be put into a deer cart, provided for the purpose. When so carted, they were to be examined by the umpires, and each one found uninjured—that is to say without any serious wound or hurt—was to count for the captor. Mr. Berkeley's apparatus for "hobbling" was very complete; the horse he had trained to ride up to the courses would be down at the word, so as to leave him free to deal with his quarry; and his dog, a noble deerhound, had already pulled down his three bucks in one day. The name of the steed is Brock, that of the hound Odin—and, with perhaps the unnecessary explanation that the buck is the adult male of the fallow, as the stag is of the red, deer, we will follow the cavaliers afield.

The mounted party already described, led by Mr. Drax, ride up to a large herd (Charborough Park contains a great herd of venison—more than one hundred red and eight hundred fallow deer), and use every device to separate a buck from the lot. In vain they harass them from end to end of the demesne—the best result being to get a brace of bucks clear, evidently the Damon and Pythias of the herd. These, running wide of each other, Odin is slipped at a white one—and lo! a course is up. The Berkeley rises in his stirrups—his voice rings through the clear air—he cheers on his hound in tones that make the gazers' hearts leap. But scarce have they run a bow-shot's length when the buck stands at bay. Ah! what is it I see? By Diana's self, Odin retreats, and the antler-bearer is the victor! Again the deer is made to try his hocks—again he is at bay. Mark! some new device occupies the hunter. The black buck, who still had watched and waited on the sylvan surface, is now selected as the victim. Odin is cheered on to him—he flies, and almost reaches the hues where the excited spectators look breathless on. Good deer—brave deer! the hound is at thy haunch—he leaps to thy throat—ah! the forester turns, and his antlers crash against his foe. Odin is dashed down the hill; he slinks to his master for succour; and no cheer avails to launch him again on the forest champion. The dark deer hath won the day.

At the third feature Mr. Hussey rode up to the company, announcing that Mr. Berkeley had abandoned the match, a statement the gentleman himself presently confirmed, by saying, "It was a bad business." Whatever the cause, a more complete failure there could not have been. Mr. Berkeley did all that was possible in the case, but his dog seemed beaten in the first attempt to close with his quarry. I saw him as he was led away, and his keeper told me he was a good deal cowed; he certainly had some hard knocks. Upon this untoward finish, Mr. Drax sent for his own deerhounds, and there was some good coursing before the party broke up.

ROYAL THAMES YACHT CLUB.—Last week the anniversary festival of the members of this society was celebrated at the British Hotel, Cockspur-street, when about eighty gentlemen, including Lord Alfred Paget, and several other gentlemen of distinction, patrons of aquatic sports, sat down to an elegant entertainment, consisting of every delicacy of the season. The apartment was profusely decorated with plate, comprising a number of magnificent prizes which had been won in sailing matches by the Mystery, the famous iron yacht belonging to Lord A. Paget, and other celebrated yachts belonging to members of this the leading club on the river. W. Harrison, Esq., the much-respected commodore, presided; T. Meeson, Esq., the captain of the club, officiating as vice-chairman. After the usual loyal and patriotic toasts, a very elegant service of plate, of the value of sixty guineas and upwards, subscribed for by members of the club, was presented to Mr. Wheeler, the treasurer. It was mentioned that a communication had been received from the Lords of the Admiralty, giving permission to the members of the club to display the blue ensign of her Majesty's fleet, without the white cross, provided a crown of a certain size (1-16th) be retained in the centre, and dispensing with the late distinguishing marks of the club.

KITCHEN DEPARTMENT OF THE REFORM CLUB HOUSE.

It has been at the request of many of our correspondents that we have incurred the cost of engraving the above view of the interior of a sort of temple wherein there is much worship of the culinary art upon a scale of magnificence and rapidity only commensurate with the progress of steam itself. This is a kitchen! How would the eyes of housewives have kindled with unbelief if we had made such an assertion half a century back! A kitchen! Why, a kitchen was a square room of moderate dimensions, with a range, a dresser, a plate-rack, an oven, and a due allowance of pots and pans, and there the ménage ended before the cooking began! But now Luxury has spread her wings, and Ude and Kitchener have opened new stores of epicurean philosophy, the belly has become a god in modern Babylon, and Invention must do her best for man's interior, by producing such an interior as we here display. The fact is, however, that the arcanum here placed before our readers is a curiosity both culinary and scientific; and we should hardly be found registering its stoves (we believe the best stoves are registered) in our columns, if there had not been a perfect furor in the worlds of haut ton and bas ton to know what this mysterious cookery-hall is like. The Reform Club itself is known well enough. It is a fine, large, looming sort of a building, rather massive than classical, and rising above the other club-houses of Pall-Mall with greater aristocracy of exterior than its name implies. But once enter it, and every thing is splendid—the saloons, the staircases, the meubles, and last, not least, the cuisinerie, the identical kitchen which is here elaborated before the reader's gaze. Now, into that kitchen—some from curiosity, some to explore the mysteries of science, and some to catch fragrant odours upon appetite—have gone peers, princes, and nobles beyond compute. There is hardly a person of distinction who has not sought to visit that mansion of the good things of the life terrestrial, and departed from it with a due impression of the sublimity of the art that is practised within its walls. It may be said in fact to have become one of the private exhibitions of London, and very remarkable it is. To drop badinage, we believe that such is the completeness of the establishment, so distinct its arrangements, and so comprehensive its means of action, that a dinner for six hundred persons can be cooked within it, in something like the time required to roast an ordinary joint of meat, and this, too, by charcoal fires and furnaces so subdued by science that the visitor witnessing the operation in progress would be no more inconvenienced by the heat than if he were standing at his own fire-side.

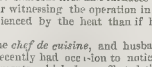
M. Soyer, the chef de cuisine, and husband of the lady whose paintings we recently had occasion to notice, has the chief credit of the improvements which have effected these surprising results, and has been gratified by their transfer in several instances to the corresponding departments of the royal palaces. The guests of honour and literary and scientific men, many of whom have visited the establishment have made his name fame in the world beyond the kitchen, among all who agree that to cook nobly, rapidly, and extensively is to conquer the belly-gerent samples of humanity, and reduce the stomach of society to a tone of digestion and repose.



LAW INTELLIGENCE.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

The Judicial Committee of her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council held a meeting on Monday in the Council Chamber. The lords present were the Bishop of London, Lord Campbell, the Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, and Dr. Lushington, Judge of the Admiralty Court.—An appeal from the Arches Court of Canterbury, "The Rev. Henry Erskine Head, Clerk, Rector of the Rectory and Parish Church of Feinton, Devon, v. Ralph Sanders, of the city of Exeter, gentleman, promoting the office of the Judge," came on for hearing.—The Queen's Advocate was heard for the appellant. The appellant had been cited in the Arches Court for writing and publishing a certain letter in an Exeter newspaper, on the 31st of August, 1841, the said letter being headed, "A View of the Duplicity of the Present System of Episcopal Ministration, in a Letter addressed to the Parishioners of Feinton, Devon; occasioned by the Bishop of Exeter's Recent Circular on Confirmation; by Henry Erskine Head, Rector of Feinton, Devon."—Mr. Cockburn, Queen's Counsel, followed on the same side.—Dr. Addams was heard for the respondent.—Their lordships, at the conclusion of the case, deferred giving judgment.

An appeal from the Vice-Admiralty Court at Sierra Leone, "Logan v. the Queen," relative to the brig or vessel Galana, was opened by Dr. Addams. Mr. Burge, Queen's Counsel, was heard for the respondent.—The case was adjourned.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH. MONDAY, NOV. 28.
(Sittings in Banco.)
VEITCH v. RUSSELL.

This was an action by the plaintiff, who holds the rank of a physician, and who sought to recover from the defendant the amount of a bill for attendance on the defendant's brother. He had in like cabs to perform his professional duties, and he had not been paid by fees as the attendance went on. He was also called for him that, in fact, his attendance had not been in the character of a physician, but had been performed under an express contract between him and the defendant. To prove this, letters were put in, the first of which was in these terms:—"As your account must be a formidable one, I must beg you will let me have it up to the time of my brother's account;" and another was in these terms:—"My wish is to present you with such a sum as you will be enabled to call on me to pay. I don't know what expense you may have incurred, or what you would consider compensation for your great professional skill." At the trial of the cause Mr. Justice Wightman left it to the jury to say whether there had been any contract between these parties, and, if they considered that there had been such contract, they were to settle the amount of what they considered to be due. The jury negatived the existence of a contract, and returned a verdict for the defendant.—A rule had since been obtained to set aside the verdict and to have a new trial.—Mr. Thesiger, Mr. Warner, and Mr. Borrit appeared to show cause against the rule; the Attorney-General, Mr. Peacock, and Mr. Lutwych supported it.—The court expressed a clear opinion that, as a rule, barristers and physicians could not maintain an action for fees. What they received was only an honorary payment for professional services. But there might, under particular circumstances, be a contract which would give them a legal right to payment. That contract, however, must be distinct and express. The letters here did not amount to such contract. The case had been properly left to the jury, and the verdict was one which ought not to be disturbed.—Rule discharged.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

The first session of this court for the present mayoralty commenced on Monday before the Lord Mayor, the Recorder, and the usual City authorities. The Recorder, in his opening observations to the jury, said that, in all probability, the cases of 300 prisoners would be brought before them before the close of their labours; but as none of the charges appeared to involve any difficulty, either as regarded the law or the fact, he should not detain them by any lengthened remarks.

Edward John Stevenson, 26, coachmaker, was charged with conspiring and confederating with another person, not in custody, by means of divers frauds and devices, to obtain goods and property from different tradesmen, and to defraud them of the same. The prisoner was tried at the last session of this court for forgery, arising out of the same transactions that were the subject of the present prosecution. Upon that occasion the prisoner was charged with uttering a bill of exchange for £69, purporting to be accepted by a Captain Cutting, of Ipswich, to one of the tradesmen from whom he had obtained goods, and which was dishonoured when it arrived at maturity. Upon the trial a person was produced, however, who swore that he was the Captain Cutting referred to, and that he had accepted the bill for the prisoner and a person named Wilhams, who was now alleged to be his co-fiendant, and the defendant was in consequence acquitted. Mr. Mathison, an outfitter, carrying on business in the Minories, proved that, in the month of May last, he sold goods to Williams, who was accompanied by the prisoner, and, after a good deal of pressing, a bill of exchange for £69, accepted by Captain Cutting, of Ipswich, was given for the balance; but, when the bill became due, no such person could be found, and the goods were never paid for, and he found that the shop in the Minories occupied by the prisoner and Williams had been shut up, and that the premises had decamped, leaving nothing behind but "dummies" (bales filled with sawdust and shavings).—Some other evidence of the same description having been adduced, Mr. Clarkson addressed the jury for the defendant. The Recorder then summed up, and a verdict of Guilty was returned. The Recorder said there was some reason to suppose that the prisoner had, to a certain extent, been made the tool of other parties, and therefore the sentence would not be so severe as it would have been under other circumstances. Where, however, such offences as these were proved, it was absolutely necessary that adequate punishment should follow; and the sentence was, therefore, that he be imprisoned in the Penitentiary for nine calendar months.

(Before Mr. Commissioner Bullock.)

John Kennard, aged 17, on being placed in the dock, pleaded Guilty to an indictment charging him with stealing three bank-notes, of the value of £20, and other moneys, to the value of £62, the property of James Painter Davis. He was sentenced to ten months' imprisonment in the House of Correction, with hard labour.

William Lock, aged 29, a barman, and William Webber, aged 30, a leather-cutter, were indicted, the former on a charge of robbing his master, Mr. James Gurney, and the latter with having received the money, knowing it to have been stolen. From the statement of the prosecutor, Mr. James Gurney, landlord of the Wadsworth Arms public-house, in the Commercial-road-east, and other witnesses, who fully established the case against the prisoners, it appeared that they had for some time been carrying on a system of fraud by which Mr. Gurney believed he had been robbed to the extent of seven or eight pounds a week. Webber was in the habit of coming or sending an accomplice to the house, and, upon tendering a four-pence or sixpence in payment for what had been drunk, received different sums in silver moneys placed between the copper pieces in change. On the 25th September a trap was laid for their detection by employing a policeman to mark certain moneys for early proceedings. An accomplice, not in custody, accordingly came and paid for some beer with a fourpenny piece, and received three and sixpence in silver with the copper given in change. Webber was taken in the act of receiving the money from the accomplice, who said, "That is all Bill can give you to-night;" and, on seeing a police constable, instantly made his escape.—The jury found both the prisoners Guilty, and it was then proved that Webber had for some years been carrying on the system with young barmen, first inducing them to commit an act of dishonesty, and then compelling them to go on robbing their masters for his benefit, under the dread of exposure. These facts were proved by several young men who had been his victims, and their testimony discovered it. the prisoner Webber a character of the lowest state of depravity.—Lock was sentenced to three months' imprisonment without hard labour, and Webber to seven years' transportation.

Rosetta Daushters was indicted for having feloniously married William Heywood, her husband being alive. The prisoner was defended by Mr. Payne. Evidence having been given of both marriages, the jury returned a verdict of Guilty.—The Recorder said, that, under the circumstances which had been proved in mitigation, her sentence should be as light as possible. Her husband appeared to have treated her very badly for the few weeks he stayed with her after their marriage, and he had then deserted her, and never since looked after her. However, it was necessary that such a violation of the laws of God and man as she had been guilty of should be visited with a punishment calculated to deter others from its commission. The learned Recorder then sentenced her to six months' imprisonment, without hard labour.

WEDNESDAY.

(Before Mr. Justice Coltman.)

Ellen Millgate, aged 20, a servant, was indicted for the murder of her illegitimate child. The evidence was not sufficiently conclusive to justify the jury in convicting her of the murder, and they accordingly found her Guilty of concealing the birth. The judge sentenced her to two years' imprisonment.

William Taylor, 34, a post-office letter-carrier, was charged with having, while engaged in that capacity, feloniously stolen a letter, containing a half-sovereign, the property of her Majesty's Postmaster-General.—The prisoner retracted his former plea of Not Guilty, and pleaded Guilty to the charge.

A number of respectable witnesses were examined on behalf of the prisoner, and they all gave him an excellent character for honesty. It also appeared that he had been in great distress, owing to a fit of illness.—The court sentenced the prisoner to be kept to hard labour for two years.

Charles Williams, alias George Thompson, 30, was indicted for [illegible] having been before convicted of uttering counterfeit coin, and was in consequence committed the offence of uttering counterfeit money. Mr. Ribs and Mr. Bodkin conducted the prosecution. The case was of the ordinary description; and it appeared that in the month of January, 1840, the prisoner was tried at this court, and convicted of the offence of passing counterfeit [illegible] and he was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment and [illegible]. It was proved that the prisoner had since passed a counterfeit shilling [illegible] jury found the prisoner Guilty, and he was ordered to be transported for ten years.

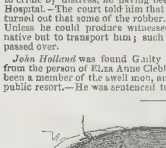
(Before Mr Baron Parke.)

On Thursday Peter Barrett, 3[illegible] a paviour, was indicted for feloniously and maliciously wounding his wife, Bridget Barrett, on the 23th October, with intent, &c. The prosecutrix stated that on the night in question the prisoner came home in a state of intoxication. She was in bed at the time. He desired her to get up; she refused; and he then pulled her out of bed, and threw her upon the floor. She got up and struck him with a chair, upon which he kicked her and injured her very seriously. The prisoner's general conduct to her was kind. She hoped the court would deal as leniently with him as possible. Any severe punishment would deprive her and her child of the means of support. The house-surgeon of Middlesex Hospital stated, that he examined the prosecutrix on her being brought to the Hospital, and found the injuries rather severe. They were such as might have been produced by a kick. Several witnesses deposed to the violence of the prisoner's conduct; but none of them proved that he intentionally kicked her upon the part [illegible] part of the person on the above occasion.—The jury found the prisoner guilty of a common assault; and Mr. Baron Parke sentenced him to twelve months' imprisonment.

NEW COURT.

Joseph Bird, aged 30, was arraigned on four indictments, each charging him with stealing chaises and trucks, the property of several persons. The prisoner pleaded Guilty, and excused himself by stating that he was urged to crime by duress having been a long time ill-treated in the London Hospital.—The court told him that poverty was no excuse for crime, and it turned out that some of the robberies took place on the heels of each other. Unless he could produce witnesses to character, the court had no alternative but to transport him; such wholesale plunder could not be slightly passed over.

John Holland was found Guilty of stealing a purse, and £5 in money, from the person of Eliza Anne Clebhon.—The police stated that Holland had been a member of the swell mob, and in the habit of frequenting places of public resort.—He was sentenced to be transported for ten years.

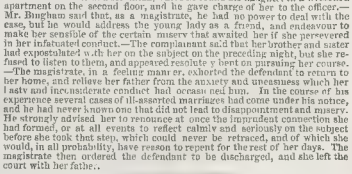


BOW-STREET.—THE CASE OF DR. BAILEY.—On Thursday Dr. Bailey, the minister of Queen-square Chapel, was again placed at the bar, before Mr. Hall charged with having forged an I O U to defraud the executors of the late Mr. Smith, known to the public as the miser of St. Giles's. Mr. Flower, the solicitor, appeared for the prosecution; and Mr. Chadwick Jones, the barrister, with Mr. Long, a solicitor, appeared for the prisoner. Mr. Flower said he should have to ask that the prisoner be again remanded, with a view to the production of evidence which it was still thought desirable to produce. Mr. Hall said he had no objection to that course and again remanded the prisoner for a week.

MANSION-HOUSE.—A ruffian, named Henry Savage, was charged with having assaulted, in the most violent manner, Mr. Anthony Henricks, an old gentleman, who resides in Devonshire-square, on Monday fortnight.—Mr. Henricks stated that at about half-past seven o'clock in the evening, as he was passing along from Threadneedle-street to Bishopsgate-street, the prisoner placed himself before him, and asked, or appeared to ask, for some assistance. Witness walked on, not noticing the application, but soon found the prisoner at the other side of him, and asked him what he wanted, to which the prisoner muttered something unintelligible in reply. Witness not liking the look of the man crossed over to the other side of the street, for the purpose of avoiding him, and walked towards Leadenhall-street. He had not gone far, however, when he received a dreadful blow and shove from behind, which prostrated him, and he had when he was down a person fell upon him. He was lifted up by some passers-by, and had been since that time under the care of several other witnesses corroborated this testimony.—The Lord Mayor said he had not the least doubt that the intention of the prisoner was to rob Mr. Henricks, although the assault was committed in so public a place and in the middle of the day. So desperate a case must go before a jury, as it was wholly out of the power of a magistrate to award the degree of punishment of which such a fellow as the prisoner was deserving. The prisoner, who was a sturdy beggar about 25 years of age, was then committed for trial at the next quarter session.

QUEEN-SQUARE.—CHARGE OF MURDER.—William Dewy, a pensioner from the Coldstream Guards, a powerful fellow, about fifty years of age, was placed at the bar, charged with the murder of Ellen Stuart, alias Derrick, a woman of abandoned habits. The facts of the case are briefly these. On Friday, about one in the day, the prisoner and a woman were seen helping the deceased, who was in a state of intoxication, through York-street, Westminster. On their arrival facing the shop of Mr. Palmer, a greengrocer, the deceased stepped down, and prisoner then kicked her violently as she laid on the ground. He was remonstrated with for his brutality, when he lifted the poor creature up twice, and on each occasion dashed her down with great violence on the curbstone. The blood flowed from her head on each occasion, and deceased was taken up by prisoner and carried home senseless. She remained in that state without any medical man being called in until Sunday morning, when she expired. On a post mortem examination of the head it was found that there was a quantity of extravasated blood on the brain, proceeding from a rupture of one of the vessels, which would be caused by violent handling. Evidence to this effect was given before the coroner's jury, on Monday evening, by which they returned a verdict of manslaughter, but, on a repetition of the statements by the witnesses at this court on the present occasion, Mr. Bond fully committed the prisoner for trial on the charge of wilful murder.

WORSHIP-STREET.—On Wednesday Miss Harriet Sergrove, aged about 22, was placed at the bar before Mr. Bingham, upon a charge preferred against her by her father, the Rev. T. Sergrove, rector of one of the City parishes, and resident at Dalston.—The complainant, who is a widower, stated that the prisoner was his housekeeper, and on Sunday last was left in care of the house when the rest of the family went to church, the female servant having been discharged a few days previously. Upon his return home he found the house deserted, and he was obliged to get in at the rear, and he then discovered that his daughter had absconded, and carried off the whole of her apparel and other property. No trace of her was found until Tuesday, when the complainant, who had instituted the most anxious inquiries throughout the neighbourhood, learned that his gardener, a young fellow, 19 years of age, named William Godfrey, had been seen leaving the place with her, and carrying two large bundles, and at length the complainant traced his daughter to a coffee-house in Shoreditch, where a lodging had been engaged for her by the gardener and the discarded servant above mentioned. In the course of Tuesday her married sister and the husband of the latter went there, and had an interview with her, but she resisted all their entreaties to return home, and declared that she would remain where she was. The gardener had come to his work as usual on Monday morning, and, although well aware of the anxiety occasioned by the disappearance of his young mistress, did not, either on that day or the following, say a word about his knowledge of the matter, and when he came on Wednesday morning, and was accused by the complainant with the abduction of his daughter, he consented to lead him to the place of her concealment, but on the road he gave complainant the slip and made his escape. Witness then procured the assistance of sergeant Dubois, of the N division, with whom he repaired to the coffee-house in Shoreditch, where he found his daughter in a wretched apartment on the second floor, and he gave charge of her to the officer.—Mr. Bingham said that, as the magistrate, he had no power to deal with the case, but he would address the young lady as a friend, and endeavour to make her sensible of the certain misery that awaited her if she persevered in her present course.—The complainant said that her brother and sister had expostulated with her on the subject on the preceding night, but she refused to listen to them, and appeared resolute y bent on pursuing her course.—The magistrate, in a feeling manner, exhorted the defendant to return to her home, and relieve her father from the anxiety and uneasiness which her nasty and inexcusable conduct had occasioned him. In the course of his experience several cases of ill-assorted marriages had come under his notice, and he had never known one that did not lead to disappointment and misery. He strongly advised her to renounce at once the imprudent connection she had formed, or at all events to reflect calmly and seriously on the subject before she took that step, which could never be retraced, and of which she would, in all probability, have reason to repent for the rest of her days. The magistrate then ordered the defendant to be discharged, and she left the court with her father.



SUDDEN DEATH AT THE BIRMINGHAM RAILWAY STATION.—On Tuesday an inquest was taken by Mr. Wakley, at the Elephant and Castle, Camden-town, on the body of Henry Kipping, aged forty. Mr. Golding said he and the deceased were partners, in the employ of Mr. Morgan, of the George Inn-yard, Snowhill. On Thursday se'nnight deceased accompanied him, with a van of goods, to the Camden station of the London and Birmingham Railway, to be sent into the country by a luggage-train. Whilst unloading the goods at the station the deceased was suddenly missed, and, being absent for some time, a boy, named George Gardner, was sent to look after him; and in a minute or two after the boy returned, and said he thought deceased was lying near one of the sheds dead. Witness, with George Easter, police-constable of the railway, then ran to the spot, and found deceased lying on some turpaulin in an insensible state. Mr. Brown, of Stanhope place, surgeon, was sent for, and promptly attended. He attempted to bleed deceased, but without effect, and ordered him to be conveyed to the St. Pancras workhouse, life being extinct. The deceased appeared in good health, but complained, whilst going to the Camden station, of pains in his arms. The coroner gave it as his opinion, from the appearance of the body, that the deceased had died of apoplexy, and the jury returned a verdict accordingly.

FATAL ACCIDENT IN THE ST. KATHARINE DOCKS.—On Tuesday Mr. Baker held an inquest at the London Hospital, on the body of William Winterbottom, aged 52, a labourer in the St. Katharine Docks. It appeared in evidence that deceased was employed in the bottling department of the docks. On the preceding Friday he went into the several wine vaults for the purpose of extinguishing the lights therein, and shutting down the different trap doors. He had closed them all, except one, and was stooping to complete his task, when he overbalanced himself and fell through the loophole into the cellar beneath, a distance of 18 feet. Soon afterwards he was found lying insensible at the bottom of the cellar, from which he was promptly removed to that hospital. Mr. B Broadhurst, house surgeon, said that deceased died early on Saturday morning, the cause of death being a very extensive fracture of the skull. Verdict, "Accidental death."

SUICIDE FROM PECUNIARY DISTRESS.—On Tuesday Mr. Wakley held an inquest at the Middlesex Hospital on the body of an aged glass-stainer, named Joseph Miller. A gentleman's servant said, that as he was passing the end of Newman-mews, Oxford-street, he saw deceased in the act of cutting his throat with a razor. The witness instantly pinioned the arms of the deceased and forced him to throw away the razor. He asked deceased why he had attempted so destroy himself, when the latter said, "How can you ask me? I did it from distress." As he was bleeding profusely from a wound in the throat he was promptly conveyed to the above hospital, in which he died from mental depression and loss of blood. Mr. Tournerelli, a sculptor, of the Cornwall-road, Southwark, said that he had known deceased for the last fifty years, and had taken tea with him on Monday last, at his house in Walcot-place. He then appeared of weak mind, and had been so for the last eight or nine months. A post mortem examination of the head of deceased showed a large effusion of serum on the surface and in the ventricles of the brain. Verdict, "Temporary insanity."

LOVE AND SUICIDE. On Wednesday evening Mr. Baker held an inquest at the City of Paris, Bonner's-fields, Hackney, on the body of a fine young woman, about 20 years of age, name unknown, which was found in Sir George Duckett's Canal, Hackney, on Tuesday morning. From the appearance of the body, it had apparently been in the water for some hours. On searching her pockets, there was found a piece of paper, on which were written the following lines:

"I think you love me; tell me true,
Can I, my love, depend on you?
What words are wanting to discover
The torments of a hopeless lover."

She was dressed in a light cotton chintz gown, marked with stripes; light merino shawl, with red flowers; velvet tippet, black apron, stockings, and shoes. She had a pair of old-fashioned gold earrings in her ears, and was rather short in stature. In the absence of evidence to show how or when the deceased came into the water, the jury returned a verdict of "Found drowned."

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

LADY PLACE, HURLEY.

LADY PLACE, HURLEY.

'Tis sweet, as the dawn flashes over the lawn,
The old manor-house to see;
To hear the roused rooks, in their leafy nooks,
And the hum of the sportive bee:
'Tis merry to mark, in the smooth-shaven park,
The hunters dashing out,
Their wild steeds neighing, the eager hounds baying,
With the whistle, the call, and the shout.

'Tis sweet, when the sun, his race being run,
Kisses the mansion so old
Warms the mossed wall, lights up the oak hall,
And bathes the trees in gold:
When the deer are at rest, and the rook seeks his nest,
And no sound in the calm air swells,
Save the peasant's low song, as he winds along,
Or the distant village bells.

MICHAEL.

Hurley is situated near Maidenhead, in Berkshire, among some of the most fascinating scenery which adorns the picturesque banks of the Thames; and is connected with several historical reminiscences of an interesting character. According to the old records of Domesday Book, it once belonged to Edgar, but, after the Conquest, was given by William the Conqueror to Geoffrey de Mandeville, as a reward for gallant conduct at the battle of Hastings: in the year 1086 the fortunate warrior, after the approved fashion of those times, founded there a monastery of the Benedictine order, and annexed it as a cell to Westminster Abbey, where the original charter was deposited. Although the rules of monastic life are exceedingly stringent, and the austerities which they enjoin are of a most self-denying nature, it has generally been observed, that these religious solitaries usually selected, as the scenes of their seclusion, some of the most lovely spots in creation. Mr. Ireland, in his "Picturesque Views of the River Thames," has remarked, that "the fascinating scenery of this neighbourhood has peculiarly attracted the notice of the clergy of former periods; who, in spite of the clamy and unwholesome vapours which have proved to be the surest road to heaven, have been careful to select some flowery paths for their own private journeyings thither; among which ranks Hurley, or Lady Place, formerly a monastery." We confess we like not the wit of this passage; the discipline of a monastery in those days was no "primrose path of dalliance," and the peaceful solitude which nature seemed to have marked as a fitting place for the abode of calm content and prayer would assuredly be a spot happily chosen for heavenly contemplation; or, in their retirement from the oppressions and contentions of the world, these recluses might wish to refresh their spirits with devout meditations on the majestic works of the Eternal; and thus realise the philosophy so poetically expressed by the gifted though wayward "Childe"—

> "To sit on rocks, to muse o'er flood and fell,
> To slowly trace the forest's shady scene,
> Where things that own not man's dominion dwell,
> And mortal foot hath ne'er or rarely been:
> To climb the trackless mountain all unseen,
> With the wild flock that never needs a fold:
> Alone o'er steeps and foaming falls to lean,
> This is not solitude: 'tis but to hold
> Converse with Nature's charms, and view her stores unrolled."

On the dissolution of the monasteries, Hurley became the property of a family named Chamberlain, of whom, during the reign of Queen Elizabeth, it was purchased by Richard Lovelace, a soldier of fortune, who accompanied the famous navigator, Sir Francis Drake, in an expedition against the Spaniards; and, with the wealth acquired by that enterprise, erected the present mansion on the ruins of the ancient building. The remains of the monastery may be traced in the numerous apartments at the west end of the house: portions of the refectory may also be seen in the stables, the windows of which are of chalk, and, though nearly eight centuries old, have all the freshness of modern workmanship: and in a vault beneath the hall some bodies have been found buried, "with their monkish garbs around them." The hall is very spacious, occupying nearly half the extent of the mansion; and the saloon is profusely decorated with some landscapes of singular beauty, reputed to be the paintings of the celebrated Salvator Rosa. During the reign of James the Second, frequent meetings of the nobility were held in a subterranean vault beneath Hurley House, for the purpose of devising plans to resist the encroaching despotism of the rash and tyrannical sovereign; and here was matured that well-directed project, which terminated in the vindication of British liberty, by the expulsion of James from the throne, and the arrival of William the Third "for the deliverance of our church and nation." It is asserted that the papers which produced the revolution were signed by this "band of brothers" in a dark recess at the end of the vault; and an inscription recording the transaction was afterwards placed there. No wonder that a spot thus sacred to the cause of civil and religious liberty should be regarded with such interest, as to have been visited by the monarch to whose hands these circumstances transferred the sceptre of England; and that curiosity has also attracted thither many eminent personages, George the Third and his Queen having been among the number.

As there are many to whom incidents of a singular and more domestic nature are as interesting as the more important or romantic details of history, we must not close our notice without observing, that, when the peerage of the Lovelace family became extinct, the estate was sold, and that part which consisted of the mansion and the woodlands was disposed of to Mrs. Williams, sister to Dr. Wilcox, Bishop of Rochester. This lady was enabled to make the purchase by a remarkable instance of good fortune; she had bought two tickets in one lottery, both of which were drawn prizes—the one of £500, the other of £20,000. From the daughter of Mrs. Williams the property descended to Mr. Wilcox, son of the bishop. In his beautiful play of "The Hunchback," Sheridan Knowles makes Sir Thomas Clifford say:—

> "'Twas still my father's precept, 'Better owe
> A yard of land to labour, than to chance
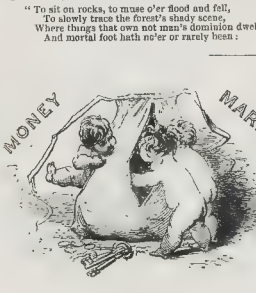
> Be debtor for a rood.'"

But we suppose Mrs. Williams would not be of old Clifford's counsel in that matter.



Since the commencement of the rebuilding of the Royal Exchange the general observation amongst merchants has been that it was originally raising a monument to commemorate the departed commerce of London. Since the receipt of the late favourable news from India and China, however, a widely different feeling has sprung up in the city of London, for the vast importance of the commercial news from the East is already gradually unfolding itself, and, on the arrival of the next mail from India, the progress in commercial and manufacturing improvements here will probably be much more rapid than could have been anticipated even by the most sanguine merchants engaged in that department of British trade. Opium has this week risen in value little less than forty per cent., it being perfectly well understood that it would be as easy for the British Government to prevent the consumption of gin amongst the ladies now resident in the neighbourhood of the Seven-dials as for the Chinese authorities to prohibit the use of opium amongst their countrymen. Teas, on the contrary, have been nearly unsaleable since our last publication, even at a reduction of nearly 3*d.* per lb.; nor is any activity expected to arise in this article till its owners make up their minds generally to a further reduction in its value, and to place their property on a level with the altered circumstances in our commercial relations with the Chinese empire. For cotton and sheep's wool the demand has very materially increased since our last publication, occasioned by the general renewal of activity in the manufacturing districts. A large quantity of cotton will now have to be required for the consumption of the Chinese empire, and cotton wool is consequently improving in value. Besides, it is generally supposed in the City that the demand for manufactured goods themselves must speedily be much increased, with a view to the various markets in the great southern and eastern seas, and particularly to those of Hindostan, where the stocks of British goods by the last letters were exceedingly small, and quite inadequate to the usual consumption of our East India possessions. Several factories, consequently, which have been shut up during the last two or three years, are again at full work, and are now increasing the value of wages amongst our artisans and manufacturers generally. In addition to these encouraging appearances in our future foreign export trade, there likewise exists a very visible improvement in our home markets, for every description of goods. We are, therefore, certainly well justified in anticipating a brilliant trade arising before many months can pass by, and the restoration of prosperity generally amongst the commercial classes in our society. For some time past the average prices of grain, of all descriptions, have been considerably lower than they were; but here, also, there are, fortunately, symptoms of improvement.

The transactions in the money market during the week have not been important. Notwithstanding the activity in commercial matters, money continues to be more abundant than the wants of the people at present require; and, for loans of it on convertible and solid securities, the capitalist cannot obtain a higher rate of interest than three per cent. per annum. The Consols, consequently, at the present quotation, yield a better income than can be procured for loans of money, and no apprehensions need be entertained of any immediate unfavourable alteration in them. The prospect of the reduction of the Three-and-a-Half per Cents., therefore, remains as probable as ever, and hopes are sanguinely entertained that, in the course of the coming summer, the Minister may save annually one million sterling from this operation.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Notwithstanding the arrivals of English wheat up to our market since the 26th ult. have been but moderate, and the stands have exhibited a very scanty show of samples, the demand for that article has again ruled dull, and the prices have declined from 1*s.* to 2*s.* per quarter, without effecting clearances. Of foreign wheat we have had a fair supply on offer, but the rates have fallen quite 2*s.* per quarter, and no progress has been made in sales. Owing to the large arrival of barley that article has fallen in value from 1*s.* to 2*s.* per quarter. Good second new malt has maintained its previous value; but other qualities have had a downward tendency. Oats have come rather more freely to hand, especially from Ireland, while the inquiry for them, as well as for beans, peas, and flour, has proved dull, at lower rates of currency.

ARRIVALS.—English: wheat, 3010; barley, 1790; oats, 1070; and malt, 1320 quarters; flour, 3540 sacks. Irish: barley, 0; oats, 14460 quarters. Foreign: wheat, 3020 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 46*s.* to 55*s.*; ditto white, 57*s.* to 60*s.* Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 49*s.* to 57*s.*; do. white, 51*s.* to 56*s.*; rye, 34*s.* to 38*s.*; grmd. ng barley, 27*s.* to 29*s.*; malting do., 30*s.* to 32*s.*; Chevalier, 32*s.* to 34*s.*; Suffolk and Norfolk malt, 56*s.* to 62*s.*; brown do., 50*s.* to 54*s.*; Kingston and Ware, 56*s.* to 62*s.*; Chevalier, 63*s.*; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 23*s.* to 24*s.*; potato do., 25*s.* to 26*s.*; Youghal and Cork, black, 17*s.* to 18*s.*; do. white, 19*s.* to 20*s.*; tick beans, new, 34*s.* to 36*s.*; do. old, 34*s.* to 38*s.*; grey peas, 36*s.* to 38*s.*; maple, 33*s.* to 34*s.*; white, 30*s.* to 32*s.*; boilers, 32*s.* to 37*s.*; per quarter. Town-made flour, 46*s.* to 47*s.*; Suffolk, 38*s.* to 40*s.*; Stockton and Yorkshire, 36*s.* to 38*s.*; per 280 lbs. Foreign.—Free wheat, 50*s.* to 62*s.* Indian corn, 30*s.* to 31*s.*; per quarter. Barley, 20*s.*; oats, new, 15*s.* to 17*s.*; do. feed, 14*s.* to 16*s.*; beans, 29*s.* to 30*s.*; peas, 33*s.* to 37*s.*; per quarter. Flour, American, 22*s.* to 24*s.*; Baltic, 22*s.* per barrel.

The Seed Market.—For linseed and rapeseed we have had a fair inquiry but in all other kinds of seeds next to nothing has been passing.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 48*s.* to 57*s.*; Baltic, crushing, 42*s.* to 45*s.*; Mediterranean and Odessa, 45*s.* to 46*s.*; hempseed, 35*s.* to 36*s.*; per quarter; coriander, 10*s.* to 18*s.* per cwt.; brown mustard seed, 10*s.* to 11*s.*; white do., 10*s.* to 10*s.* 6*d.*; tares, 5*s.* 6*d.* to 6*s.* 0*d.* per bushel; English rapeseed, new, 30*l.* to 33*l.* per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, 10*l.* to 10*l.* 10*s.*; do. foreign, 7*l.* to 7*l.* 10*s.* per 1000; rapeseed cakes, 5*l.* 5*s.* to 6*l.* per ton.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 49*s.* 6*d.*; barley, 28*s.* 1*d.*; Oats, 17*s.* 9*d.*; rye, 32*s.* 2*d.*; beans, 31*s.* 4*d.*; peas, 33*s.* 7*d.*

Imperial Averages of Six Weeks which govern Duty.—Wheat, 49*s.* 5*d.*; Barley, 28*s.* 3*d.*; Oats, 17*s.* 10*d.*; Rye, 31*s.* 8*d.*; Beans, 31*s.* 10*d.*; Peas, 33*s.* 9*d.* per quarter.

Duty on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20*s.* 0*d.*; Barley, 9*s.* 0*d.*; Oats, 8*s.* 0*d.*; Rye, 10*s.* 6*d.*; Beans, 10*s.* 6*d.*; Peas, 9*s.* 6*d.*

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread are from 7*d.* to 7½*d.*; of household ditto, 5½*d.* to 6½*d.* for the 4lb loaf.

Tea.—The public sales of tea this week have been largely attended by buyers, and the prices realised have been fully equal to those obtained at the preceding auctions.

Sugar.—The best qualities of sugar have gone off on good terms—say at an advance of 6*d.* to 1*s.* per cwt; but other sorts have been much neglected.

Coffee.—This market is looking up, and, in some cases, a rise of 1*s.* per cwt has been established for West India.

Wool.—The public sales have proceeded with some degree of briskness this week, at full quotations. About 3800 bales have arrived since our last.

Coals.—Adair's, 15*s.* 6*d.*; West Hartley, 15*s.* 6*d.*; Old Tanfield, 15*s.* 6*d.*; Ord's Redheugh, 15*s.* 3*d.*; West Wylam, 15*s.* 3*d.*; Gosforth, 15*s.*; Northumberland, 17*s.*; Lambton, 20*s.* 9*d.*; Stewart's, 21*s.* 3*d.*; Cassop, 20*s.* 0*d.*; Hartlepool, 20*s.* 6*d.* Ships arrived, 72.

Smithfield.—Owing to an increase in the supplies of stock on offer, we have experienced a very heavy inquiry, and prices have been with difficulty supported. Beef, from 3*s.* to 4*s.* 4*d.*; mutton, 3*s.* 2*d.* to 4*s.* 4*d.*; veal, 3*s.* 6*d.* to 4*s.* 8*d.*; and pork, 3*s.* 6*d.* to 4*s.* 6*d.* per 8lbs., to sink the offal.

Newgate and Leadenhall. We have again had very large quantities of slaughtered meat, while the demand has ruled slow, at the following rates. Beef, from 3*s.* to 3*s.* 8*d.*; mutton, 3*s.* 2*d.* to 4*s.* 2*d.*; veal, 3*s.* 8*d.* to 4*s.* 2*d.*; and pork, 3*s.* 4*d.* to 4*s.* 2*d.* per 8lbs., by the carcase. ROBERT HERBERT.

THE LASCAR MENDICANTS.—For several years past humanity has been shocked at the destitute state of thousands of forlorn foreign sailors, who, in the winter season, are hovering about the eastern part of the metropolis. The British and Foreign Sailors' Society, in St. Mary-axe, have undertaken the interests of these unhappy persons. The object of the society will be to provide these wretched outcasts with wholesome food, warm clothing, medical attendance, and moral instruction.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 31] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1842. [SIXPENCE.

OFFICE, 198, STRAND.

THE ROAST BEEF OF OLD ENGLAND.

The annual great cattle exhibition of our metropolis has been the London lion of the week; and as we have made it a chief feature of illustration among our embellishments, we here select it also as a theme whereon to indite a few general observations in reference to the whole subject which it involves.

The exhibition of various breeds of fine animals—of the more flourishing vegetable productions of our British soil—of the ever improving inventions of science for promoting the means of fertilizing and cultivating the land—is in itself something more than an occasion of mere speculative interest; it has within it a characteristic of nationality—is purely English in its features—and would not excite an equal degree of competition, attention, and respect, in any other quarter of the European world.

There is a strong feeling—which, as we have long been proud to acknowledge it, we find proportionably difficult to overcome—that in the flourishing agriculture of happy England, have existed, through uncounted years, the bone and sinew of her strength and energy in war. Upon her fresh and wholesome broad lands, and in the midst of hardy tillage, spring up that fine race of sturdy yeomen who ever and anon pass from the ploughshare to the battle field with such stalwart proof of manly health and vigour as no foreign enemies have been able to match or resist—and those who have had the youthful constitution braced into manhood upon our agricultural hills, have made the best and brawniest crews for those wave-ploughs of our glorious navy whose

> "——— flags have braved a thousand years
> The battle and the breeze."

The best soldiers and sailors of England have been drafted from her hills and fields. We are here speaking in the sense of strong bodily health, nor do we intend our observations to extend beyond their obvious import into a depreciation of our manufacturing powers. We know how much the commercial greatness of Britain is dependent upon the shuttle and the loom—we can open our eyes with conscious power upon the vast and endless resources of our manufacturing world—and gaze upon the countless tenants within its mills and warehouses with a feeling of blended wonder and pride—with a knowledge that this is a land of riches, and full of storehouses that contain the merchandize of dependent empires. —But if, on the other hand, we consider the population, and not the power, of these wealth-teeming regions, then, indeed, the peasantry lord it in health and stature over the pale and squalid manufacturing poor. We see in the latter, sometimes, the smoke-burnt features, but never the sun's bronze; the cheek is anon flushed, but never full and round and crimsoned by the evening breezes and the morning dew; the eye is bright and restless, but not fresh glowing and full of the spirit of the land. No! your factory labourer crouches by the side of your field-bred peasant, and your factory child has but a poor and sickly kindred with your little ruddy urchin of the farm-yard the meadow and the plough! Now there is nothing more morally and politically incumbent upon a nation than the duty of keeping alive within its bosom a hardy and invincible race—maintaining the manly strength and beauty of the country, and typifying its national characteristics of freedom, spirit, enterprise, and strength. This principle is admitted on all hands, and men of all parties join cheerfully to work it out. Your lords of the soil, of all shades of opinion, meet and shake hands upon the point. The limited opinionist and the free-trader agree to it alike—those who would make England furnish her own bread at any price to her population, and those who would fill her lap with the super-abundance of the rest of the world;—all admit the necessity of improving, or rather maintaining, our breed of men, and, as a consequence, the nurture of cattle, and the growth and cultivation of vegetable food.

> "A crop of warriors springing from the soil,"

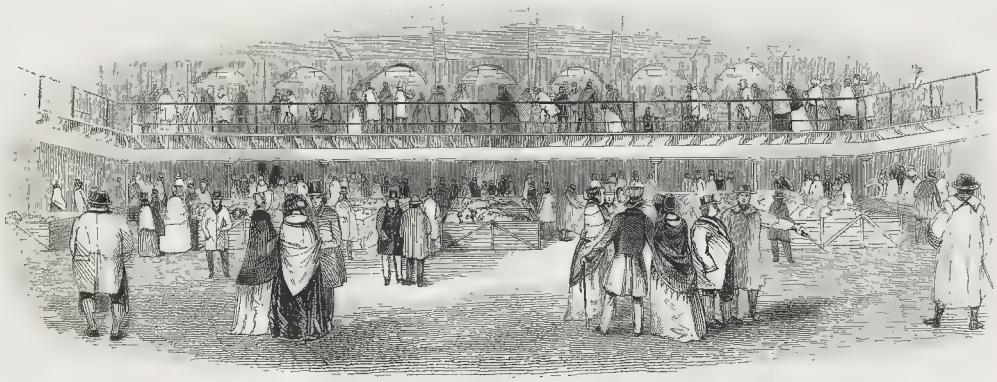
Now, the exhibition which has seduced us into these prefatory observations forms, as it were, a sort of annual nucleus of the agricultural exertions of the country, and rendezvous of the noblemen, and gentlemen farmers and yeomen, who focus within the show-yard the congregated examples of their success, and present to the public the most interesting evidences of their superiority over other countries in the article and quality of human food. And whether this last conviction reach the people at the hands of Earl Spencer or the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Warwick or the Duke of Richmond, of Lord Radnor or the Duke of Rutland, it is enough that it is founded upon indubitable proof, and that shortly after "the grand annual exhibition" of the Smithfield Club in the spacious "Baker-street Bazaar," the butchers' shops begin to divide, and daguerrotype upon a smaller scale, the animal prosperity of the cattle show, and to attest that it was no false nomenclature which dubbed old England the "Land of Roast Beef." It is only to be regretted in these winter times that the plentifulness of animal food is not in proportion to its excellence and superiority, and that there are so many of the British people who are comparatively starving amid this fat abundance of their sheep, their oxen, and their pigs. On the other hand, the admission of foreign cattle, although calculated to relieve, on a small scale, the condition of those who cannot afford to pay the price of English meat, displays a most triumphant contrast and encouragement to the promoters of our native breed. What foreign farm could ever exhibit such stock as we have here? What ox from foreign fields will ever match that "Class 1." of the Earl of Warwick, or those fine Leicester, and Worcester, and Lincolnshire prizes? When will such sheep ever bring wool to us from foreign pens, or pigs grunt through such rotundity from a foreign sty? And when will such fine, round, jovial, burly graziers and farmers carry such cattle to a foreign metropolis?

> "Who feeds fat cattle should himself be fat."

And here is the proposition exemplified to the life. In few words we have rarely seen more magnificent evidences than this exhibition has furnished to us of the care, pains, and attention, which our English country gentlemen are bestowing upon the rearing of their stock, and the circumstance should be a pleasing source of congratulation. By improving the breed of cattle we improve the food, improve the population, and give an impetus to agricultural prosperity the most desirable, the most fertile in good results, the most English and national. We keep up the pride of soil, of all that springs from it, and lives and breathes upon it, and we encourage in those who pursue it as a duty in their capacity of noble proprietors, of graziers, farmers, and others of their free and healthy class, the pride of feeling that they are adding to the strength and beauty of the land, and fostering among the wide community that wholsome old English belief that there is no place like home, and that there is no home but England which so teems with the treasures of health and vigour among her hardy population, and of sturdiness, activity, and nutrition among the animal denizens of her pastures, and in the exuberant fruition of her fields.



SHEEP AND PIG SHOW OF THE SMITHFIELD CLUB, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1842.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—Our Paris letters of Monday afternoon state that no further telegraphic despatches from Barcelona had reached the French Government up to post hour, owing to the great fogs which prevailed the previous days, but no doubt was entertained of Espartero's presence in Barcelona, and of the capitulation of the insurgents.

The Paris papers of Sunday were altogether destitute of news.

The Moniteur contains royal ordonnances, dated the 29th ult., making various changes in the nomination of prefects of the departments.

The Journal des Debats, in an article on Eastern affairs, attributes the difficulties of the Ottoman empire to the removal of the "wholesome control" of Mehemet Ali over the Porte. The Debats regards the return of the entire independence of the Sultan as a dream. Remarking on the events in Servia and Wallachia, the Debats admits that France has no political interest therein. It approves of the deposition of Prince Ghika; and, although French policy does not generally approve of Russia, still it desires that General Kisseleff may replace the deposed Hospodar, because the general will have the power of doing good in Wallachia, from his former experience in the government of that country.

By the papers of Tuesday it appears that the King of the French and the Royal Family were to take up their winter residence at the Tuileries on Wednesday.

Advices from Algiers to the last inst. had been received in Paris, but bring no news of General Bugeaud's expedition, in which the Duke d'Aumale takes a part.

We learn from Marseilles that the Right Hon. Stewart Mackenzie, Lord High Commissioner of the Ionian Islands, embarked at that port, on the 1st, on board the Phénician French Government steamer, for Malta.

The Suffren had sailed from Brest for Lisbon and Rio Janeiro.

A letter from the frontiers of Russia, Nov. 15, in the National, says: "The emancipation of the Jews, which was announced so pompously in the Russian journals, and those of Germany which are friendly to that power, is nothing more than a notification that all the Jews who wish to engage in agriculture shall receive lands, and will be subject to the same duties, and possess a similar position, to that of the peasants of the Crown. They may all derive advantages from their land in the same manner as private landowners. The truth, therefore, is, that they will pass from a human lasting and degraded condition, but nevertheless a free one, to the state of semi-savages. It is quite impossible that the Jews can accept those conditions of their own free will, although it is known that several of their rabbis have been bought over by the Russian Government, and are entirely devoted to it."

The Brussels journals announce the arrival in that city of M. Plougoulm, who is charged with the defence of M. Caumartin, at his approaching trial, on the charge of having assassinated M. Sirey. M. Caumartin has not surrendered himself, but it is understood that he will do so on the eve of trial. His friends say that he will be able to prove that he was violently attacked by M. Sirey, and that in defending himself the catastrophe which ensued was independent of his own will.

SPAIN.—The following correspondence from Barcelona, the theatre of the recent insurrection, is dated the 30th ult. "The regent arrived at six o'clock last night at the head-quarters of the Captain General of Catalonia, Van Halen. A salute of 21 guns from the fort of Montjuich announced his arrival to the population of this town. He went first to Esplugos, between this town and San Feliu. At noon this day Espartero, accompanied by Seoane, Rodil (the Minister of War and President of the Council) and a numerous staff, visited the fort of Monjuich, which fired a fresh salute of 21 pieces of artillery. The new Junta assembled last night, but decided nothing. It is deliberating on the demand made by Van Halen, who required that the corpos francos should be disarmed before any negotiations were entered into on other points. Several members of the Junta are for surrendering instantly, but there is a strong opposition to this proposition. The British ship of war the Formidable was wrecked last night just behind the fort of Monjuich. The French Government steamer Gassandi has gone to see if it can get the ship off the sand bank. Everything will be saved if she is not got off, which is doubtful. General Zurbano, the savage animal of Espartero, was fired at last night in the environs of Gracia, but the assassin's aim missed its prey."

A supplement of the Madrid Official Gazette of the 28th, contains the decree of the Regent for the blockade of the port of Barcelona, The decree is as follows

"Art. 1. The port of Barcelona, and all the coast compressed between the Besos and the Llobregat, are declared in a state of blockade.

"Art. 2. The vessels contravening this decree shall be liable to the penalties which the maritime laws, universally recognized, render applicable to the infraction.

"Art. 3. Ships have been commissioned to watch the coast, to cut off all communication with the insurgents. The Ministers of Marine, Commerce, and Colonies are charged with the execution of the present decree.

(Signed) "DUKE OF VICTORY.

"Head-quarters at Saragossa, Nov. 26."

(From the Barcelona Constitutional of Nov. 29.)

The following is in substance the reply of the Regent to the representations of the Deputies for Catalonia, to distinguish between the guilty and the innocent in punishing the revolt:—

"I am a Spaniard. I love Spain, and am convinced that the Catalans have a national will, and so have I. I cannot believe them capable of rising against the Spanish cause. I will make a distinction between the population of Catalonia and the instigators and promoters of the late disorders. I know their authors, and I can place my finger on them. I am resolved to punish them with the fullest rigour of the law. I will be inexorable with the sword of justice. Either I or the seditious must cease to exist. I know them well, and I am on the wing for Catalonia—not to destroy, but to protect, Barcelonese industry. I have sworn to the constitution which I have maintained, vivified after victory, on the Pyrenean frontiers. I would rather perish than that this constitution should fall. I anxiously wait for the moment to resign my powers to the Queen, that I may retire into private life, content with having served my country." The Regent spoke with great force and eloquence in this strain for some time. A senator addressed some words to him, but the Catalan Deputies preserved a significant silence.

The Greek Consul General writes to the Constitutionnel, that his name was accidentally omitted in the protest of the other Consuls against the bombardment threatened by Van Halen.

Although no telegraphic despatches from the Spanish frontiers had reached the French Government from Friday last up to Tuesday afternoon owing to the dense fogs which had prevailed, no doubt existed as to the capitulation of the Barcelonese insurgents. A postscript in the Marseilles Semaphore, of the 3rd instant announces that the new junta, at the head of which was the Bishop, had accepted the conditions imposed by Espartero, one of which was the disarmament of the National Guards. The Marseilles Sud, of the 3rd, states that the Mercurio, which left Barcelona at five, A.M., on the 1st, brought the news that the whole day of the 30th had been passed in negotiations. The junta had demanded that Van Halen and Zurbano, as well as the political chief, should be removed from their commands in Catalonia; that the National Guards should remain armed, and that there should be no quintos, or conscription. These terms were refused by the Regent, who insisted on the unconditional surrender of the town. The Gazette du Midi confirms the Sud's statements.

The Cyclops British steamer, which brought the India mail to Marseilles, quitted that port on the 1st for Barcelona.

Our dates from Madrid are to the eve of the 30th ult., when the capital continued perfectly tranquil. It was rumored that Senor Arguelles, the Queen's Guardian, had sent funds to the Regent out of the civil list. Espartero's success in quelling the revolt was not for a moment questioned in Madrid.

The Eco del Comercio gives the following list of vessels destined to blockade Barcelona:—"The Cortes y Christina frigate, Manzanares, Hero, and Pluton brigantines, Isabella II. schooner, Lord John Hay packet, Rayo felucca, and the Isabel II. and Mazeppa steamers.

EGYPT.—ALEXANDRIA, Nov. 22.—Egypt is still suffering from the murrain among the oxen. The loss is estimated (guessed) at 150,000 head of cattle. Next year's crops are likely to be seriously affected by this loss. The Pacha looks to his revenue, and is in the Delta inquiring into matters. The cavalry and artillery are dismounted, and the horses sent to the Shiftliks to assist in agriculture. Ibrahim Pacha has ordered back his wheat from Alexandria.

We have no particulars of the state of affairs in Syria. The belief here is, that both Druse and Maronite will hold together to expel the Turks from the mountains, and then Syria may again be put under the care of Mehemet Ali.

The John and Ann, of Belfast, was wrecked on the 1st inst., about 250 miles to the westward. Some Bedouins brought in five of the crew (one man lost, and the captain died, seven in all) the other day, and claimed 50 dollars, or £10 for camel hire, as had been previously agreed upon. Lloyd's agents, on hearing of the affair, and that the Consulate would not pay the Bedouins the sum agreed upon, at once came forward and offered to pay the amount. This, with the subscriptions, will well reward the Bedouins, who ought to be encouraged to bring in any persons wrecked on the western coast.

A case of plague has been reported somewhere in the neighbourhood, and, of course, the Consuls issue foul bills of health. There has been a good deal of fever lately in Alexandria.

THE WEST INDIES.—The royal mail-steamer Solway, from the West Indies, freight 162,300 dollars, arrived at Falmouth on Saturday last. She arrived at Bermuda 14th Nov., Fayal 26th, and sailed 27th. Passengers—Miss Smith; Captain Maude, 33d; Captain Lodder, 59th Regiment; F. S. Morphy, Esq., Mrs. Morphy, and four children; Lieutenant Brady, R.N.; Messrs. Isaacs, Lang, Manuel Lossevini, De la Torre Mercanteli, Nobo, and F. and T. Grilier.

The vice-admiral was expected at Bermuda, from Halifax, Nov. 25.

The Mischief and Zante, English vessels, were spoken 60 miles from Tampico, being bound to that port.

AMERICA.—UNITED STATES.—New York papers of the 18th and 19th ult. arrived at Liverpool, on Wednesday, by the packet-ship North America. These papers are entirely filled with details of English and other European intelligence received at New York from the Acadia steamer, whose arrival we have already announced at Boston.

This packet brings home one hundred and forty steerage passengers, nearly all of them returned emigrants, who had found it impossible to earn a decent livelihood in America, in consequence of the prevailing distress amongst all classes of persons there, and the want of capital to prosecute the works previously undertaken.

The Canada papers are barren of news. The Montreal Courier says—"The vexed question of the seat of government seems likely to be decided by a circumstance which no one anticipated, and the occurrence of which is a subject for regret. The health of the Governor-General has been severely shaken by his recent illness, and the locality of Kingston is not supposed to be favourable to his complaint. On this account it is rumoured that a change will take place in the vice-regal residence, and that his excellency will take up his abode either in Quebec or Montreal—that is, if he does not proceed home, which is far from improbable."

Great excitement was occasioned at New York by an occurrence of the most tragical and shocking nature, which took place on the 19th ult. at the City Prison, the day appointed for the execution of the notorious J. C. Colt, who was under sentence of death, and who anticipated the office of the executioner by committing suicide under the following extraordinary circumstances:—

The preparations for the execution of the murderer were all made at an early hour in the morning. Colt's brother was at the prison door as soon as it was opened, and remained with him about a quarter of an hour. He afterwards dressed himself, and was shaved by Bill Dolsens, of Centre-street, commonly called Deaf Bill.

The gates to the entrance of the prison were closed about eight o'clock, and officers stationed to prevent the ingress of any except those who had tickets of admission. The position of the gallows was in the rear courtyard of the prison, in the house of the keepers. But its erection could be distinctly heard through the massive walls of the prison. It was erected in the centre of the yard, and immediately opposite the rear window of the cell in which Colt was confined.

At nine o'clock the outer door of his cell was opened, and the usual breakfast of the prisoners served up in their different cells. Dr. Anthon visited the cell of Colt at about eleven o'clock, in company with Colt's brother, for the purpose of making preparation for his marriage with Caroline Henshaw.

At about half-past 11 o'clock, Messrs. Graham and Emmett, his counsel, visited his cell and remained about half an hour. A little before 12 o'clock, Caroline Henshaw made her appearance in company with the brother of Colt and John Howard Payne, who entered the cell with her. They were then married by the Rev Dr. Anthon, in presence of Messrs. Graham, Robert Emmett, Justice Merritt, the Sheriff, John Howard Payne, and Colt's brother. After their marriage, Dr. Anthon remained in the cell with them a few minutes and then left them alone, she remaining for nearly an hour.

At this period of the eventful day, the scene was exciting and thrilling in the extreme. Within that narrow cell were the husband and wife, but just married, yet bidding each other farewell for the last time on earth, with the awful certainty that one would be a lifeless corpse, and the other a widow, before the setting of the sun that was then throwing its rays into the otherwise cheerless place. At one o'clock Colt's brother entered his cell; he was still engaged in conversation with his wife, who was sitting on the foot of the bed, convulsed with his tears. At Colt's request, John Howard Payne and Lewis Gaylord Clarke then went into his cell to take their leave of him. Colt appeared exceedingly pleased to see them; shook them cordially by the hand, and conversed with apparent cheerfulness with them for five minutes, when they had him farewell, both of them in tears. Colt's brother Samuel, and his wife, remained in the cell about 10 minutes longer, when both left. His brother was deeply affected, and looked more ghastly even than Colt himself. His wife could scarcely support herself, so violent were her feelings and acute her sufferings. She stood at the door of the cell for a minute—Colt kissed her passionately—strained her to his bosom, and watched her retiring form as she passed into the corridor. Here she stood and sobbed convulsively as though her heart would break, for five minutes. At last she was led away by Colt's brother and his friends followed—Colt then desired to see the sheriff, who went into his cell. Colt then told him emphatically that he was innocent of the murder of Adams, and that he never intended to kill him; he also told him that he still had hopes that something would intervene to save him from being hung, and begged him not to execute the sentence of the law upon him. The sheriff told him to banish all hope of that kind, for that he must die at four o'clock. He then requested to see the sheriff's watch, and set his own by it to a minute. He then asked to see Dr. Anthon, and the latter went into his cell, and remained in prayer with him for about 10 minutes. From this time to three o'clock the excitement around the prison increased tremendously; and the feelings of those in the prison were also worked up to a pitch of great intensity. Several eminent surgeons came into the prison a little before three, and the universal topic of discussion, all round, among the little knots of spectators, was, whether he had been furnished with the means, and whether he would commit suicide or not. Many prophesied that "by four o'clock there would be a dead man without hanging."

No one entered his cell till precisely five minutes to four o'clock, at which time Sheriff Hart and Westervelt, dressed in uniform, with Dr. Anthon, proceeded to the cell. On the keeper opening the door, Dr. Anthon, who was first, drew back, threw up his hands and eyes to heaven, and uttering a faint ejaculation, turned pale as death, and retired. On going into the cell, there lay Colt on his back, stretched out at full length on the bed, quite dead, but not cold. A clasp-knife, like a small dirk-knife, with a broken handle, was sticking in his heart. He had stabbed himself about the fifth rib on the left side, and had evidently worked and turned it round and round in his heart after he had stabbed himself, until he made a large gash.

The coroner was ready at hand, took charge of the body, and locked the cell.

Most strange to say, just at this moment the large cupola of the tombs was discovered to be on fire, and burned furiously; so that if he had not killed himself, in consequence of the execution being postponed to the last moment, it is very probable that, in the confusion arising from the fire, and the mob breaking into the tombs, Colt would either have made his escape, or he would not have been hung. It caught accidentally from a stove that was in the cupola, the whole outside work of which was consumed.

The conduct of those concerned needs no comment.

On Wednesday, a service of plate was presented to William Shaw, Esq., late Secretary to the Royal Agricultural Society of England, as a public acknowledgment from the agriculturists of the United Kingdom to that gentleman, for the zeal, the energy, the talent, and the success, with which he has long laboured in the behalf of the science of agriculture, and in support of every effort for the diffusion of knowledge amongst the cultivators of the soil. The presentation took place at a public dinner given to Mr. Shaw at the London Coffee-house, at which upwards of one hundred gentlemen sat down, Francis Fym, Esq., presiding. The plate, which weighed upwards of 650 ounces, bore an appropriate inscription, and was presented with the usual ceremonies.

SUDDEN VISITATION.—An awful instance of the uncertainty of human existence occurred between eight and nine o'clock on Tuesday night. As James Smith, a drayman in the employment of Messrs. Reid and Co., brewers, was proceeding up to his own apartments, in the house No. 41, Leather-lane, apparently in robust and vigorous health, he suddenly dropped on the stairs, and never spoke afterwards. Death was instantaneous.

SHOCKING ACCIDENT.—On Tuesday morning, as Mr. Gant, of Tottenham-court-road, zinc-manufacturer, was superintending the covering of the roof of a house in Albany-street, Regent's-park, he overbalanced himself and fell on to the leads of an outhouse, the descent being about 16 feet. He was instantly carried in a state of great suffering to University College Hospital, where it was ascertained that he had fractured his right arm, and also his right leg; the latter with such dreadful severity that amputation was found to be indispensable. The operation was scientifically performed by Mr. Quain, the house surgeon, and hopes are entertained of the patient's surviving.

ANOTHER BODY FOUND IN THE THAMES.—Yesterday morning, after the fog had somewhat cleared off, the body of a young man, apparently of the age of twenty, was discovered floating on the surface of the water near Shadwell Dock. The Thames police were apprised of the circumstance, and the deceased was conveyed ashore, and the pockets examined; in one of them was found 3s. 9d. in silver and halfpence, and also a silver mounted tobacco-pipe. The deceased appeared about six feet in height, dressed in blue striped shirt, blue jacket, double-breasted waistcoat, worsted drawers, and shoes.

CHINA AND INDIA.

We were enabled in our Saturday evening edition last week to lay before our readers the intelligence conveyed by telegraph to the French Government from Marseilles, in anticipation of the Overland Mail, relating to the ratification of the treaty with the Emperor of China, and we now subjoin the important details of the news which has since reached us. The following despatches, in anticipation of the Overland Mail, have just been received; and we hasten to lay before our readers the following important extracts, which contain the gist of the intelligence.

CHINA

CONFIRMATION OF THE TREATY.

The Indian Mail has arrived at Marseilles, and announces that the Emperor of China has accepted the treaty of peace of the 29th of August, and has engaged to ratify it as soon as advice of the ratification of it by her Britannic Majesty shall have been received. His Imperial Majesty proposes sending an ambassador to London.

Half of the first instalment of the indemnity has been paid, and confided to the Blonde frigate for conveyance to England.

ALEXANDRIA, Nov. 12.

A steamer has come directly from Nanking to Suez, to bring this news; it had on board Major Malcolm, Secretary of the English Legation thereof. The English fleet will winter at Chusan, where vast works are undertaken to make the island healthy.

The British land and sea forces still remained at Nanking.

THE PEACE WITH CHINA.

NOTIFICATION

SECRET DEPARTMENT, BOMBAY CASTLE, Oct. 31.

In continuation of the notification of this Government, dated the 12th instant, the Honourable the Governor in Council is pleased to re-publish, for general information, the following general orders by the Right Honourable the Governor-General of India, dated Simla, the 14th instant.

The Honourable the Governor in Council is further pleased to announce for general information, that the ratification of the treaty by the Emperor of China was received by her Majesty's Plenipotentiary, and forwarded from Nanking to England on the 16th of September, by the Honourable Company's steam-frigate Auckland.

By order of the Honourable the Governor in Council,

J. P. WILLOUGHBY,
Secretary to the Government.

GENERAL ORDERS.

BY THE RIGHT HON. THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA.

SECRET DEPARTMENT, SIMLA, Oct. 14.

The Governor-General has sincere satisfaction in announcing the termination of the war with China, by a peace honourable to her Majesty's Crown, and durable in its provisions, which was concluded in the British camp, under the walls of the Imperial city of Nanking, on the 29th of August.

Thus, within two months after the arrival of the reinforcements sent from England and from India for the prosecution of this third campaign, the combined and preponderating force is the true point of attack has compelled the Emperor of China to submit to all her Majesty's just demands.

The Emperor could only save the internal trade of his empire from ruin, his ancient capital from capture by assault, and his empire itself from the peril of dissolution, by yielding to such conditions as it was her Majesty's power to impose, in order to afford to the subjects of her crown indemnity for the past and security for the future.

This event, glorious as it is to her Majesty's arms, will convey to her Majesty's heart other and yet higher satisfaction than that which is derived from the contemplation of military success, in the cessation of hostilities which have unhappily involved the most afflicting evils to humanity.

The Governor-General cannot presume to offer to the commanders of her Majesty's naval and military forces employed on the coast of China, in the execution of her Majesty's orders, the expression of the feelings with which their zeal, their energy, their ability, have inspired him; nor is it for him to presume to anticipate the approbation which the brave seamen, and marines, and soldiers under their command, may receive from the high authority under they have the honour to serve. The Governor-General can only offer to the commanders of her Majesty's forces his grateful acknowledgments of the regard they have ever evinced during these joint operations for the army and fleet of India, and his thanks for the opportunity they have, on all occasions afforded to the troops, of proving themselves to be worthy of fighting by the side of British soldiers.

The short duration of the operations of the troops on shore has not afforded to every corps of the native army of India the opportunity which all ardently desired, of distinguishing themselves before the enemy; but, wherever that opportunity has been afforded, the several corps of the army of India have added to their acknowledged fame.

Three companies of the battalion of Bengal Volunteers had the good fortune to be the first engaged with the enemy before the city of Chin-kiang, and they well sustained the high reputation of the army they represented.

The 2nd and 6th Regiments and the rifle company of the 36th Regiment of Madras Native Infantry were engaged in the capture by assault of that city on the 21st of July.

On that occasion, as on all others, the Madras Artillery and the Madras Sappers and Miners maintained the high character which has always been attached to their respective corps in the Madras army.

The Governor-General is pleased to direct that in commemoration of the distinguished services rendered by those corps in co-operation with her Majesty's troops in the capture of the city of Chin kiang, the 2nd and 6th Regiments of Madras Native Infantry, and the rifle company of the 36th Regiment of Madras Native Infantry, shall hereafter bear upon their appointments a dragon wearing an imperial crown; and that the same honour shall be granted to such troops or companies of the Madras Artillery and [illegible] Madras Sappers and Miners as the Excellency Lieutenant-General Sir Hugh Gough may designate as justly entitled to that distinction by their service before the enemy in China, in the present or in the previous campaign.

The Governor-General is likewise pleased to direct that the 2nd and 6th Regiments of Madras Infantry shall hereafter bear upon their colours a golden dragon wearing an imperial crown.

The Governor requests that his Excellency Lieutenant-General Sir Hugh Gough will have the goodness to transmit to him a nominal list of officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of the several corps of the army of India serving under his excellency's command, in the present or in the previous campaigns, as he may deem to be justly entitled by their services before the enemy, to the honour of wearing a medal commemorative of such services; and to every officer, non-commissioned officer, and private named in such list, the government of India will present a silver medal, bearing on one side the head of her Majesty, with the superscription, "Victoria Regina et Imperatrix," and the figures "1842" underneath, and on the reverse a dragon wearing an imperial crown.

The Governor General, again, in desirous of distinguishing the eminent services of the officers and seamen and others serving in the steam-vessels of war belonging to the Government of India, by the marks of honour they have so well deserved, requests that his Excellency Vice-Admiral Sir Thomas Parker will have the goodness to transmit to him a nominal list of the several officers, seamen, and others, serving in such steamers under his command, whom he may deem to be justly entitled to the honour of wearing a medal commemorative of their services; and to all persons named in such list the Government of India will present a silver medal similar to that presented to the troops.

The Governor General directs that the victories obtained by the combined forces in China may be made known to all the troops at the stations of the army; and that on a day to be appointed a salute shall be fired of twenty-one guns for those victories, and a similar salute of twenty-one guns for peace, which has been signed by the plenipotentiaries of the Emperor of China.

By order of the Right Hon. the Governor General of India,

T. H. MADDOCK,
Secretary to the Government of India with the Governor-General.
(True Copy.) J. P. WILLOUGHBY,
Secretary to Government.

(From the Bombay Times, Nov. 1.)

"OFF NANKING, 15th Sept., 1842.

"I am not going to give you a page of apologies for not having written you long letters, as I might always scurry and hurry, and hurry, when it is just the unexpected delay of a couple of days in the arrival of the Emperor's formal assent to the signed treaty which detains Malcolm, who, the instant it comes, will start for England in the Auckland. The country is quite inundated with the heavy rains and melting of the snows above, which [illegible] accounts, as we so not say, for the milk, &c., or, in the present instance, the Emperor's assent not having arrived. The cessation, of course, has given you the news of the conclusion of the treaty, as well as of its having been signed; the terms, too, of course, reached you at the same time. Not one cent they! 21,000,000 dollars, with Hong-kong, and a...ter other islands that people could expect us to make, such as trade with the five ports of Canton, Foo-chow-foo, Amoy, Ningpo, and Shanghae; all intercourse with the latter places to be carried on on terms of the most perfect equality, where and, to make all safe and secure, the old gentleman's own hand and seal must be applied to the treaty which is signed by his imperial commissioners. We retain Chusan, [illegible] Kulang-soo (Amoy) till the fulfilment of all the conditions. We leave the river, that is go down as far as Woosung, where they have paid the first instalment of 6,000,000, half of which we have already received, and it remains for us to see in the way up from Woosung, how we have been, for some days past, waiting our arrival, but has been ordered up by Keepoo, [illegible] he did not come for that there was any Chinese other down there, in sufficient rank to deliver it on board any ship of war of a strangely altered here! Two of the Hong merchants (old Howqua's son and Samqua) were sent for by the commissioners to come up here and assist in negotiating, or, rather, Sir Henry would not save anything to assist in the matter. Strange to say, they arrived the very day we entered the city of Nanking, [illegible] Henry to have a quiet talk over the several articles of the treaty with the commissioners before they came, and he did not even see them, nor have we heard a word of them since. We have since discovered, too, that the commissioners are much pleased that Sir Henry held us head thus high. Keying is a double-looking fellow, with the Shi, round his face, and rather prominent cheek-bones; his countenance, at first sight, especially when he is silent, is anything but prepossessing; when engaged in conversation, however, the expression becomes exceedingly pleasing, and, what we have always thought so unusual in a Chinese countenance, open, honest, and ready to...

"I repose very old and feeble; and indeed, on the day the treaty was signed, was so unwell as to be obliged to be carried in a chair up the side and into the cabin of the Cornwallis. He insisted, however, upon coming up, as I most resolutely said all the other for his having the treaty brought down to him to his own boat for his signature. His is a less prepossessing countenance even than Keying's, but, when he speaks, has much benevolence and honesty in its expression.

"So much for the high commissioners. We are all on the best terms possible with the Chinamen."

LATEST FROM CHINA

(From the Ceylon Overland Observer, Oct. 22.)

The steam-frigate Auckland, from Nanking 16th September, and Singapore 7th October, arrived at Galle on Saturday the 16th inst. She sailed again for Suez on the 17th, carrying Major Malcolm, Secretary to the Legation in China, bearing the Emperor's ratification of the treaty of peace. The other passengers are Captain Mytford, Captain Stratford, and Mr. Gough.

We have received the Straits Messenger of the 5th October, by this opportunity, the Queen to give the Chinese assurance of protection.

The steamer Auckland is just in from Hong Kong the 27th ult. She brings the ratification of the treaty by the Emperor of China. Major Malcolm, Secretary of Legation, is on board, in charge of despatches to the Home Government.

The intelligence by the Auckland is, that the Emperor's written assent had been given to the treaty, which a fitting alteration in details.

The first and second instalments had been paid; and money appeared to be plentiful, from the ready manner in which the Chinese had come forward with the cash.

The whole of the native troops are to be withdrawn from Chusan forthwith, and the island to be garrisoned by two regiments of European infantry, till the third instalment is paid up, for which the Emperor has two years allowed him to pay it in; after which period he will be charged five per cent. until he does pay it, while the troops will continue in possession. It was expected, however, from the way in which the first two instalments were paid, that any lengthened period would not be required by the Emperor.

Major Malcolm will remain in England but a few days, when he will return with the Queen's approbation of the terms of the treaty. The Auckland will wait his return at Suez. We are informed that Sir Henry Pottinger made the Chinese authorities aware of the fact that the treaty would not be binding on our part until it had received the ratification of the Home Government.

Sickness prevailed to a very great extent both among the European seamen and soldiers; and they rejoiced at the prospect of leaving so unhealthy a climate.

We subjoin an extract from a private letter from Hong-Kong, which does not a together agree with the foregoing:—

"The tidings by the Tenasserim, or Sesostris, whichever reached Singapore first, will have apprised you of the termination of hostilities with China, and made you aware of the general feeling of satisfaction here that the treaty entered into between Sir Henry Pottinger and the Chinese commissioners has been returned from Pekin, assented to by the Emperor and has come to hand. We will probably receive downward from Chusan in making about the middle of September, and I hope reach Hong Kong by the 15th of the ensuing month. There will be some little delay at Chusan to land the stores and make the necessary arrangements for the officers to be left in commissariat charge. The distribution of the force will be as follows.

"CHUSAN.—A company of the Madras Artillery, detail of Sappers, one wing of H.M. 55th, one wing of H.M. 18th, and Bengal 37th Native Infantry.

"KOOLUNGSOO.—Details of Artillery and Sappers, of her Majesty's 18th Regiment, one wing 41st M.N.I.

"HONG-KONG.—Company of Royal Artillery, one wing of her Majesty's 55th, her Majesty's 98th Regiment, one wing of the 41st M.N.I., detail of Sappers.

"The commissariat officers fixed upon to remain in charge are Lieut. Elphinstone, at Chusan; Lieut. Call, 18th, or Capt. Othorpe, Madras 2nd, at Koolungsoo; and Capt. James Ram-ay, at the headquarters at Hong-Kong, to superintend the whole. Lord Saltoun is to be left in command of the forces in China. The general opinion, however, is, that the third instalment of 6,000,000 will be paid in January or February, when Chusan and Amoy are to be evacuated, and the whole force concentrated at Hong-Kong. Sickness to a very great extent prevails throughout the expedition in the north. Sir Hugh, his son, and Capt. Moore are amongst the sufferers, but all are doing well. The poor fish are nearly all laid up; there is not above 250 fit for duty out of the whole corps."

INDIA.

The Intelligence from Bombay is to the 1st of November, and entirely confirms the glorious news brought by the late intermediate mail.

The proceedings of the British armies in the neighbourood of Cabul have been eminently successful. The whole of the British prisoners have been liberated from the hands of the Afghans. Their number was 31 officers, 9 ladies, and 12 children, with 31 European soldiers, 2 clerks, and 4 women, making in all 109 persons, who had suffered the horrors of captivity from the 10th of January to the 21st and 27th of September. The names of the prisoners rescued will be found in another column. The meeting between the veteran General Sale and his wife and daughter is described as highly affecting.

On the arrival of General Nott's division at Cabul, the resolution adopted by the British Governors of approach considered their position unassailable. The great part of the plunder seized last January from the British was placed there, and the chiefs kept their wives and families in it; and many also of those who had escaped from Cabul had sought refuge there. The British troops soon made themselves masters of the town, driving the enemy before them with considerable slaughter. Two brass field-pieces were taken. The loss to the victors consisted in one officer killed, Evans, of her Majesty's 41st Regiment) killed, and four wounded. The demolition of the forts was immediately begun. The expedition, after the destruction of Istaleef, was expected to return immediately to Cabul.

The notorious Akbkar Khan was a wanderer in Kohistan. On learning that all the prisoners, save Captain Bygrave, whom he had in immediate attendance upon himself, had been surrendered to the British authorities, he came to the resolution of sending in that officer also. Captain Bygrave was allowed to join General Pollock's camp on taking a letter from Akbkar Khan to the British general. That letter is stated merely to contain an inquiry as to what the British intended to do with his father and his family . . . It is further asserted that Akbkar Khan had lost all his influence with the Afghans, particularly since he had refused to place himself at their head during the battle of Tezeen, although called upon to do so. Tezeen was the battle fought on the 13th of September, and which decided the fate of Cabul.

One of the duties performed by the British was the interment of the skeletons of those who had fallen during the fata. retreat of January last. The number did not exceed 400 or 500. Several of these melancholy remains were recognizable. It is further stated that very many of the native soldiers and of the Hindoos who had accompanied the troops during the fatal retreat and come into the British encampments.

On the 1st of October the Governor-General issued the proclamation from Simla, announcing the victories over the Afghans, and the intended evacuation of the country, which we published last week.

The style, statements, and the principles of this important proclamation, have been variously canvassed in India. The phraseology is stated to be stated rather to the Asiatic than European taste; it cannot, however, fail to prove an impressive lesson to all the native princes.

The Governor-General has published several other proclamations, and among these are those which confer honours and medals, &c., on the regiments employed at Candahar, Ghuznee, Cabul, &c. One remarkable one is that which announces the termination of the war with China, and which directs the return of medals and other honours to the Indian soldiers and sailors employed in that campaign, and which will be found above.

The return of the British armies from Cabul to Peshawar was expected to commence about the 10th of October. The destruction of Cabul, and of the [illegible] near, and also of the fort of Jellalabad, had been ordered.

An attempt was made by Futteh Jung, the son of Shah Soojah, to place himself at the head of Cabul at the time of the flight of the Shah's troops on their colours being hoisted in the Bala Hissar. But this project was to avail him little, and it was thought that he, like his three brothers and many adherents of his family, would have to retire with the armies in order to lead a peaceable life as pensioners on the bounty of the Hon. Company.

It was not known how the Affghans, who have had experience of the resolution of the British Government to avenge all acts of treachery, would conduct themselves during the retreat of the troops from Cabul to Peshawar. Any desertion of the Shah's troops, especially of the Shah's Affghan subjects to the British, and who, during their progress into the country, had indulged in their propensity for plunder to the utmost. It was [illegible] that such acts intended to be punished by [illegible] and hanging on the spot against the treachery of the Affghans. Of the French generals . . . it was not known how the Affghans, who have had experience of the resolution of the British Government to avenge all acts of treachery, would conduct themselves during the retreat of the troops from Cabul to Peshawar. Any desertion of the Shah's troops, especially of the Shah's Affghan subjects to the British, and who, during their progress into the country, had indulged in their propensity for plunder to the utmost. It was stated door, while Mr. Hudson entered, to bargain for the article. The only surviving witness of the transaction is a boy belonging to an opposite shop, who could, from his position, look into the shop where Mr. Hudson was, and who saw some powder shown to him by the powder-vender. He next observed Mr. Hudson thrust his hand into what he believes to have been an open barrel of gunpowder, and take out a handful of the contents. Mr. Hudson was then seen to raise his hand, as if to examine what he had taken out, and immediately after the boy saw a small blaze, produced, no doubt, by the ignition of the powder in Mr. Hudson's hand by contact with the lighted end of a cigar which he was smoking. It is believed, that as the powder in his hand blazed, Mr. Hudson jerked his hand instinctively, and thus communicated the fire to the barrel which stood near him. In an instant more the entire shop, with one or two other shops on each side adjoining, was blown up into the air, and masses of masonry, rubbish, and timbers flew in all directions. All the inmates in the shop were buried in the ruins, together with a number of passengers in the street, who were seriously, and many of them mortally, injured, and have since died. Mr. Hudson perished among the rest, and, from the place in which he was found, which was just near the entrance of the ill-fated shop, his body being completely doubled up, with his face on his boots, it is believed that, notwithstanding the blast from the powder, he made an effort to gain the street, but was intercepted, by the fall of the ruins over him. The unfortunate young man's apparel was almost all destroyed by the blaze, and the only things found whole upon him were his boots, a prayer-book, which was in one of his pantaloon pockets, and a penknife and keys. The parts of his person which escaped disfigurement were his face and feet. The remains of Mr. Hudson were interred on Saturday morning by his friends, though much to the subsequent displeasure of the coroner, whose warrant for removal had not been obtained. Immediately after the occurrence the police, headed by constables Alson and Macannah, were on the spot, and, with the assistance of Coolies and some European seamen, succeeded in clearing away a great portion of the ruins, and extricating several bodies. There were no less than 35 persons injured by this most dreadful occurrence, 19 of whom were found dead on the spot. There was one poor native found buried alive among the ruins with only his head above. He was extricated and removed to the hospital, and is expected to survive. A native woman, who was passing the street at the time, got her leg so seriously fractured by one of the timbers thrown up by the explosion as to require the amputation of that limb. The majority of those injured were scorched by the blaze. Of these no less than 22, inclusive of Mr. Hudson, are dead; and among the remaining 13 out of 35 in hospital, several were in a precarious state up to Saturday evening. The agonies of some of these unfortunate creatures, almost scorched all over were pitiful indeed; to many of them death has been a deliverance from pain. A lady and child who were passing that way at the time, are said to have been thrown out of their palanquin by the shock, and are believed to have suffered serious injury; but we have been unable to learn who they were, or the extent of their injuries. The shock produced by the explosion was so great, as not only to have been felt in all the surrounding buildings, but in many at a distance. Some of the large houses in Rada Bazaar and Clive-street Ghat are said to have experienced it very severely. It ought to be stated that the companions of Mr. Hudson most providentially escaped. The buggy horse at the first flash of the powder took fright and ran away, and thus put those in the buggy beyond the danger, which otherwise they must have shared. An inquest was held by the coroner, on Saturday evening, which has been adjourned to this day at eleven o'clock. The jury repaired to the medical college to inspect the bodies, where few juries could have beheld a sight more painfully revolting than they did. There were 21 stiff and scorched up corpses laid out side by side, some of them presenting the most shocking appearance of disfigurement. Of the unfortunate natives who have perished, the friends of 10 of them have not yet become cognisant of the accident, as there was no one in attendance before the coroner to identify them.

China Prize-money.—The China war being now ended, it is matter of considerable interest to military men to learn what portion of the 21,000,000 dollars indemnity money, which the Chinese have to pay, is to be made over as prize-money to those whose valour has wrung this treasure from our crafty enemy; and we trust that such will be dispensed for the troops with a sufficiently liberal hand, not only to cover all the losses and extra expenses of those who have been engaged in the war, but to leave them something handsome whereby to remember the "China expedition."—Indian, Spectator.

Malta, Nov. 27.—In consequence of the only two steamers in port (out of the twelve attached to the Mediterranean fleet) being under repairs, there has been no conveyance for taking on board Major Malcolm, and his fellow despatch bearer, until yesterday, when the Locust (just arrived from Marseilles) was sent away with them late in the evening; but as she is a mere steam tender, of very insignificant powers, and from the necessity of her putting into Gibraltar to replenish her fuel, the Oriental will no doubt be in England before her. She will proceed to either Portsmouth or Plymouth, and it is hoped that her worthy commander, Lieutenant Lunn, an old officer, who has seen some terrific weather in her, especially in carrying to Marseilles the last extraordinary despatch, besides the services he rendered last summer along the Barbary shore towards the abolition of slavery, will obtain his promotion.

VIEW OF THE GREAT WALL OF CHINA.

All our news from China is now of a gratifying character. Trade has become brisk at the prospect of fresh markets opened to our manufactures, and the public gaze is directed steadily and anxiously to our new Celestial friends. Every feature of the country is now invested with fresh interest, and we therefore add to our former illustrations two others, the first representing a portion of the Great Wall—one of the old wonders of the world—the other a View on the Grand Canal, the scene of some of the recent operations of the British troops.

This is not the place for lengthy statistical details, or we might write a long fluent article upon the history, half true, half fabulous, which two thousand years have handed down to us as connected with the Great Wall of its foundation by the first monarch who ruled over the united provinces of the north of China some 200 years before Christ—of the erection of a second and inner portion when the emperors of the Ming dynasty had succeeded in ejecting the Mongol conqueror—of the stockade which extends for many miles to the north east—of the towers which, at stated intervals, line and strengthen this once impregnable defence, now in a state of half decay—of the embattled platforms and parapets—and of the valleys, rivers, hills and mountains, over which, defying all obstacles, the industry of this numerous and ingenious people carried their gigantic and far-famed work.

Of the Grand Canal we have already given views, with sketches of the fleet which taught the Chinese the bitter lesson of their own inferiority. We there displayed it in its pride—a noble canal—one of the longest and most important of artificial navigations which the world can boast. The aspect here chosen by our artist, if less important, is perhaps, more picturesque. The rude boats—the busy throng hurrying into the city gates—the towers, in all the quaint proportions of Chinese construction—make, when taken together, a sketch full of interest at the present time, and in itself a not unpleasant picture of busy life.

THE GRAND CANAL AT THE ENTRANCE TO PEKIN.

THE CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XVIII.

FRENCH PROTESTANT CHURCH, St. MARTIN-LE-GRAND

Another new church for London!—just now finished, and about to be opened—affords an illustration for our columns, at once novel and picturesque. The site chosen is one which has felt the full benefit of modern improvements. Not very many years ago St. Martin-le-Grand had little to recommend it to the eye—now it is surrounded by fine buildings, and forms one of the choicest openings in the tortuous monotony of London bricks and mortar. We have here one of our best Grecian buildings, the Post-office; next the gorgeous Hall of the rich Goldsmiths—a first-rate edifice whose beauties are half hidden by its position; then that most magnificent of caravanserais, with the most un-euphonious of titles, the Bull and Mouth; next, looming mightily above surrounding objects, the dome of St. Paul's, and last and least the small, but picturesque chapel of the French Protestants, to which we now introduce our readers. In a few months a new street, in a line from Lad-lane, is to open upon the Post-office; and thus altogether, this petite chapel has been placed in a position where its pretensions run no risk of being overlooked.

The old boast that England is the land of freedom has often met a heartfelt response from the natives of other countries, and the religious as well as political refugee has for centuries felt the warm sincerity of English hospitality. This very church is token and evidence of one bright instance. It is now nearly three hundred years since Edward the Sixth granted to divers "strangers fled here for the sake of religion," in addition to other benefits, a building in Threadneedle-street, to be used as a Protestant church. Close by were other ecclesiastical buildings:—the remains of a convent of Augustines, in whose precincts the tombs of many old nobles, and of most of the baronets slain in Barnet field, in 1471, then stood. The place of worship thus given, in 1550, has ever since remained to the use of the successors of those to whom it was first granted. Until recently, the French Protestants continued in Threadneedle-street; their church being an old structure, with few architectural pretensions. This having been demolished, they have removed their place of worship to St. Martin-le-Grand, erecting the building which forms the subject of our cut. The architect, Mr. Owen, has succeeded in completing a very perfect, though small, pointed Gothic chapel, ingeniously rendering the minister's house—which adjoins the scene of his spiritual labours—subservient to the general effect. The interior, with its lancet windows, tall roof, and appropriate pulpit, is well managed, considering the confined space the artist had to work in. The cost has been £3000, and the public will now very soon have an opportunity of judging how wisely it has been expended, as the church will shortly be opened for divine service.

The Monument.—Perilous Feat.—On Wednesday morning a crowd of persons were assembled in the neighbourhood of the Monument, their attention being drawn to a man standing on the summit, above the gilt part, which is intended to represent flames. It appeared that some portion of the iron-work at the ball at the top required repair, and some workmen were sent up to do it, when one, more venturesome than the rest, got through the trap-door, and, after shutting down the opening, stood upright at the top, to the astonishment and fear of the spectators lest he should fall from the tremendous height. He remained there for some minutes, and then descended in safety.

City Kitchen Society.—On Wednesday evening, at seven o'clock the members of the above Society, established for the purpose of supplying the poor with coals and potatoes during the winter months held their annual meeting at the London Coffee-house, Ludgate-hill; Alderman Wilson in the Chair. A considerable number of the local clergy were present, and took part in the proceedings. After a few words from the Chairman, the Secretary read the report, from which it appeared that the Society was progressing favourably, and that the arrangements for the ensuing winter were completed. The report recommended increased activity among the members in furtherance of the views of the Society, and several subscriptions being handed in, the meeting shortly after separated.

The New Thames Police Court.—The new court-house in Arbour-square, Stepney, the erection of which commenced more than two years and a half ago, and which has been completed some time, has during the last few days received the furniture and fittings necessary for the purpose of carrying on judicial business, and it was understood that yesterday or Tuesday next, and order in Council would be issued for transferring the business from the old court in High-street, Wapping, to the new building, which is upwards of a mile from the river.

A few minutes after twelve o'clock on Saturday night last, as a man named George Byng was putting out the lights in the second tier of boxes at the Haymarket Theatre—the performance having terminated and the audience retired—he overbalanced himself and fell head foremost into the pit. The noise caused by his falling upon the seats brought other persons to the spot, where he was discovered lying in a state of insensibility, with a large wound in his forehead. We are glad to hear that the unfortunate man has been since going on well, and is likely to recover.

VIEW OF BARCELONA.

The above engraving, in addition to those which we have already given, completes our series of illustrations of Barcelona. Fortunately for that city, the tide of affairs has turned in her favour, and the insurrection, so formidable in its commencement, has been extinguished without necessity for those extreme steps on the part of the Queen's General which must have led to the destruction of many public buildings—to say nothing of the fearful loss of life and great sacrifice of property. By reference to the view, it will at once be perceived how completely Montjuich commands the city. Placed upon an almost inaccessible eminence, it bids defiance to a hostile force, and its position places in the power of its possessors the fate of the town, which cowers, as it were, for protection below. Our news columns will acquaint the reader with the latest particulars in reference to this subject, and we feel sure that all parties must rejoice over the settlement of this insurrection, without resort to the dire alternative of bombardment. Will Spain and Spaniards ever glean wisdom from experience?

On Wednesday evening a new microscope, constructed by Mr. Cary, the optician to the Polytechnic Institution, was exhibited. The effects are produced by the agency of the oxy-hydrogen jet playing on a piece of quicklime, familiarly known as the Drummond light, and are perfectly astounding, as the following accurate statement of facts will show:—The microscope in question consists of six powers, ranging from one hundred and thirty times to seventy-four millions of times. The second magnifying power magnifies the wings of the locust to twenty-seven feet in length. The fourth power magnifies the sting of the bee twenty-seven feet. By the sixth power, the eye of the fly, which is said to contain 750 lenses, is so magnified that each lens appears to be fourteen inches in diameter; the human hair is magnified eighteen inches in diameter, or four feet in circumference. Nothing can exceed the beauty with which insect architecture is developed under the influence of this enormous power; the condensing lens is 9½ inches in diameter.

The Weather.—The metropolis and environs were enveloped in a dense fog nearly the whole of Tuesday and Wednesday, in consequence of which business was much impeded, and many of the short stage coaches and omnibusses were necessarily delayed in their journies to their several destinations. The fogs, which have visited us a month later than usual, and commenced heavily with December, have been productive of some inconvenience on the river during the past week, and a few accidents. On Monday night the fog was so heavy that not a steamer or sailing vessel could proceed up or down the river, and many homeward bound remained at Gravesend for the night. The fog was occasionally very dense on Tuesday, and the steamers proceeding between the Adelphi Pier and Woolwich were frequently delayed. The present week has been prolific of arrivals from the eastern hemisphere. Upwards of 20 vessels of large tonnage, and containing valuable cargoes, have arrived in the docks, several of them from China, and the quantity of tea brought home from Whampoa, &c., exceeds 15,000 chests. The barque Elenora, of Whitehaven, 319 tons register, Captain Jackson, arrived in the St. Katharine's Dock, from Whampoa, with nearly 5000 chests, the majority of which was congou.

The Tariff.—Foreign Cattle.—During the last week 205 head of foreign cattle which have recently arrived from the Continent in this country, have been placed in the spacious feeding-room attached to the extensive distillery of Sir Felix Booth, Bart., at Old Brentford. One hundred and eighty of them have come from Holstein and other parts of Germany, viâ Hamburg, and the remaining twenty-five are Spanish. They are all intended for the English market, and are expected to be in fine condition about April next. The former are all black and white, or brown and white, and are finely-formed animals. Their food consists of the grains and wash of the distillery. Several graziers and farmers have visited the feeding-room since they have been placed there, for the purpose of examining them.

India and China.—The Gazette of Tuesday contains the dispatches received by the last overland mail by Government; they do not, however, add anything important to the details published by us in this impression. It also contains a Treasury warrant, directing that, "on every letter not exceeding half an ounce in weight, posted in or addressed to the Duchy of Oldenburg, transmitted between any part of the United Kingdom and Oldenburg, conveyed between the United Kingdom and Oldenburgh direct by packet-boat or private ship, or viâ the territories of Hamburgh, Hanover, and Bremen, or any of them (conveyed direct by packet-boat or private ship between the United Kingdom and the territories of Hamburgh, Hanover, and Bremen, or any of them), there shall be charged and taken, in lieu of the present rates of postage, an uniform rate of British postage of sixpence."

Horticultural Society.—The last meeting for the season was held on Tuesday at the rooms of the Society in Regent-street, the Duke of Devonshire, president, in the chair. The prizes awarded were a silver Knightian medal to the Duke of Devonshire, for Lodia anceps; silver Banksian medals to Mr. Judd, for the Providence pine; Mr. Goode, gardener to Mrs. Lawrence, for a collection of plants; Mr. Pawley, for Cactus truncata, and Mr. Appleby, for a specimen plant; and Banksian certificates of merit to Mr. Castle for a specimen plant, and Mr. Crawshaw for celery.

HUNGERFORD SUSPENSION BRIDGE.

Some weeks ago we gave a sketch of the works in progress for the erection of a new bridge across the Thames. Already has the pier on the Middlesex side risen above high-water mark; and, in anticipation of the completion of the structure, we hasten to give our readers a graphic notion of what the new bridge will be, as seen from the Surrey side, with a glimpse of York Column and St. Martin's Church. The Parisians boast of the number of their bridges; the Londoners may justly feel proud of the style and magnitude of theirs. The narrow Seine is no parallel to the broad and busy Thames, nor can the bridges of Paris bear any comparison with those of London. Canova—and who could be more competent authority?—pronounced Waterloo-bridge to be the finest ever built. The iron bridges of Southwark and Vauxhall were the first of their kind and size, and give a pleasant diversity to the river view; and we are now to have another, upon the suspension principle, in the Hungerford-bridge. It is intended for foot-passengers only, and promises to be a light, elegant structure, crossing the broad river with one bold central span from pier to pier, with two subsidiary stretches to either shore. The two piers will be of solid masonry, rendered light in appearance by architectural adjuncts, but sufficiently substantial to uphold the massive chains, which are estimated to weigh about seven hundred tons! The central span across the stream, between these piers, will be six hundred and seventy feet—the entire length of the footway being one thousand four hundred and forty feet. The footway will be twenty-eight feet above high-water mark—the path being fourteen feet wide.

The general effect of the bridge promises to be good, and likely to improve, very materially, the appearance of Hungerford. Passengers will walk through the centre of the fruit stalls, over the fish market, and in a few minutes find themselves in Pedler's Acre, or—as it has been christened in obedience to the modern fashion for fine names—Belvidere-road, Lambeth. Some half mile is expected to be thus saved, for which the toll is to be a halfpenny. Whether this will prove sufficient to repay the outlay,—the estimates for building, and iron work, without approaches, being £80,000,—remains to be seen. We must however express a hope that the speculation will prove successful, inasmuch as the convenience of the public will be aided without injuring the appearance of the river or interfering with the facilities for navigation. The market must be benefited, and as it is proposed that the river steam-boats should take in passengers from the piers, a hope may be indulged that the annoyances at present arising from the floating erections, with their noisy touters, will be abated on the completion of the Hungerford Suspension Bridge.

New Houses of Parliament.—The fifth contract for erecting this national and truly magnificent work has just been entered into. This contract, or portion of the work, is by far the most important that has yet taken place, embracing as it does the Victoria Tower, the Royal Gallery, the Houses of Lords and Commons, with other important and necessary adjuncts thereto.

During the last month, the amount paid into the savings bank of Paris was 2,771,168f., by 19,557 persons' of whom 2,513 were new depositors. The amount of reimbursements was 2,216,000f.

We learn from St. Petersburgh that an imperial ukase has been published there reducing the period of service in the army to ten years. This measure is said to have been adopted as a check upon desertion; the convention between Russia and Prussia for the mutual surrender of deserters being at an end.

The Post-office Treaty between the Austrian Government and that of Baden has just been ratified on both sides.

The new moon which occurred on the morning of Friday, the 2nd inst., at 14 minutes past four, brought us bright and fine weather, with an unusually mild atmosphere for the month of December, whilst letters from the north of Europe announce that the winter has set in with great severity, and that part of the Baltic has become unnavigable. A Riga correspondent, Nov. 7, says:—"It has frozen hard these two last days. About 180 vessels are detained here by the ice." A letter from Rendsburg, November 17, states that from Landwher to Holtenha.t the canal is frozen over; and another from Kiel, of the same date, says that the harbour was encumbered with ice.

We understand that in consequence of Christmas-day falling on a Sunday, the customary Dock-yard holiday will be given the following day.

THE COLOSSEUM PRINT.

We have now to call the attention of our readers and subscribers to the promised prospectus of our Colosseum Print—a superb and original work of art, produced upon the grandest scale—which we pledged ourselves to present to all the readers of the

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

who should have punctually subscribed to the paper during the first six months of its existence. The great success which we have achieved now enables us to go to an extent of enterprise that we are sure will more than crown the highest expectations of the public

THE COLOSSEUM PRINT

derived its title, in the first instance, from an intention of presenting a magnificent engraving of LONDON AT ONE VIEW—to reflect, as it were, a similar grand picture to that so long exhibited at the Colosseum. The better plan, however, of our artists and advisers reminded us that we should thus exclude that wondrous leviathan of our metropolitan architecture,

ST PAUL'S CATHEDRAL;

and to this important recollection was added a suggestion that a much finer field of what may not inaptly be called "Panoramic glory" was presentable from another lofty eminence of London, which it, however, required official authority to enable us to view.

TWO SPLENDID VIEWS OF THE METROPOLIS

have been the result of the altered proposition, taken north and south, from the summit of the

DUKE OF YORK'S COLUMN,

by the obliging and noble-granted permission of General Maitland, for himself and his co-trustees, who thus confided to us an exclusive right that stimulated our proprietors to a degree of exertion which they hope will prove worthy of the signal mark of favour they have received. The

COLOSSEUM PRINT,

which will really be, in its superb dimensions, what the term "Colossal" is in reference to size, will then present to view

ORIGINAL ASPECTS OF LONDON.

The upper or south view will comprise all that magnificent sweep of picturesque objects which stretch from the Surrey shores of the Thames, as far as they are visible on the right, to beyond the Tower of London, with its adjacent forests of shipping on the left. The splendid range of manufactories which skirt the river, grow upward from their far distance to the gazer's eye, until they are closed with, and screened by, the venerable Abbey of Westminster, at once, with its solemn religious grandeur, absorbing mind and sight. But that fine pause of contemplation over, and away travels the eye, using as it were a kind of memory to bring present the old familiar features of the "City of the World." Look at the beautiful range of bridges spanning that river, which, though its waters are but silver, has been designated, for their burthen, the "river of gold." Mark the long lines of streets, the grand public buildings, the spires of old and new churches pointing to the sky, the Monument, the ancient and fort-like Tower, and "hid all, and above all, the eternal grandeur of St. Paul's! And these objects are so woven into the picture, that they are not parts of a confused mass, but prominent beauties of such a clear and well-defined architectural panorama as was never before embodied in the forms of art.

THE LOWER OR NORTH VIEW

turns the gazer upon a still more broad and open district of the metropolis. It stretches over the beautiful Parks; includes the Royal Palaces and mansions of our nobility; involves the finest streets in the world, Regent-street, Piccadilly, Portland-place, Whitehall, Trafalgar-square, and the superb clustering of aristocratic clubs; and, in a word, concentrates within its range all the palatial magnificence of western London to contrast with the rich, and solid greatness of its commercial aspect; endless wealth accumulation on the one hand, and on the other an expenditure whose lavishness might startle kings.

Such are the two sections of the TOTAL PICTURE from which we are about to present in all good-will to our readers, and now the only other points connected with it which we wish to impress upon their attention are

THE UNDOUBTED FIDELITY AND TRUTH

It is, in plain terms, a Mirror of the Metropolis, and for its reflection we are indebted to the light of the sun.

M. Claudet was expressly commissioned by us to construct a Daguerreotype apparatus, whereby we have obtained a series of drawings that are as it were "impressions of the city itself," with all the niceties of perspective preserved, and an accuracy of detail never before equalled in panoramic art.

NOTICE.

THE COLOSSEUM PRINT will be ready on New Year's Eve, when all persons will be entitled to receive it who have subscribed for six months from the commencement of the paper, or for six months previous to the publication of the print, or who pay a six months' subscription in advance from the time of the issue of the plate. This is the definite and distinct answer to all correspondents who have addressed us on the subject, and is a general guide to the public at large. The engraving is upon so grand and magnificent a scale, that it cannot be finished and a sufficient number printed before the time appointed for publication. Our subscribers have already so increased that the time requisite for printing becomes most important, and any delay that has arisen is attributable only to the necessity for such careful and deliberate arrangement as will make disappointment next to impossible.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"D. B., a Subscriber," Preston.—If the man is not insane, the whole proceeding can be not only upset, but punished heavily. Consult a respectable solicitor, who will probably advise you in the first instance to apply for a warrant to bring the supposed lunatic before a magistrate.
"T. M.," Winslow, who praises our "truly great and grand undertaking," shall have the print.
In answer to "J. G.'s" postscript, it will be in the volume.
"J. J." Wigan, next week.
"Cæsarunnagus."—Yes. The other appointment is very difficult to obtain.
"E. T. K." is entitled to the print. We do not know the birth-place of Box.
"A Subscriber."—We cannot comply.
"Bien Aimee." Yes.
The "Tarent unmasked," shall be inquired after.
"B. D. Buller." declined.
"Hesper." The plan proposed would be impossible of execution.
"M. N."—Not suited to a newspaper.
"A Constable Subscriber."—It is an electrotype.
"W. Ford." The two views are on the one sheet of paper; he will have both.
"Zenas" See the present number.
"C. P. F" Yes.
"A Constant Reader"—Consult a Court Guide.
"A Working Man"—Thanks for his communication. we may insert it.
"G. at Adarver"? As a point of honour, he should return the lady's letters; but there is no law to compel him.
"H. Bignell, M.D." will have the print.
To "T. J." the second is due.
"A Bon Mot"—No.
"Charity," Bethnal-green—No.
"R. Watkins," Caerleon.—No. Subscribers only.
"A Neophyte," in Cornwall.—The Queens he alludes to were only Queens of Provence, not of all Spain.
"W. Wright" Harkstead. Certainly.
"Free-lit," Birmingham.—They never came to hand, and it is now too late to think of their publication.
"M."—The suggestions are received.
"S. C. H." About a hundred thousand.
"B." The view of Constantinople in a former number was from a work published under that title by Messrs. Fisher, of Newgate-street. We are sorry that our correspondent should deem it incorrect.
"Lord Grant," Inverness.—The proposition would not suit us under any circumstances.
"A. N." Welsh street.—Three Shillings.
"N. T." Portsmouth. It is no go, old fellow, she is engaged.
"A Constant Reader."—Apply to Mr. Wakley, the Coroner. We have no means of ascertaining.
"A. W." will get the print from his newsman
"Whittlesea."—It will be sent in the course of business.
Part VI. is now ready.

 In the next number of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS will be found several engravings of Improved Agricultural Implements exhibited at the Prize Show; together with a mass of information peculiarly interesting to all engaged in farming, grazing, and other rural pursuits. The dead-weight of the prize cattle will also be given as soon as ascertainable.

☞ An accident prevented us from giving the second prize. Next week it shall appear

CARLISLE WRAY CHAPEL.—This beautiful little edifice, which has been erected at the sole expense of Miss Losh, of Woodside, was consecrated by the bishop of the diocese on Thursday week, in the presence of a number of the neighbouring gentry, by whom was the Dean of Carlisle, and a very large concourse of the inhabitants of the Norman style, the windows of which are entirely filled with stained glass. The reading desks are placed on each side of the chancel; one is a carved pelican, the other an eagle. The chancel, which is circular, has fourteen niches, divided by Norman piers, the capitals of which are all different. The font is a splendid piece of workmanship; the ground-work of the lid is looking-glass, above which is some fine carving. It contains a large silver bowl for the water. The backs of the books are all of oak; that for the communion-table is beautifully ornamented with silver clasps.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1842.

In the pursuit of our duty to the heads of families, and perhaps (if either advice or warning from the public journalist be socially efficacious) to their children also, we take up our pen, upon the first practical opportunity afforded to us, against the vice of gambling. This is the most pestilential and least persecuted of the crimes of modern dissipation, it has perpetrated the largest amount of mischief with the largest amount of impunity, and, at last, the moral voice of civilization is beginning to cry abroad to society to put it down. The initiative steps towards reform are, however, we are sorry to perceive, not beginning at the right end of the community, they commence with the dregs rather than the rulers; and the spy, assuming the duties of a Government with the motives of a scamp, takes the task of prosecution upon hands which have no objection to bear the odium to boot. Among the law trials of our paper will be found a report of the case of Smith versus Bond, in which the plaintiff, under an old statute of Queen Anne, brings an action against the defendant, a hell-keeper in St. James's-street, for treble the amount of certain monies lost in his house. Lord Abinger summed up with his usual vigour and more than his usual discretion upon the evidence of the trial, and the jury returned a verdict against the hell-keeper of £3508 damages for his guilt.

The verdict is correct and salutary, the law upon which it has been obtained is nearly obsolete but is revived beneficially, on account of the reflection and discussion which its revival will create. The technical terms of the enactment are to the effect that:—

Where a person should, at any one sitting, lose more than £10, it should be competent for him, within three months, to recover from the person to whom he had lost, treble the amount so lost; and in the event of the party losing not proceeding under the statute, then that any person should have the power to sue the person winning, and to recover from him treble the amount so won; the sums or penalties to be paid to the person suing in one moiety, while the other moiety should be paid over to the parish in which the offence had been committed.

In the present case the Mr. Smith who brought the action was not one of the losers, but pursued it as an informer in their despite. His aim would seem to be compounded of blended malice, treachery, and gain; for it is in evidence that he had been the servant of the defendant in his vocation, the very receiver of the won monies, the particeps criminis in any and every kind of gambling spoliation and infamy that had been practised within the establishment which he came into court to sell. It was even in this capacity that he gained the knowledge upon which he was enabled legally to act. Now, in the outset, let us declare that, while we rejoice in the verdict, we do not rejoice with this man, although we might be escorted by the companionship of so distinguished a contemporary as the Times. That journal has put its fiat of approval upon Mr. Smith, and encouraged other "dogs of prey" upon a similar chase after their garbage. It asserts, with more truth than morality, that:—

The pursuit is not merely profitable and of public utility, but it is also charitable. Half the money recovered goes to the parish, to be laid out, it may be, in blankets and soup for the poor; or, it may be, in redeeming for the poor that space in their parish church which the vestry have unlawfully usurped, and let out for money to the rich, in order to save themselves from the burden of church-rates. Positively, if there should be a deficiency of spirited individuals to carry on this good work, it would be worth while to organize parochial committees on purpose. The object is much better than those of half the so-called philanthropic societies in the kingdom.

To the sarcastic seriousness of this we cannot agree. We would not even accept its benefit. We dislike the price of virtue as a means of human charity almost as much as the price of blood. We would not have our poor relieved with one morsel of bread from the gaming table, at the expense of morality, and as a reproach to sympathies of their kind. Let the nation make it a duty, as it is a law, to keep the poor. Nor, on the other hand, to put down the dreadful vice of gambling, would we shake hands with the acquaintanceship of this man Smith. We would never do a wrong to redress a wrong, nor seek one pestilence to exterminate another. The doctrine of "Set a thief to catch a thief" we abjure because it involves a principle of treachery. We would not even induce the servant, Smith, to betray the master, Bond; but we are glad of the circumstances of the trial and verdict upon much higher and holier public grounds. It is one of those expositions of, and checks to, an abominable vice which entitle us to demand of the proper legal authorities how it is that, with abundances of enactments to crush it utterly, they delegate their powers to the reckless common informer, or supinely permit its existence as a nuisance and degradation to the community. Let Sir James Graham, or the fitting minister, at once instruct the Attorney and Solicitor Generals to prosecute all nefarious and notorious gambling-houses, high and low. Is not the evil crying enough? Has it not despoiled peaceful homes of happiness for ever; ruined fathers, robbed children, and sent burning, maddening, remorseful agony, alike into the palace of the royal rake and the wretched dwelling of the humbler spendthrift? Has it not created the existence of "debts of honour" which (lucus a non lucendo) have caused resort to every dishonourable alternative to avoid just and honest obligations? Has it not disgraced scions of our best aristocracy, and sacrificed the tradesman to the shark? Has it not spoiled young enterprise in the lower ranks, and sent ci-devant competency to the slop-shop and the pawnbroker, to win a sickly and sorrowful support? What virtue has it ever engendered? What vice has it not rendered more hideously deformed? Is there any defence for it that your potentates of the law would set up? Why, they can attack poverty; they can crush misfortune; they can inflict prison tyranny upon debt; and why then are they silent at the threshold of the pandemoniums of gambling crime? Is it because they have Corinthian architecture, and are emblazoned within with luxury and gold? Is it because they enshrine, like secret temples, the darling vice of the abandoned rich? Or must the high duty of protecting public morality be left of necessity to men of treachery, who only assume it as a speculation, and enter upon it in defiance of the ordinary principles of human brotherhood, with the basest of motives and the most depraved of hearts? In Heaven's name let the vigilance of governments save us the future mortification of having a triumph over one sin—such as has been recorded by the verdict against Mr. Bond—which has been miserably purchased by the enlistment of another. Triumph, however, we must, for the public eyes are opened, and the gambling-houses must now be crushed.

In a former number of this journal the sickening event of a death from a brutal prize-fight incited us to record our protest against the horrible continuance of a practice which some are yet found to desecrate our nationality by describing as English. If it be English to be unmanly—English to be bloodthirsty without motive to quarrel or revenge—English to be savage without impulse, and murderous without remorse—then the wretched science of the ring may and does define its own Englishmen; but they are not of the natural parentage of this generous country to which, for very antagonistic reasons, the proper sons of Britain are patriotically proud to belong. We are not, however, about to insult our readers by further argument upon the debasing public infamy which we denounce, but simply to seize upon an occurrence of the past week, to summon the supine civil authorities to something like a sense of their disregarded duty. There has been another disgusting fight between a man of the enormous stature of seven feet and upwards, styled "the giant" by the dissolute wretches who encourage him to "use the strength of a giant" to degrade the character of a man, and another stalwart yeoman of Tipton, called "the slasher" in virtue of his dexterity to make a mummy of the human form divine. These men not only fought, but fought for an hour and a half after daylight had closed upon their brutality, and when the wretches who surrounded them to "see fair play," could not distinguish who gave the respective blows, or tell the difference between the two bodies when they were rolled upon the ground. Both men were disfigured and covered with blood, but were carried off at last, only because night ended what daylight might well have blushed to see begin. Now it is of no use to reason with this infatuation within the limit of newspaper comment, but we may at least ask, "Where are the magistrates?" Do they sleep with a knowledge of when and where the peace is to be broken, and let the public disturbers go with impunity to do their work? We tell them that they cannot plead ignorance, for not a policeman in the metropolis whose beat was before the sporting pot-houses of its hundred districts but knew the when and wheresabout of the fight full as definitely as any callous visitor who was going to it. The magistrates therefore—we say it distinctly—are infamously to blame for their personal neglect of duty, or, for what is just as distressing to the public, a neglect of duty on the part of their paid police. The fight is reported as to be resumed—let us see whether the justices of the peace will permit it, or whether "the slasher" and "the giant" (they are both notoriously known in London) will be taken into custody for the affray that has already taken place.

THE AGRICULTURAL SHOW.

A blessing on the farmer's home, on all his grounds may yield,
The harvest of the granary, the tillage of the field;
A blessing on the hardy teams that toil before his ploughs;
A blessing on the living herds that through his meadows browse!

A blessing on the peasant's home, the cottage of the poor,
The housewife by its churning-mill, the urchins at its door;
On the little idle glowing group that by the roadside lurk,
On the weary father whistling home his happy way from work!

A blessing on the squire's house, the ancient home of pride,
That hath wassail in its cheerful hall, and charity beside;
From one who, greeting rich and poor with free ungrudging hand,
Still keeps a glowing English heart, the boast of English land!

A blessing on the lord's domain, the spacious, fair, and free,
The deer that skim the waving park, the steeds that prance the lea;
But most on him, whose tenants round but prove the happy strife,
Of how much human love a lord may kindle into life!

To-day the farmer's cheerful voice sings merry as a bird,
And the peasant drover shouts his wild road-music to the herd;
And the squire's eye looks glad, and cheek as ruby as his wine,
As he takes a proud and passing glance at those unrivalled kine!

And the noble who has had the good of all the rest at heart
With blended care and pleasure sees the thriving flock depart,
Of all his wide domains around, the flowers and the spoil;
And he feels a kind of pride to be a lord of English soil!

Fling wide, old London of the west, the gates of your bazaar,
To let the thronging cattle come from counties near and far;
Yes, far and near let ox and steer be gathered into stall,
Sheep bleat within the pen—and pig lie grunting by the wall!

Well done Old England! you have turned fine creatures from your meads!
What other land in all the world can show such splendid breeds?
Nay, turn the question round, and still a pleasant point will stand,
For pray what other cattle e'er could boast of such a land!

Let Italy with sunny sky salute the bird of Spring,
Let Summer sweep o'er southern France with bright and burning wing,
Let Autumn weep thro' Spanish groves, her tear, the falling leaf,
To England give her Cattle-show, her Christmas and her beef!

Give England such a race of beasts as men may slay and eat,
Till she grow soldiers for her wars, and sailors for her fleet,
And sturdy yeomen for her farms—and peasants for her plough,
That speak out "Briton" in the frame, look "Briton" from the brow!

Abundantly into her lap may all the fruits be poured,
Which agriculture, pride of soil, and husbandry may hoard;
The labour of the lowly poor, but fostered by the high,
As one fair strong outspreading branch of British liberty!

FOREIGN POLITICS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, DEC. 6.

We had an interesting evening on Sunday at the Conservatoire de Musique, when the annual prizes were distributed to the pupils for declamation and vocal and instrumental talent. The double drummer even got his wreath. M. Renaud, a French peer, made a pretty speech, feelingly alluding to the deaths of the celebrated Cherubini and Baillot the violonist. He congratulated the assembly on the accession of Duprez, the tenor, and Manuel Garcia (Malibran's brother), as professors of singing. A sister of Mdlle. Rachel, who was present by the way, obtained a prize for singing. Amongst the célèbres I noticed Mdlle. Mars, Casimir Delavigne, whose tragedies are a most invaluable soporific; the prolific Scribe; the mesmerised Meyerbeer; Auber; Habeneck, the venerable violinist, the best leader in the world; Lavasseur, the only true Devil of Robert; Carafa; Duprez, &c. We had lots of recitations, singing, and playing; and the winners of the prizes, with their friends, were in the seventh heaven; whilst some of the unlucky aspirants, if they had nobody to congratulate them, looked as if they were shaking hands with themselves.

The French are making a great fuss to-day about a conquest made in the Pacific Ocean of the island of Marquesas, by an expedition under M. Dupetit-Thouars. This archipelago, combined with the opening of the Panama isthmus and the trade to China (?), will tell wonderfully for France, say they to-day. I believe the acquisition is for a Botany Bay for the French criminals, who certainly will be transported at the news. The "Phanton Ship" does not sail well at the Académie Royale. The mongrel libretto, concocted from the legend, Captain Marryatt's novel, and Sir Walter Scott's "Pirate," by M. Paul Foucher, has no interest; and the monotonous music of M. Dietsch, the organist of St. Eustache, sends one to sleep. Thalberg's grand opera is in rehearsal, and will be produced as speedily as possible. We have had the revival of Meyerbeer's "Huguenots," in which Duprez is still splendid in voice and execution. Canaple, a new barritone, and Bouché, the bass, made their first essay in the parts of Nevers and St. Bris with tolerable success. Alizard's magnificent bass is missed in St. Bris. He is now singing with great popularity at Brussels. He is unquestionably the finest bass singer in France. Mdlle. Mequillot will not replace Falcon. The loss of the latter to the French opera is irreparable. Petipas (what a name for a dancer!) has broken his arm. What the deuce business had he to mount on horseback in the Bois de Boulogne, when he has such a reputation for the soundness of his own limbs? The cry about Fanny Ellsler is still "she comes."

At the Italian, "Linda" was played six nights consecutively, and gained on repetition. Persiani, Tamburini, and Lablache carry off the honours; and Brambilla, the fine contralto, is not distanced in the vocal race for supremacy. Mario makes a bad fifth, and young Lablache is nowhere. This Savoyard story will please you London amateurs when it is produced: it is not Donizetti's masterpiece, but there are some nice things in the opera. The revival of "Lucrezia Borgia" has been an event. Grisi is indeed grand in Victor Hugo's monstrous mother. Lucrezia is not the classic Mérope till Grisi's expressive and dramatic power makes her savagely great in the defiance scene with the young lords, and truly pathetic in the maternal bursts. Brambilla's fine style is well developed in Orsini, and Tamburini is always effective in the husband of Lucrezia. Lablache leads the fine chorus of lords splendidly. We are to have next Pauline Garcia in Tancredi with Persiani's Amenaide.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

FIRES IN THE METROPOLIS.—On Monday evening last a destructive fire broke out on the extensive premises belonging to Messrs. Villiers, merchandlers, &c., situate at the corner of North-street, Lock's-fields, Walworth. About an hour after the outbreak the fire was got under, but not before the whole of Messrs. Villiers' premises were consumed, nothing remaining but the bare walls. Two valuable horses perished in the flames, together with a large stock of corn and grain. On Wednesday great alarm was created, owing to a fire breaking out on the premises belonging to a gentleman named Druce, an officer in the Royal Navy, situate at No. 3, Grove-place, Balhamhill, Camberwell. The fire originated in one of the bed-rooms of the first floor, and in the short space of five minutes the apartment was one body of flame, but, fortunately, a plentiful supply of water having been obtained, and several of the inhabitants readily assisting, the flames were prevented from extending, and were soon extinguished, but not before considerable damage had been done. An extensive fire took place in Old Change, Doctors' Commons, on Wednesday morning, which was attended with great destruction of property.

EXTENSIVE ROBBERY.—Some thieves entered the house of Mr. Filmer, No. 1, Kennington-road, Lambeth, a few mornings ago, and stole from the shop jewellery, value £300. They first got over a wall eight feet high, at the back of the house, and having bored a hole in the shutters with an old knife and part of a chisel (left behind), got into the warehouse at the back of the shop. The man to Mr. Filmer's employ slept at the end of the shop next to the warehouse, and the thieves, to reach the spot where they found the valuables, must have stepped over them. The till was forced open. The property stolen consisted of twelve watches, several pins and several depredations have also been committed in Clerkenwell during the week.

ATTEMPTED SUICIDE.—A servant girl of Mr. Luff, of the Strand, on Monday last took advantage of the temporary absence of her mistress, to abstract a bottle containing strong oil of vitriol from her bed-room, of which poison she drank about an egg-cup full; but repenting immediately afterwards gave information of what she had done; and a surgeon having been called in, he advised her removal to the hospital. The reason assigned for the rash act appears to be, that she was about to leave her situation, and was very uncomfortable in her father's house. She stated to the surgeon that she had long contemplated the act of self-destruction, and if not successful this time would repeat it on a future occasion.

On Wednesday morning, shortly after twelve o'clock, Mr. Fitch, vestry-clerk of St. George's, Southwark, dropped down dead near his own house in Union-street, Borough. Deceased, who was about 60, left home at eleven o'clock apparently in good health, to transact business at the vestry. He had been nearly 20 years vestry-clerk to the parish.

POSTSCRIPT.

Friday Evening.

WINDSOR, THURSDAY.—Prince Albert, accompanied by the Archduke Frederick, hunted with the harriers in the Great Park this morning, attended by Sir E. Bowater, Chevalier Marinovich, Major-General Wemyss, and Mr. Anson. The royal party had excellent sport, killing three hares—the last was a splendid run. Prince Albert, accompanied by the Archduke Frederick, afterwards visited the Prize Cattle Show. The Prince and his Imperial Highness arrived from Windsor in a special train, and after remaining about an hour in the exhibition, left town again for Windsor. The unfavourable state of the weather prevented her Majesty leaving the castle. The Queen had a dinner party. Covers were laid for twenty-nine.

PRIVY COUNCIL.—Summonses for holding a Privy Council at Windsor Castle to-morrow (Saturday) at two o'clock were forwarded this morning to the Cabinet Ministers and other Lords of her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council. As we have before stated, the object of this Council is to appoint a day for the legislature to meet for the dispatch of business. Sir Robert Peel left town to-day, on a visit to her Majesty at Windsor Castle.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE LONDON AND BIRMINGHAM RAILWAY.—A frightful accident happened on Thursday forenoon to the Aylesbury up-train upon the London and Birmingham railroad, which was attended with very serious consequences. It appears that the train had quitted Aylesbury at eleven o'clock, and consisted of four carriages only, namely, one second-class carriage next the tender, then two first-class carriages, and, lastly, another second-class carriage. As it was proceeding down a slight inclination, near Norland church, a village about a mile on the other side of Berkhampstead, and between the latter place and Tring, some of the passengers became aware that all was not right, by hearing the stoker take out the fire from under the engine. The axle-tree had in fact broken, and the stoker, with great presence of mind, took this precautionary step to prevent the boiler from bursting; the next minute the fore wheel flew off, and the engine and tender were thrown off the line and smashed to pieces. The first carriage was hurled from the road, and rolled down the embankment, and the two first-class carriages forced right athwart the rails. The last carriage received but a comparatively slight shock, the two fore wheels only being thrown off the line, and no person within receiving any injury. One of the Company's overlookers, who had been in the first carriage, was, in its descent, thrown out at the window, and left upon the embankment. The stoker was found to have received a severe concussion of the brain; and an old man and woman were found lying with their bodies literally doubled together inside the ill-fated carriage. They were got out with considerable difficulty, and examined by Mr. Hill, a medical gentleman, who was returning to London from Oxford; the heads of both were covered with blood, and on a closer examination he found that they had both received severe lacerations of the scalp. The old man and woman were immediately removed to Northchurch, and the overlooker and stoker to Berkhampstead. The cause of the accident was unquestionably a defect in the iron of which the axle was made; for, on examination, it was at once manifest that, notwithstanding its appearance of strength, it possessed very little, not more than one-fourth of the apparent substance being real. A large hollow, like an air bubble, appeared to have formed from the centre nearly to the edges of the metal. The train, which should have arrived shortly after one, did not reach town until near four o'clock. Intelligence was this afternoon received at the Euston-station of the railway, that Mrs. Bye, the elderly woman above alluded to, this morning breathed her last. She was between sixty and seventy years of age, and her constitution received a shock which was too much for her advanced period of life, although it had at first been hoped she would recover. The other sufferers are all doing well.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH, Friday.—(Before Lord Denman and a Special Jury.)—BAKER V. WILKINSON.—LIBEL. This was an action brought by the plaintiff, High Sheriff of Rutlandshire, against one Mr. Maltby, proprietor of the Leicester Herald, for an alleged libel published in that journal on the 16th of April last. It appeared that the plaintiff was a member of the Walton Agricultural Society, and some disputes having taken place respecting the age and feeding of a steer which plaintiff had exhibited, he was requested to produce his stock book, which he did, but it only contained a few pages. Some meetings took place on the subject at Stamford and Leicester. On the 16th of April, in a notice to correspondents, appeared the article which formed the ground of the present action; the writer stated that he had been in the employ of Mr. Baker, the plaintiff, for the last six years since; that the stock or herd book of that gentleman consisted not of six or seven pages, but about 300 pages. This was the substance of the paragraph complained of. The Solicitor-General and Mr. M. D. Hill were counsel for the plaintiff; Mr. Fitzroy Kelly and Mr. Whitehurst appeared for the defendant. Lord Denman summed up. His lordship said he thought, under the circumstances of the case, it was to be regretted that the present action had been brought; but it was for the jury to say whether or not the plaintiff was entitled to damages. The jury then retired, and, after being in consultation for several hours, returned a verdict for the plaintiff, forty shillings damages.

KENDILLON V. MALTBY, Esq.—This was an action brought by the plaintiff, who had been a police sergeant against the defendant, the police magistrate of Marlborough street Police-court, for slander. The trial arose out of some proceedings which took place at the police-office concerning a night squabble which occurred on plaintiff's beat. The words made use of by defendant were, "I feel myself bound to say, with reference to this charge, and also to one before me a few days since, from the same spot, that I do not believe Sergeant Kendillon on his oath?"—The Solicitor-General, for the defendant, said that as no evidence had been given of malice on the part of Mr. Maltby, as the observations had been uttered by him on the Bench in the execution of his duty as a magistrate, and as there was no evidence of special damage, for the evidence of Mr. Mayne did not go to that extent, he submitted to the Court that there was no case to go to the jury, for the observations had been made by Mr. Maltby in his judicial capacity in giving judgment in a case before him, and he was entitled to the protection of the Act of Parliament.—Lord Denman said that, in his opinion, no judge was entitled to any protection for uttering slander, and if he uttered it either during a case or beside a case, he must be held responsible; but in this case it appeared to him that Mr. Maltby was acting in some measure both as judge and jury, and in the exercise of his discretion as a magistrate, having to form an opinion of the conduct of the officers under him, it appeared to the Court that Mr. Maltby was bound to state, as his reason for dismissing the case, that he did not believe the officer on his oath if such was really the case, and he was also bound to make that observation in the hearing of the superintendent, in order that information might be conveyed to the Commissioners. Under these circumstances, he thought plaintiff could not maintain his action without having express proof of malice. None such had been given, and therefore there was no case to go to the jury.—Postponed.

FOREIGN.

We have received the Paris papers of Wednesday. They contain very little news. The French government was still without official intelligence from Barcelona, which was accounted for by the previously-assigned reason of defiance for preventing the transmission of despatches by the telegraphs.

The accounts from Barcelona received in Paris on Wednesday are dated the 2d inst. five o'clock P.M. The Regent, who since had his head-quarters at Sarria, had not entered the city, nor had he admitted to an audience any of the deputations sent to him by the revolters. Nothing but an unconditional surrender would satisfy the Regent, who had notified to the inhabitants that, if this injunction was not complied with in the course of that evening, the bombardment would commence on the morning of the 3d.

The vessel the Formidable has been set afloat by the Grenadi and Etna steamers. The Formidable is now in the roads at anchor, in company with the Rodney.

SMITHFIELD CLUB PRIZE CATTLE SHOW.

To those persons who are aware of the vast improvement which has been made in the breed of live stock during the last half century the importance of an association established on the principle of the Smithfield Club will be self-evident. This society, which now includes within its members the names of all the leading agriculturists in the kingdom, from the peer to the commoner, was originated in the year 1798, by a few noblemen and gentlemen who at that period took a deep interest in the matter. Among the names first enrolled were Francis Duke of Bedford, the late Lord Somerville, the late Earl of Leicester (Mr. Coke, of Norfolk), Sir J. Sebright, Thomas Gibbs, Esq., the Duke of Manchester, and Mr. Mellish; the projector being the celebrated Mr. Wilks, well known as a leading agriculturist of that day.

The design of the society was to offer premiums for the best specimens of stock fed in England, with a view to "the supply of the cattle markets of Smithfield and other places with the cheapest and best meat. The exhibitions were originally held twice in each year—in the summer show at the seat of the Duke of Bedford, Woburn Abbey, and the Christmas exhibition in London. A spring show in connection with the society, but under the especial direction of Lord Somerville, was also held in London at this time.

The club continued to progress satisfactorily for many years; but, through the mismanagement of one of the officials a few years since, its resources were much deteriorated, and the society sustained a severe shock. Through the liberality of the Duke of Richmond and Earl Spencer it was, however, relieved from the embarrassment, and, under improved arrangements, now stands pre-eminent among the agricultural associations in the kingdom, extending its influence through every county in Great Britain.

The removal of the Smithfield Show from the dirty yard in Goswell-street—in which for so many years it was a nuisance—to the space beneath the Baker-street Bazaar, where there is ample accommodation and every facility for the numerous classes of oxen, sheep, and pigs, has been a great step towards an improvement in the public knowledge of all that relates to the breeding and fattening of the animals on which the public subsist. There is now a better understanding on these subjects than there was a few years ago, and people do not go so much to stare at a fat bullock or a pathetic pig as a wonder, as to form a correct notion of the value of the system by which oxen, pigs, and sheep are brought to the state of perfection—to use the term by courtesy—which they exhibit. There is every facility afforded at the Baker-street Bazaar for the public to see and judge for themselves, and as everything is conducted in the best manner at this exhibition, and the place is as clean and convenient as the most fastidious can desire (as may be seen by reference to the above sketch), it is almost a duty for all to go and see the result of the industry of British farmers, breeders, and agriculturists, now that so much has been said about tariffs, corn-laws, and so forth.

The Cattle Show this year exceeded in the appearance of the specimens, both of oxen and sheep, the show of last year. There are this year finer (that is to say, larger and fatter) oxen than any which were then exhibited. We believe last year there was a sort of murrain amongst the kine, from which this year they have been exempt. The sheep also are finer than last year; some of the short-wools, bred by the Dukes of Bedford, Richmond, and Norfolk, are particularly good: all that is desirable in breeding sheep has been obtained—viz., fine wool, little bone, and plenty of flesh. The pigs shown are, as usual, of the fattest description, and, to those who delight in the development of hog's lard, perfect pictures of swinish obesity. There are no specimens of foreign oxen or sheep in this show, which is not, perhaps, to be wondered at. Foreign importers of cattle do not, as yet, understand the taste of the animal amateurs of this country, and consequently have not yet made preparations to compete with the native breeders. The short-horned oxen, taken generally, show that great pains have been taken by the breeders to improve the stock, and bring into the market a class of beasts which shall at the same time unite such symmetry of form as is compatible with their nature, with such flesh upon their bones as shall make it worth the while of the farmer, the butcher, and the consumer to breed, buy, and sell them. The animals this year, though perhaps exceeding in weight those which have been shown at many previous "shows" do not appear so overladen with fat—it is now of the sheep and oxen that we speak—as those which have heretofore been exhibited. There is more proportion of flesh or meat, and consequently there is less waste both to the agriculturist and the consumer.

And the mode in which the judges are appointed precludes the possibility of unfair dealing or favouritism. The stewards of the club (six in number) meet on the morning of the day previous to the exhibition, and from among the members of the society present one judge is selected by each, and their duties immediately commence. The class and character of each animal is read over to the judges by the secretary, but the owners' names are carefully concealed until after the award is made

GOLD MEDAL.—FIRST PRIZE.

The reverse of the medal contains the name of the gainer of the prize, and the words "Smithfield Club."

At an early hour on Tuesday, the stewards selected the following gentlemen as the judges —

For Cattle and Long-woolled Sheep—Mr. Hewit, Dodford, near Weedon, Northamptonshire; Mr. Druce, Ensham, Oxfordshire; Mr. Buckley, Normanton Hill, Loughborough.

For Short-woolled Sheep and Pigs—Mr. W. Arckoll, of Langley, near Eastbourne; Mr. R. Emery, of Hurston-place, Brighton; Mr. John King, of Devonshire-place, Brighton.

The several awards having been made and entered on the books by the honorable secretary Mr. Humphrey Gibbs, were read over and confirmed at a meeting of the members held in the Bazaar on Wednesday morning, after which the exhibition opened to the public.

By the kind permission of the stewards we are enabled to present our readers with accurate delineations of the animals which obtained the highest notice of the society.

The first in importance, as having gained the gold medal awarded to the best beast in all the classes in addition to a prize of £20 and a silver medal to the breeder, is a remarkably fine cow, bred by Sir Charles Tempest, Bart., of Broughton-hall, Yorkshire. She was purchased of that gentleman with three others, in 1836, by Mr. William Maxwell of Everingham Park, near Pocklington, in the same county, and, after supplying milk to his dairy for many months, was stalled for feeding in February last. She obtained the first prize at the York meeting in August last, and is admitted on all hands to be one of the finest short-horns in the kingdom. Her sister beast was recently sold to Sir Anthony Bailer for 150 guineas. She is 6 years and 8 months old, and was fed on grass, hay, barley meal, cake, Swedes, and mangold wurtzel. It is not a little remarkable that the district of the county of York in which this animal was bred is one of the most barren in the kingdom. The animal travelled 240 miles to the show, chiefly by the railway.

The next subject is an ox of the Hereford breed, aged only 3 years and 11 months. This animal was bred by Mr. Thomas Meire, of Count Arbour, near Shrewsbury, and fed by that gentleman on grass, hay, turnips, carrots, grains, barley meal, and oil-cake. The sire of this beast, which was also bred by Mr. Meire, is an extraordinary animal, and at the Shrewsbury cattle show in October last no less than five prizes were carried off by his progeny. Another ox in the present exhibition by the same sire (No. 61), belonging to Mr. Bouverie, of Delapre Abbey, near Northampton, also secures a prize of £10 and a silver medal.

Our third engraving represents Lord Spencer's short-horned ox. Although no prize was awarded by the judges to this animal, it being only commended, we give a sketch of it, as well out of respect to the noble breeder as from the great size and fine appearance it presents. It, however, does not possess, in an eminent degree, those fine points of breeding which alone entitled the cattle exhibited to the premiums awarded by the Society.

The varieties of sheep were more than usually numerous, and the chief prizes were obtained by Mr. Grantham, of Stonebam, near Lewes. A prize of £20 with a silver medal was awarded to one pen of South Down wethers, 20 months old, bred by this gentleman, and the gold medal for the best pen of short-woolled sheep was also gained by him. The sheep fed by the Duke of Richmond at Goodwood, were greatly admired, and it was the opinion of several graziers that none in the yard surpassed them. Mr. Wm. Sandy, of Holme, Pierrepoint, near Nottingham, obtained the gold medal and a prize of £20 for the best pen of long wooled sheep.

A list of the more important prizes is annexed:—

OXEN.

CLASS I.—Oxen or steers, of any breed, under five years of age, without restriction as to feeding, yet the kind or kinds of food must be certified.

No. 1—The Right Hon. Earl Spencer, of Althorp Park, near Northampton, a 4 years and 9 months old short-horned ox, bred by his lordship, and fed on oil-cake, turnips, mangold-wurtzel, hay, and bean-meal. Travelled to the show 10 miles by van, and 60 miles by railway.—Commended.

No. 11—Mr. William Woodward, of Breedon Norton, near Tewkesbury, a 4 years and 6 months old improved short-horned ox, bred by himself, and fed on hay, cabbage, Swedish turnips, barley-meal, pea-meal, grass, green clover, and linseed-cake. Travelled to the show by van 5 miles, and by railway 143 miles. Third prize, £10.

No. 18—Mr. R. W. Baker, of Cottesmore, near Stamford, a 3 years and 9 months old short-horned steer, bred by himself, and fed on oil-cake, bean-flour, oat-meal, and vegetables. Travelled to the show by van 30 miles, and by railway 105 miles. The second prize of £15.

MR. T. L. MEIRE'S 3 YEARS AND 11½ MONTHS OLD HEREFORD OX.

No. 20—Mr. Thomas L. Meire, of Count Arbor, near Shrewsbury, a 3 years and 11½ months old Hereford ox, bred by himself, and fed on grass, hay, turnips, carrots, grains, barley, and pea-meal, and oil-cake. Travelled to the show on foot three miles, by cart seven miles, by boat 50 miles, and by railway 100 miles. The first prize of £30, and silver medal, as the breeder.

CLASS II.—Oxen or steers, of any breed, under 6 years of age, weight 90 stone and upwards, that shall not have had cake, corn, meal, seeds, grains, or distillers' wash, during 12 months previous to the 1st of August, 1842.

No. 32—Mr. Samuel Bennett, of Bickerings-park, near Woburn, a 4 years and 9 months old improved short-horned ox, bred by himself, and fed on 16 bushels of bean-meal, 650 lbs. of cake, turnips, carrots, and mangold-wurtzel. Travelled to the show on foot 1 mile, and by waggon and railway 45 miles. The second prize of £20.

No. 35—Sir William Wake, Bart., of Courteen-hall, near Northampton, a 4 years and 10 months old Hereford ox, bred by Mr. Perry, of Monkland, near Leominster, and fed on 1200 lbs. of cake, 2 bushels of bean-meal, grass, hay, turnips, and mangold-wurtzel. Travelled to the show by railway 60 miles. The first prize of £30, and silver medal to the breeder.

No. 41—Mr. John Shugsby, of Morton-hall, near Manchester, a 4 years and 9 months old cross Ayrshire ox, bred by Mr. Stirling, of Keir, near Dunblane, and fed on 441 lbs. of cake, 253 lbs. of corn, and grass. Travelled to the show on foot 3½ miles, and by railway 210 miles. The third prize of £10.

CLASS III.—Oxen or steers, of any breed, under 5 years of age, under 100 stone and above 70 stone weight, that shall not have had cake, corn, meal, seeds, grains, or distillers' wash, during 12 months previous to the 1st of August, 1842.

No. 47—Mr. Chamberlain, of Desford, near Leicester, a 4 years and 8 months old Hereford ox, bred by himself, and fed on 600 lbs. of cake, 330 lbs. of pea-meal, grass, hay, and green vegetables. Travelled to the show on foot 10 miles, and by railway 102 miles. The second prize of £10.

No. 50—Mr. John Manning, of Harpole, near Northampton, a 4 years and 6 months old Hereford steer, bred by Mr. Josiah Dean, of Abbey Dare, Herefordshire, and fed on 800 lbs. of cake, 4 bushels of bean-meal, grass, hay, and turnips; travelled to the show on foot 7 miles, and by railway 70 miles. The first prize of £15.

CLASS IV.—Oxen or steers, of any breed, not exceeding 4 years of age, under 85 stone weight, that shall not have had cake, corn, meal, seeds, grains, or distillers' wash, during 12 months previous to the 1st of August, 1842.

MR. THOMAS UMBLE'S TWENTY

ONE MONTHS OLD LONG WOOLLED WETHERS.

NEWSPAPER

No. 56—Mr. George Payne, of Milton Keynes, near Newport Pagnell, a 3 years and 6 months old Hereford steer, bred by Mr. Downes, of Medley-park, near Ludlow, Shropshire, and fed on 250 lbs. of cake, hay, and Swedes. Travelled to the show on foot six miles, and by railway 48 miles. The second prize of £5.

No 61—Mr. E. Bouverie, of Delapre Abbey, near Northampton, a 3 years and 7 months old Hereford steer, bred by Mr. John Meare, of Uchington, and fed on 712 lbs. of cake, 2 bushels of oats in meal, grass, hay, mangold wurtzel, and Swedes. Travelled to the show by van 4 miles, and by railway 60 miles. The first prize of £10.

CLASS V. Oxen or steers any of horned, under 4½ years of age, under 80 stone weight, without restrictions as to feeding, yet the kind or kinds of food must be specified.

No. 67 Mr. Thomas Bridge, of Battsbury, near Ingatestone, a 3 years and 7 months old Hereford steer, bred by Mr. Hall, and fed on grass, lucerne, Swedes, oil cake, and a little bean and barley meal. Travelled to the show by van 26 miles.

CLASS VI.—Oxen or steers of the Scotch or Welsh breed, of any age, above 70 stone weight, that shall not have had cake, corn, meal, seeds, grains, or distillers' wash during 12 months previous to the 1st of August, 1842.

EARL SPENCER'S 4 YEARS AND 9 MONTHS OLD SHORT HORNED OX.

No. 71—Mr. John Manning, of Harpole, near Northampton, an upwards of 3 years old Scotch ox, fed on grass, turnips, 800 lbs. of cake, and 3 bushels of bean-meal. Travelled to the show on foot 7 miles, and by railway 70 miles. The first prize of £10.

CLASS VII.—Oxen or steers of the Scotch or Welsh breed, of any age, under 70 stone weight, that shall not have had cake, corn, meal, seeds, grains, or distillers' wash, during 12 months previous to the 1st of August, 1842.

Withheld for want of merit.

COWS.

CLASS VIII.—Fattened cows or heifers, under 5 years of age. Freemartins and spayed heifers are not qualified.

No. 74—Mr. George Ellis, of Hatfield Peverell, near Witham, a 3 year and 6 months old Hereford heifer, bred by himself, and fed on mangold wurtzel, Swedes, tare-meal, and hay. Travelled to the show by van 40 miles. The second prize of £10.

No. 76—Mr. Robert Burgess, of Cotgrove-place, near Nottingham, a 4 years and 3 months old Durham heifer, bred by himself, and fed on grass, oil-cake, turnips, cabbages, and bean-flour. Travelled to the show 6 miles, and by railway 126 miles. The third prize of £5.

No. 77—Sir George Phillips, Bart., of Weston-house, Chipping-Norton, a 4 years and 2 months old cross-bred heifer (Scotch and Durham), bred by himself, and fed on Swedes, common turnips, cake, linseed, bean and barley flour. Travelled to the show by van 40 miles, and by railway 56 miles. The first prize of £20.

CLASS IX.—Fattened cows, of 5 years old and upwards. Freemartins and spayed heifers are not qualified.

No. 79—The Right Hon. Earl Spencer, of Wiseton, near Bawtry, a 7 years and 7 months old Durham cow, bred by his lordship, and fed on hay, Swedes, barley and bean meal, and oil cake. Travelled to the show by van 22 miles, and by railway 180 miles. The second prize of £5.

No. 82—Mr. William C. Maxwell, of Everingham-park, near Pocklington, a 6 years and 8 months old short-horned cow, bred by Sir Charles R. Tempest, Bart., of Broughton-hall, Skipton, and fed on grass, hay, bean and barley meal, cake, Swedes, and mangold-wurtzel. Travelled to the show by van 16 miles, and by railway 219 miles. The first prize of £20, and silver medal as the breeder; and gold medal, as the best beast in any of the classes.

CLASS X.—Fattened cows, of 5 years old and upwards, that shall have had at least two live calves at separate births.

No. 86—Mr. W. Harbridge, of Brookend-house, near Morton in Marsh, a 12 years and 8 months old long-horned cow, bred by himself, and fed on hay, barley and bean meal, and oil-cake. Travelled to the show by van 35 miles, and by railway 50 miles. The second prize of £5.

No. 88—The Right Hon. the Earl of Hardwick, of Wimpole, a 10 years and 11 months old Durham cow, bred by his lordship, and fed on oil-cake, bean-meal, mangold wurtzel, and hay. Travelled to the show by van 46 miles. The first prize of £15.

EXTRA STOCK.—CATTLE.

No. 97—Mr. James Watson, of Waldby, near South Cave, a 3 years and 9 months old short-horned ox, bred by himself, and fed on linseed-cake and bean-meal. Travelled to the show by railway 241 miles. Silver medal.

SHEEP.

CLASS XI.—Long-woolled fat wether sheep, 1 year old, that have never had cake, corn, meal, seeds, or pulse.

No. 101 Mr. T. Twitchell, of Willington, near Bedford, a pen of Leicester wethers, 20 months old, bred by himself. Second prize of £5.

No. 107—Mr. Thomas Umbers, of Wappenbury, near Leamington, a pen of long-woolled wethers, 21 months old, bred by himself. The first prize of £20, and silver medal as the breeder.

EARL RADNOR'S, 34 WEEKS OLD COLESHILL PIG

CLASS XII.—Long-woolled fat wether sheep, 1 year old, under 8 stone weight, that have never had cake, corn, meal, seeds, or pulse.

No. 114—Mr. Thomas Umbers, of Wappenbury, near Leamington Spa, a pen of long-woolled wethers, 21 months old, bred by himself. The prize of £10, and silver medal as the breeder.

CLASS XIII.—Long-woolled fat wether sheep, 1 year old, without restrictions as to feeding.

No. 115—Mr. William Sandy, of Holme Pierrepoint, near Nottingham, a pen of Leicester wethers, 21 months old, bred by himself. The first prize of £20, and the gold medal.

No. 126—His Grace the Duke of Bedford, of Woburn Abbey, a pen of Leicester wethers, 20 months old, bred by his grace. The second prize of £5.

EXTRA STOCK.—LONG-WOOLLED SHEEP.

No. 134—Mr. J. S. Burgess, of Holme Pierrepoint, a long-woolled wether, about 32 months old, bred by himself. The silver medal.

CLASS XIV.—Short-woolled fat wether sheep, 1 year old, without restrictions as to feeding.

No. 146 Mr. Grantham, of Stoneham, near Lewes, a pen of South-down wethers, 20 months old, bred by himself. The first prize of £20.

No. 147—Mr. Samuel Webb, of Babraham, near Cambridge, a pen of South-down wethers, 20 months old, bred by himself. The second prize of £5.

CLASS XV.—Short-woolled fat wether sheep, 1 year old, under 8 stone weight, without restrictions as to feeding.

No. 152—Mr. Samuel Webb, of Babraham, near Cambridge, a pen of South-down wethers, 20 months old, bred by himself. The prize of £10.

CLASS XVI.—Short-woolled fat wether sheep, 2 years old, without restrictions as to feeding.

No. 157—His Grace the Duke of Richmond, of Goodwood-park, a pen of South-Down wethers, 32 months old, bred by his Grace — Highly Commended.

No. 159—Mr. Grantham, of Stoneham, near Lewes, a pen of South-down Wethers, 32 months old, bred by himself. The first prize of £20.

No. 160—Mr. Samuel Webb, of Babraham, near Cambridge, a pen of South down wethers, 32 months old, bred by himself. The second prize of £5.

EXTRA STOCK.—SHORT-WOOLLED SHEEP.

No. 171—Mr. E. G. Barnard, M.P., of Gosfield-hall, near Halstead, a South-down wether, 32 months old, bred by himself. The silver medal.

DUKE OF RICHMOND'S 32 MONTHS OLD SOUTHDOWN WETHER.

PIGS.

CLASS XVII.—Pigs of any breed.

No. 173—Mr. W. Hobman, of Ewell, near Epsom, a pen of Neapolitan pigs, 26 weeks old, bred by himself, and fed on peas and fine middlings (no milk). The second prize of £5.

No. 179—Mr. John Buckley, of Normanton-hill, a pen of cross Warwickshire and Neapolitan pigs, 31 weeks and 3 days old, bred by himself, and fed on barley-meal and a little bean-meal. The first prize of £10.

EXTRA STOCK.—PIGS.

No. 183—Mr. William Jarrett, of 77, Ratcliffe-highway, an Essex pig, 33 weeks old, bred by himself, and fed on fine middlings, barley-meal and peas—brought up by hand. The silver medal.

No. 188—The Right Hon. the Earl of Radnor, of Coleshil, near Farringdon, a Coleshill pig, 34 weeks old, bred by his lordship, and fed on meal and whey.—Highly Commended.

The total amount of money expended in prizes exceeds 400 guineas.

The show is considered to be the best since 1839, in which year some very remarkable animals were exhibited. In the two classes which include Scotch and Irish oxen there appears to have been less competition than usual, and in one of them both prizes are withheld through want of merit.

In pursuance of a resolution passed at the last annual meeting, a silver medal will be awarded to the butcher who expends the largest sum of money in the purchase of stock exhibited.

The agricultural implements included many new inventions for the improvement of land, and some extraordinary vegetable productions are exhibited by Messrs. Gibbs and Co., of Half-moon-street.

The arrangements of the exhibition have been made under the superintendence of Mr. Humphrey Gibbs, the honorary secretary to the club, and reflect much credit on that gentleman's attention and assiduity.

The members of the club dined together on Friday at the Freemason's Tavern, Great Queen-street; Earl Spencer in the chair. A very large assemblage of agriculturists were present, and the festivities were prolonged to a late hour.

COUNTRY NEWS.

BERKSHIRE.—A fire, no doubt the work of an incendiary, broke out at ten o'clock on Thursday morning, the 1st instant, on the premises of the Rev. A. B. Townsend, rector of Easthampstead. It was happily extinguished, without doing much injury, by the exertions of the farm labourers and the neighbours, who rendered the most prompt assistance. One man is taken up on strong suspicion —he is a parishioner of Easthampstead, and seventy-six years of age.

BIRMINGHAM.—We understand that a grand dress ball on a magnificent scale is about to be given in the Town Hall at Birmingham, in celebration of the glorious triumphs of British valour in the east; the proceeds to be devoted towards the support of that excellent charity the Queen's Hospital in that town.

CHEPSTOW.—DREADFUL MURDER.—On Saturday the 3d inst., a most atrocious murder was committed on the person of an unmarried female, aged 36, named Moxley, who resided with her father at a farm called Pondesham, about a mile from the village of St. Owen's, Monmouthshire, and two miles from this town. The villain entered the house while the woman was engaged in her domestic duties, and struck her with the hedge-stake on the back of the head. The blow having failed to stun the deceased, she appears to have struggled with the murderer, as it is evident that she had moved about the room previously to the villain accomplishing his purpose in her final destruction. The murderer, who was arrested the next day, had been married the preceding Sunday

DOVER.—A correspondent writes that the great iron steam chimney or breakwater has been towed to its destination. It is secured by four of the most Brobdignag anchors ever beheld. Two steamers conveyed the apparatus to the appointed spot some time before daylight on Tuesday, but it was not until four o'clock in the afternoon that the gun fired to announce that the ceremony of dropping the last anchor had taken place. About fifty men were on board the punt that conveyed the anchors. So constantly were the services of the steam-tugs demanded, that the appearance from the shore was as if the two packets were dancing a pas de deux. The sea was very calm and greatly in favour of the operations throughout the day.

LEWES.—LEWES FAT STOCK SHOW. This annual exhibition took place on Tuesday at Lewes, but the attendance of company and the supply of stock was much more limited than usual, which may be attributed to the fact of several of the Sussex breeders having sent their stock to Smithfield. Above forty gentlemen, farmers, &c., dined together at the Star Inn. W. Thomson, Esq., presided, and was supported by George Darby, Esq., M.P., J. V. Shelley, Esq., H. Blackman, Esq., J. Ellman, Esq., &c.

LINCOLNSHIRE.—Intelligence has reached town of two dreadful incendiary fires having taken place on the property of the Duke of Bedford in the fens of Lincolnshire. The particulars of the outrages are not mentioned, but it is said that rickyards to a large amount have been destroyed.

LIVERPOOL.—MURDER ON THE HIGH SEAS.—Considerable sensation was created at Liverpool in the early part of the week by the circulation of a report that Philip Keel, a man of colour, and the cook on board the barque Clydesdale, of Greenock, William Renfrew master, had been strangled to death by the chief mate and five others of the crew of that vessel, which arrived in that port from Bombay on Friday night week. It appeared that the deceased, who was a native of Jamaica, had been indisposed and confined to his bed in the forecastle since Sunday week, and that on the morning of Wednesday, when the vessel was about twenty miles on this side of Tuskar, the chief mate proceeded down below, ordered the unfortunate man to get breakfast ready, and charged him with skulking from his duty. The deceased remonstrated as well as his illness would permit him, and protested that he was not a skulker, whereupon the mate said that if he did not get on deck directly such tricks would be put down the hatchway and he would be "housed" out (an expression in general use among mariners to signify that compulsion would be used). One of the hands said that if a rope's end were put round the neck of the deceased he would hoist the fellow out, and accordingly a two-inch rope was delivered into the forecastle, which another of the hands adjusted round the man's neck, and the party or parties on deck having applied their strength to the end of the rope, the deceased was, in this barbarous manner, hoisted out of his hammock in his shirt and trousers, and dragged a distance of about four feet by the neck. Here he lay for a moment extended upon a chest, when the carpenter, who had been roused from his sleep by the noise, rushed from his hammock and called out to the parties on deck to desist, as they were choking the man. This order not being complied with, the carpenter slipped it off the neck and on to the body of the deceased, and in this manner the latter was hoisted upon deck, where he was placed and kept in a recumbent posture for about two hours; but, as he never spoke, and as his mouth became fixed and his eyes distended and his eyes closed, there is every reason to believe that he was strangled to death in the manner stated, immediately before or after he had been hoisted through the hatchway. At all events, he was dead when removed back to the forecastle; and, from the testimony of the medical gentleman who made a post mortem examination of the body, little doubt would seem to exist that death had been caused by suffocation. These are the short facts of the case. The particulars were fully and minutely detailed at the police-office before Mr. Rushton, the stipendiary magistrate, and a densely-crowded court. The names of the prisoners are—John Bowman Randles, David Barnes, James M'Donald, George Dean, George Saul, and John Roberts, all of whom are white men, and we regret, for the sake of our country and of humanity, to be given to understand, natives of England. They were severally defended by Mr. Wardle, a solicitor. At the close of the inquiry Mr. Rushton ordered the prisoner Roberts to be discharged, as there was no evidence affecting him in the case. Mr. Rushton then directed the five prisoners (who had neither witnesses to call, nor remarks to offer in their defence) to be committed to prison for the present, and sent for trial on the capital charge at the next sitting of the Central Criminal Court.

THE COLLISION IN THE RIVER MERSEY.—A coroner's inquest was held upon John Brown, the seaman who was killed by the collision in the Mersey. Several witnesses having been examined, the coroner adjourned the inquest until Monday, the 12th inst., in order that he might communicate with Sir J. Graham in the interim, and thus ascertain whether the Mersey was to be considered as within the borough of Liverpool, and whether his jurisdiction extended to that part of the river where the cause of death occurred. He said that, since the late decision of Lord Denman on this subject, it became the more necessary to have the question of jurisdiction clearly set at rest.

NEWCASTLE.—THE BURGLARY AND ATTEMPTED MURDER.—Miss Robinson has fully identified one of the parties, of whose apprehension we have already given an account. She knows him by his eyes, mouth, and whiskers, which were not, it seems, so much blackened as the rest of his face. It is quite clear that the parties were prepared to commit murder in order to secure their object, and that Miss Robinson's life was saved entirely through the fortunate circumstance of the servant girl having been aroused.

SALISBURY.—The following melancholy accident took place in this neighbourhood last week. On Thursday morning the Rev. Mr. Montgomery left Wilton House with Earl Bruce, for the purpose of looking over a new church at Bishopstone. During the preceding week the eastern portion had been covered in with a stone vault, and the construction had been carefully examined by the architect, and by persons connected with the works, and they unanimously considered it to be perfectly secure. At half-past one o'clock, Mr. Montgomery accompanied by Earl Bruce, the Rev. Mr. Ward, his nephew, Mr. Gabriel, Mr. Ferry, the architect, the clerk of the works, and the contractor, entered to inspect the new church, from which the centres of the arches had been removed the same morning. They had not advanced many paces, when a crack was heard, and the arch fell in to the extent of about eight feet of the whole width of the nave. The Rev. Mr. Ward escaped by springing into one of the side aisles, and Mr. Gabriel secured himself in the other; but Mr. Montgomery unhappily moved towards the centre, and was completely covered by the falling mass, and life was immediately extinct. Independently of fractures of the skull, both in the forehead and at the base, there was a compound fracture of the left thigh, and the right arm was broken close to the elbow. The estimated weight of the stone which fell is three tons. An inquest has been held on the body, and a verdict of "Accidental death" returned.

STOCKPORT.—It is said that parties are in treaty for the Mersey Mills, Heaton-lane, and the Higher Hillgate Mills (both of which are filled with machinery), with a view of commencing work. Both these establishments have been closed many months, the former having been last worked by Mr. Carr, and the latter by Messrs. Lanes, and they jointly employed nearly 2000 hands. We hope that the expectations of parties may be realised, as the re-opening of these mills would find employment for so many destitute operatives of this long-distressed borough. We believe that arrangements are also in progress for the re-opening of the extensive cotton manufactory at Gorton in this neighbourhood.

SUSSEX.—We are sorry to observe that incendiary fires still prevail in many parts of the country. A circular has been sent, at the instigation of the insurance offices, to the proprietors of journals, requesting that they will not give prominent publicity to these calamitous events, as being calculated, they think, to suggest incendiarism as a means of revenge, where otherwise it would not be resorted to.

IRELAND.

Mrs. Dickenson, the amiable widow of the late Bishop of Meath, lies dangerously ill of fever, at her house in Upper Leeson-street, Dublin.

The Earl of Lucan has left Castlebar for London, and the Countess and family follow immediately, thus quitting a neighbourhood where his lordship has been so scurvily used.—Limerick Chronicle. [This paragraph refers to the extraordinary row in the court-house of Castlebar, between Lord Lucan and Mr. St. Clair O'Malley; but certainly the Limerick Chronicle is not at all warranted in asserting that his lordship had been "scurvily used" in the neighbourhood. The quarrel was entirely confined to himself and Mr. O'Malley, and they used very hard names towards each other. It is decided that the Government is making any official inquiry on the subject.]

The Rev. Theobald Mathew is to visit Jersey and Guernsey, by invitation, immediately after Easter.

The Irish Stamp-office received on Thursday £740 probate-duty, on the will of the late Bishop of Cashel.

DEATH OF THE COUNTESS OF HOWTH.—The Countess of Howth died on Monday last at half past two o'clock, after an illness of but three days, leaving her husband, the Earl of Howth, and four children, to deplore her loss. Her ladyship was daughter of the late Earl, and sister of the present Marquis of Clanricarde. She was married to Lord Howth in January, 1826. One of her younger children was attacked with measles a few days ago, and while attending upon it with a fond mother's care she caught the disease of which she died so suddenly.

We regret to announce the perpetration of another appalling murder in the county of Tipperary, which took place last week, when a man named Michael Hanly was barbarously and inhumanly butchered at his own fireside in the presence of his wife, by a miscreant who obtained an entrance on the pretence of inquiring his way to a neighbouring village. It is said that Hanly met his dreadful fate on account of land which he took from Mr. White, of Green Hall, and from which some refractory tenants had been ejected. A reward of £100 has been offered by Government for the apprehension of the murderer.

DEANERY OF DROMORE.—His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland has been pleased to confer the deanery of Dromore, vacant since the death of the very Rev. James Mahon, upon the Rev. Holt Waring, at the urgent request of the chapter and clergy of the diocese.

STEAM-BOAT COLLISION.—Another accident, which was nigh being attended with disastrous consequences, took place at the Dublin bar late on Friday night or early on Saturday morning. It appeared that the Devonshire steamer met the Eclipse steam-boat, from Strangford to Wexford, and a fearful collision took place between them. The passengers fortunately escaped without any accident occurring to them. It is not known what injury may have been done to the Devonshire, but it is supposed to be trifling, as she was not retarded on her voyage. Both vessels had lights up when the accident occurred.

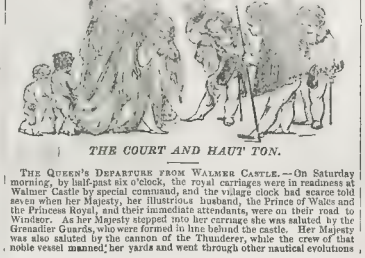
OH 'TIS LOVE.—The love affair that has appeared this week in the papers will afford something to do for the bar. The gallant Capt. G—— came over from Chatham, at the desire of Miss H——, to be married. The dresses were made up, and the hour fixed, when the fair one gave the captain the slip, and went off with an old flame, a Mr. F——, whom her friends had discarded. It appears that her father left her £50,000 fortune. It is said that Captain G—— is about to institute a suit for breach of promise against Miss H——. There is a report in Dublin that Miss H—— is still an unmarried lady, which some believe to have been originated for the purpose of disarming Captain G——'s law proceedings of some of their terrors. Where she was married—if married at all—cannot be ascertained by the most inquisitive quidnunc, while Mr. F—— thanks his friends for wishing him joy and happiness with his bride. The distressingly mysterious and very unpleasant not to be able to satisfy the public curiosity on this interesting little romance in real life. The Globe says that the only captain quartered at Chatham whose name begins with a "G," is Captain Gosling, but we think there must be some mistake here.

SCOTLAND.

THE CHINA TRADE.—As one of many instances of the improvement of business in Glasgow, a gentleman informs us that he saw one house where little business had been done for months close a single transaction of £10,000 in power-loom goods for the China market; and these having still to go through the printing process at home will yet afford some work to Glasgow hands.

INCOME-TAX.—A special meeting of the Merchant Company took place at Edinburgh last week, for the purpose of considering the propriety of petitioning Parliament to abolish the Income-tax on the 5th of April next, in respect of the advantages arising from our recent successes in India and China. Mr. Cadell moved a resolution, "that petitions be presented to Parliament to abolish the tax on the 5th of April next." It was also proposed, "that the Treasury should be memorialised as well as the Parliament petitioned." On a division, the resolutions of Mr. Cadell were carried by an overwhelming majority, only four having voted for the amendment.

ELECTION OF MEMBER FOR BUTESHIRE.—The Hon. James Stuart Wortley was elected M.P. for Buteshire, on Thursday last, without opposition, in the room of Sir Wm. Rae, late Lord Advocate for Scotland.



THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE QUEEN'S DEPARTURE FROM WALMER CASTLE.—On Saturday morning, by half-past six o'clock, the royal carriages were in readiness at Walmer Castle by special command, and the village clock had scarce told seven when her Majesty, her illustrious husband, the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal, and their immediate attendants, were on their road to Windsor. As her Majesty stepped into her carriage she was saluted by the Grenadier Guards, who were formed in line behind the castle. Her Majesty was also saluted by the cannon of the Thunderer, while the crew of that noble vessel manned her yards and went through other nautical evolutions complimentary to the Sovereign. Two outriders in scarlet liveries preceded the royal carriages, and a detachment of the 7th Hussars formed the escort. The morning was delightfully fine, and the Queen and Prince Albert seemed highly to enjoy the scene. They were observed to look back repeatedly with apparent delight on the Downs as they passed on. The royal cortège reached Canterbury at [illegible] where [illegible] Majesty partook of refreshments. At Ashford [illegible] horses, being also in readiness, were attached to the royal carriages, and the journey was continued by the Great Western Railway as far as Reading, where the royal party arrived at twenty minutes before one o'clock. Her Majesty and Prince Albert were received by the [illegible] and the local authorities, and the royal party were conducted to the [illegible], where the regal repast was partaken of. The royal carriages attached to the [illegible] horses were in readiness, and the journey was continued to Windsor Castle, which was reached by the [illegible] at twenty minutes past four. At Windsor her Majesty was received with a hearty welcome home from the loyal inhabitants of that place. With the exception of her Majesty's immediate suite, the royal establishment proceeded to Windsor via Dover, Folkestone, Sandgate, Hythe, &c., to Ashford, where they took the South-Eastern Railway to New Cross, thence to the Paddington station of the Great Western Railway, by which they proceeded to Windsor

WINDSOR, Sunday.—The Rev. W. Canning officiated this morning in performing divine service in the private chapel of the castle. Her Majesty and Prince Albert and the royal suite attended. Her Majesty, who, we are happy to state, arrived quite well, walked for some time with Prince Albert in the private grounds of the Home Park in the afternoon.

MONDAY.—This morning Prince Albert rode out on horseback, attended by Sir Edward Bowater.—The Queen and Prince Albert walked in the Home Park and the Slopes for some time.—The Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal were taken airings, accompanied by Lady Lyttelton. Sir H. Wheatley arrived at the castle.—The royal circle at the castle this evening included the Duchess of Kent, Lady C. Dundas, and the Rev. Wm. Canning.

TUESDAY.—His Imperial Highness the Archduke Frederick of Austria arrived at the castle on a visit to her Majesty, attended by his suite. Earl Delawarr, Viscount Sydney, the Earl of Liverpool, and the Earl of Aberdeen, arrived at the Castle in the course of the day on a visit to the Queen. Her Majesty and Prince Albert enjoyed their usual morning walk; and in the afternoon the Prince rode out on horseback into the Great Park, attended by the Hon. C. A. Murray and Sir Edward Bowater. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited her Majesty this morning at the Castle. Her Majesty had a dinner party at Windsor Castle, as were laid for twenty-seven.

WEDNESDAY.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert walked out as soon as the [illegible] grounds. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by his Imperial Highness the Archduke Frederick of Austria, enjoyed several hours' shooting in the royal preserves in the Great Park. His Royal Highness the Earl of Liverpool, the Earl of Jersey, Sir J. Bowater, and the Hon. C. A. Murray. Baron Lehzeltern was also of the party. The Marquis of Exeter arrived at the Castle on a visit to her Majesty. The royal dinner party included the following personages: Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, his Imperial Highness the Archduke Frederick of Austria, Viscountess Canning, Viscount and Viscountess Sydney, the Hon. Misses Murray, Lady C. Dundas, the Marquis of Exeter, the Earl of Liverpool, the Earl Delawarr, the Earl of Jersey, the Earl of Aberdeen, Baron Lehzeltern, Le Chevalier Marmovich, Le Chevalier Kodell, Le Capitaine Doumont, Sir Edward Bowater, Captain Duncombe, Colonel Grey, Sir George and Lady Couper, Colonel Ellison, the Hon. C. A. Murray, and Dr. Praetorius. The band of the Grenadier Guards was in attendance

HER MAJESTY'S HEALTH.—On dit in quarters whose information may be relied on, that the most interesting event to her Majesty's liege subjects will take place early in March next. This will consequently make the London season short and late, as the levees and drawing-rooms at St. James's Palace will not be held till after the accouchement of the Queen.

Mr. G. S. Duncombe, M.P., left London on Monday, on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Beaufort, at Badminton.

A meeting of the Cabinet Ministers was held on Tuesday afternoon, at the official residence of Sir Robert Peel in Downing-street. The Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Stanley, Lord Fitzgerald and Vesey, Sir James Graham, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer attended.

Lord Brougham, it is stated, intends to pass the winter at his seat, near Cannes.

A meeting of the Ecclesiastical Commission was held on Tuesday afternoon at the office in Whitehall-place. The Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, Sir Herbert Jenner Fust, and other commissioners were present.

Sir George Cockburn had an interview with Sir Robert Peel in Downing-street on Tuesday.

The Earl of Haddington has left town on a visit to Lord Wharncliffe at Wortley Hall, Yorkshire

Despatches were received on Tuesday from Sir Hugh Gough for Lord Stanley, her Majesty's principal Secretary of State for War and the Colonies. Despatches from Malta, Gibraltar, the Ionian Islands, Ceylon, St. Helena, and British Guiana were also received at the Colonial office.

The Dowager Lady Holland has been suffering from indisposition, arising from a severe cold; but on Tuesday her ladyship was considered better by her medical attendants, Sir Stephen Hammick and Dr. Holland.

Lady Peel, widow of the Rev. Sir Robert Peel, chaplain to King George IV., died at Bishopswearmouth, Durham, in her 90th year.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester left town on Tuesday afternoon, to honour the Duke of Wellington with a visit at his seat, Strathfieldsaye, Hants.

Their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, accompanied by the Princesses Augusta and Mary of Cambridge, and the Hereditary Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, have arrived at Stratfieldsaye, Hants, on a visit to the Duke of Wellington, from the seat of the Duke of Beaufort, Badminton, Gloucestershire.

Count St. Aulaire, the French Ambassador, transacted business on Tuesday at the Foreign-office PRIVY COUNCIL.—Her Majesty will hold a Privy Council at Windsor (to-day (Saturday)), when a proclamation will be agreed upon for proroguing Parliament from Tuesday next to some future day, then to meet for the dispatch of business.

CLIFFORD-STREET-HOUSE.—Among the visitors to Miss Burdett Coutts in the last week were the Earl of Wiltshire, Lord Sudley, Sir Edmond, Lady, and Misses Antrobus; Sir Gore, Lady, and Miss Ouseley; Hon. Miss Vernon, Mr. Mercer, Mr. and Miss Majoribanks, Mr. Clarence Bradley, Miss Langham, Captain Otway, Sir Francis and Miss Burdett, Rev. Edward Neale, Rev. Joseph Wagner, Mr. and Mrs. Pullen, Mr. Edward Majoribanks, Mr. Coltharst, Rev. Mr. Ellis, and Mr. Young. The party broke up on Tuesday, when Miss Burdett Coutts returned to town.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—Madame Celeste, on her re-appearance since her return from America, was received on Wednesday night by a house crowded in every part with enthusiastic applause.

DEATH OF THE COUNTESS OF MUNSTER.—This lamented lady has not long survived her ill-fated husband, having died at her house in Portland-

The present charter of the Bank of England dates from the 1st of August, 1834, and is for 21 years, but gives, by the fifth clause, an option to the Government of putting an end to the charter upon giving one year's notice within six months after the expiration of ten years from the charter date; and charter might, consequently, be reclaimed early in the year 1846. If that period is passed over, the charter will go on to the full term, expiring in 1855; after which, if no new charter is entered into, the exclusive privileges may be terminated at any time by giving a year's notice.

THE BRITISH AMERICAN ASSOCIATION.—It will be recollected that in the course of the last few months, and during the mayoralty of Sir J. Pirie, circumstances transpired on different occasions in the police court in which that worthy baronet presided, which called the attention of the public to some of the results of the operations of the above society, placing it in a very unfavourable light before the country, and rendering an explanation on the part of the association imperatively necessary. It appears that the consulting council, as it is termed, held a meeting on Wednesday, at the office of the society in New Bridge-street, Blackfriars, for the purpose of forming a committee of inquiry into the charges made against it, and of endeavouring to reinstate itself in the favourable opinion of those parties to whom it looked for support, as well as of those for whose benefit it was professedly principally established.

On Wednesday night, Mr. Nathan, the Jew, residing in St. George's-circus, Southwark, expired from the injuries he received on the afternoon of Friday last at the auction-rooms in Great Marlborough-street. Three persons are in custody to await the result of a coroner's inquest, before Mr. Payne, the city coroner.

PRIZE FIGHT.—Another of these exhibitions took place on Tuesday last. The combatants were Freeman, the American giant, whose name has been several times before the public of late, and a man named Perry, known as the "Slasher" among the fraternity of the ring. The battle was to have come off near Sawbridgeworth, in Suffolk, but the local magistrates having got scent of the affair, the parties concerned, as well as several hundred spectators, were compelled to shift their quarters. The Eastern Counties Railway afforded an easy means of transit into an adjoining county, a few miles distant, and the ring was again pitched before four o'clock. The fight now commenced in earnest, and after belabouring each other for one hour and twenty minutes, the seconds declared it a drawn battle, as night had set in, and neither of the men could see each other distinctly. It was generally believed that the transatlantic champion had the best of it.

place on Saturday last. Her ladyship, Mary Wyndham, was daughter of the late Earl of Egremont, and married Mr. Wyndham's husband in October, 1810, whom she survived not quite nine months. Several children, including the Earl of Munster, who is in his 79th year, survive their parents.

STRATHFIELDSAYE.—The Duke of Wellington is enjoying the society of a few select friends, among whom are Lord and Lady Malmesbury, who have arrived from Walmer, where they had been staying since they left Walmer Castle. The duke is in excellent health, and rides thirty miles occasionally to meet the Vine hounds, with which pack he has since regularly hunts.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

OXFORD.—A convocation was holden on Thursday, when it was agreed, not unanimously (there being one dissentient), to accept the legacy of £10,000, bequeathed by the late Dr. Ireland, dean of Westminster, to this university, the dividends of which to be applied for the benefit of a professor, whose department shall be "Exegesis of Holy Scripture;" the appointment of the professor to be by the heads of colleges and halls.

Messrs. C. E. Pritchard and F. Temple, scholars of Balliol College, have been elected fellows of that society, the former on the old foundation, and the latter on the Baliol foundation.

University honours have been awarded as under: Class 1, R. C. Powes, fellow of Exeter College; H. M. White, fellow of New College. Class 2, J. C. Algar, of University College; H. Smith Churchill, B.A., Pembroke College. Deacons: Michael Angelo Atkinson, M.A., Trinity College; W. Gilson Humphry, M.A., Trinity College; John Alexander Freer, M.A., Trinity College; John Groote, M.A., Trinity College; William Crouch, B.A., Trinity College; A. Macdonald Hopper, B.A., St. John's College; R. Hull, B.A., St. John's College; Charles Ward, B.A., Magdalene College; Louis Hodge, B.A., Emanuel College; Harvey Goodwin, B.A., Caius College.

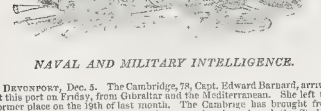
ARSENICAL BISHOP.—The Lord Bishop of Tuam, eldest son of Lord Plunket, intends, it is said, to make a stay on the Continent for the space of three years.

UNIVERSITY OF DURHAM.—At a convocation holden last week William Haslam was admitted to the degree of Bachelor of Arts. The following gentlemen were presented and admitted, ad eundem, Bachelors of Arts:—Richard Stote Fox, University College, Oxford; Charles Beresford Turner, Balliol College, Oxford; Wadham Huntley Skrine, Christ's Church, Oxford. William Lloyd Wharton, M.A., was nominated by the Rev. the Warden, and approved by convocation, to be auditor of the University accounts, and R. S. Fox, B.A., has been appointed curator of the museum. A grace was passed to enable Thomas Leahy, civil engineer in this University, to become a Student in Arts, in conformity with the regulations for students in civil engineering and mining.



NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

DEVONPORT, Dec. 5.—The Cambridge, 78, Capt. Edward Barnard, arrived at this port on Friday, from Gibraltar and the Mediterranean. She left the former place on the 19th of last month. The Cambrige has brought from the Mediterranean three convicts, who were placed on board the Stirling Castle, convict ship, on Saturday. It is expected the Cambridge will sail to-day for Sheerness to be paid off. The Warspite, 80, Captain Lord John Hay, sailed from Gibraltar for Cadiz on the same day the Cambrige left for England. The Rodney, 92, Captain R. Maunsell, C.B., and the Formidable, 84, Captain Sir C. Sullivan, Bart., were at Gibraltar. The Formidable has been ordered to Malta, and was expected to sail in a day or two. The Lord Hastings, 1st Lieutenant Commander C. Postle, was lying at Gibraltar. The Inconstant, 36, Captain Mitchell, was ordered to sail from Malta to Cadiz, in consequence of the disturbances at Barcelona. The Spy, 3, brigantine, Lieutenant Commander George Raymond, arrived off Sierra Leone on the 16th of September. The Romulus sailer arrived from the river yards with stores yesterday. The Hannibal, 84, has taken up the stern deck on the Hamoaze to have some defects repaired. In the sound Cambridge. In Hamoaze, in Commission—Cadogan, Sand Josef, Sylph and Netley tenders; Cruiser, steam tug; Adventure transport; Hamoaze, Falmouth, and Cam. [illegible] ghters.

A Court-martial is ordered to be held to try the Hon. Captain C. G. J. B. Elliot, commanding H.M. ship Spartan, in the West Indies, for having corporally punished Mr. Gleig a young gentleman of that ship, doing duty in her as a midshipman.

SUSPENSION OF THE ENLISTMENT IN THE NAVY.—An order has been issued upon Dr. Bell and Lieutenant Green, of the Tower division, not to pass any more men for the navy until fresh directions are issued by the Admiralty.

DEATH OF LORD EDWARD CLINTON.—We regret to announce the melancholy death of this distinguished nobleman, son of his Grace the Duke of Newcastle, which took place on board of her Majesty's ship Hecate, Commander the Hon. T. Hastings, while on outward passage to China. The unhappy event was occasioned by a fever of ten days, in the month of June last, and his remains were buried at sea at the entrance of the Gulf of Siam.

GRAND REVIEW IN INDIA.—We learn from private letters that it was the intention of Lord Ellenborough, in the course of the present month, to review the whole of the troops, who will by that time have returned from Affghanistan 35,000 in number.

WRECK OF H.M.S. FORMIDABLE.—Great anxiety has prevailed in naval circles since the telegraphic despatch published in the last edition of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of Saturday evening, announcing the wreck of the Formidable. The Neapolitan Mail of the 20th ult. has taken up the history of the capsizing of the Amsterdam steam-boat which had just left that port, from Barcelona, that the destruction of the ship appeared to be inevitable; but it is, we have heard, officially known that the Formidable has grounded on the quicksand opposite the mouth of the Holy-rood river, and directly under the fort of Montjuich. All her officers and crew, however, are safe; and, having been lightened of all her guns, stores, &c., which have been conveyed ashore, and the Gassendi (French) and Geyser (British) steamers being still in attendance on her, no doubt is entertained that she will be got off with comparatively little damage.

PORTSMOUTH, Dec. 8.—The Warspite, 50, Captain Lord John Hay, C.B., anchored at Spithead this afternoon, from Gibraltar and Cadiz, having on board General Sir Alexander Woodford, late governor of the former fortress. The Wasp, 16, Commander Drew, sails to-morrow for the West Indies. The Pique, 46, Captain Hon. M. Stopford, sailed this morning for Bermuda, with despatches for Vice-Admiral Sir Charles Adam. The Pique remains on the West India station. The John Renwick, convict ship, sailed this evening for Van Diemen's Land. The Sylvia, cutter, arrived today from Sheerness, with seamen for general service. The Echo, steam-vessel, sailed this afternoon, for Woolwich, to undergo repair. Ships in Harbour: The Sir Vincent, the Victory, the Royal George, the Sulphur, the Excellent, the Bellona (Austrian), the Thunderbolt, and the Volcano steamers. At Spithead: The Warspite, and the Wasp.

LORD HILL.—We regret to learn that his lordship, after recovering from his last illness in London, since he has been at Hardwick, his seat near Shrewsbury, has suffered a relapse. His illness was first occasioned by too anxious and unremitting attention to his official duties. On Wednesday last his lordship relapsed, and had a better night's rest. The feelings of humanity and love of his country in his lordship's bosom are as ardent as ever. When the despatches from China and Affghanistan had been read to him by his nephew, Sir R. Hill, his lordship testified the delight he felt that Providence had crowned the arms of his country with success, and, above all, with the blessing of peace.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

BOMBAY, Nov. 1.—Another ship, the Belvidera, belonging to Bombay, was destroyed at Singapore, encaptain pearls; the vessel was insured for £100,000. The Jessy has been destroyed by fire at Calcutta.

HAVANNA, Oct. 22.—The Industry, Bell, from Honduras to Cork, which put in here 8th inst., after being ashore, proceeded this morning after repairing. Nov. 4. The Saltana, hence for Laguna, put back on the 28th, the master dead. The [illegible]art of Oak, Brown (supposed from Jamaica to Londonderry, was also at Cape Antonio, 20th ult., part of cargo landed.

NIEUW DIEP, Nov. 29.—The British schooner Richmond, Eden, from Rio de la Hache to Amsterdam, with a cargo of dye-wood, went ashore near the lighthouse of Lykduin last night, and is high and dry; the materials are being landed; the masts have been cut away, and it is hoped the cargo may be saved; the ship is reported to have gone to pieces.

LISBON, Nov. 26.—A large, name and nation unknown, abandoned and on fire from her stern to the main hatchway, ran almost gone by the board, foremast standing, with double reefed topsails and foresail set, with her head to N.E., was seen on the night of the 18th, at 8 p.m., 25 leagues S.W. of Scilly, by the James Wearne, Morton, and here at 2 p.m., she suddenly disappeared.

SOUTHAMPTON, TUESDAY.—The Montrose, Captain Lewis, Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamer, arrived this morning. She left Gibraltar on the 24th, and Lisbon on the 29th, November. The Montrose landed 19 men from Portugal, deserters from Chelmsford, taken altogether, 41 have arrived here. They are much darker in colour than the Spanish, and look somewhat smoother with their immensely long beards.

THE BRITISH QUEEN STEAM-SHIP.—The following is an extract of a letter, dated Antwerp, Dec. 4:—"Last evening (Saturday) the Belgian steam-ship British Queen, Captain Eckhoff, after many fruitless attempts, succeeded in getting safely into dock. Doubts are entertained here (Antwerp) as to her again being put on the passage between England and New York. Since she was purchased by the Belgian government her voyages have turned out very unprofitable. During her passages to New York the consumption of coals averaged 35 tons per day."

On the 2nd of September the Henry Richardson, of London, burthen 600 tons, and laden with cotton, was lost on the voyage from Bombay to China. She is described as having driven on a shelf of rocks under water, and, having swung off again, she gave a heavy plunge, and went down head foremost, carrying with her a large cutter, filled with sails, and two seamen belonging to the port of London.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

TO RA.

IN AN EVENING'S WALK.

"Si de me luir, elle fut capable, Pourquoi m'aimer?" LA FONTAINE.

I do remember—not "an apothecary,"
(Nay, do not laugh)—but a calm, silent vale,
Where, in my youth, if I had met thee, Fairy,
'Twere a dear spot to tell thee the love tale
Which then I could have felt: 'twas a sweet dale—
I call'd it vale before, but 'tis no matter now—
I'm sometimes wilful put, and must dovetail
Rhymes for no reason but they rhyme—somehow Qualis eram non sum I'm ready to allow!

"The watchdog bays the whispering wind"—let's take
A silent pathway through this wilderness
Of trees and flow'rs, and find a twilit brake,
In whose deep bosom's sleepy-like recess
No sound shall come to break the loneliness,
Save the stream's murmuring through rocks and reeds,
Or melancholy bird in love's distress;
But these are sounds that silence never heeds—
This paradox will scare some matter-of-fact creeds!

And let it—so say I; for Milton, too,
That wizard wight, has said of silence in
His Masque of Comus,* something that I view
As bord'ring on what fools would call a sin
Against plain sense; but were I to begin
To quote how often critic asses wonder'd
At author's ignorance, and rais'd a din
How Shakspere, Dryden, Pope, et cetera, blunder'd,
Instead of one short twil'ght, I should waste a hundred!

So I'll return, with constancy most chary,
To my first subject—a calm, silent vale,
Where, in my youth, if we had met, sweet Fairy!
'Twere a dear spot to tell thee the love tale
Which then I could have felt! Now, I'll go hir'l
("That's a vile phrase," as old Polonius says)
Tho' I'll think it odd, although I'm wan and pale,
To talk of youth as long gone by—my days
Have taken Age's hue from Sorrow, whose hand lays

A deeper furrow on the [illegible] Time's†
But come, here is a bank y clad with flow'rs,
Where we may sit, and I describe those climes
In whose deep, silent, meditative hours
Were pass'd the happiness of my boyish hours
In fancy with some visionary maid
(Egerian raptures! which, ere lifetime lours Fill the young heart); but, Rosie! I'm afraid
My tongue's too sad a speaker for a girl array'd

Like thee, in morn of life's sweet cheerfulness!
And yet it may not so; for o'er that brow
I've often seen the shade of thought's distress
Pass like a moon-cloud o'en as it does now.
Oh, how thy beauty heightens, Rosie! how Thy dear eyes' eloquence more sweetly pours
Into thy long glance, when thy feelings bow
To gentle grief, such as the heart endures
At melancholy music, or sad tale that lures

A sympathetic tear to steal its pearl
Adown thy lily cheek. Turn not away
At mention of thy loveliness, my girl;
But gaze on me, while I begin to stray
Back thro' the joys of many a long-past day
To Memory's sepulchre, where cold lie
Those raptures of my younger years, when gay
And brilliant visions danced before mine eye.
Brilliant and gay? Yes, yes! but meteors in life's sky.

Oh! had I met thee, Rosie, in that time,
Thou wouldst have been my dream's reality,
And more, if I had met thee in that clime,
Thy father-land, which I will picture thee.
But no; my heav'n on earth was not to be.
Why dost thou weep, my girl? Come, change the theme.
What! No? Then to the scene where, 'neath a tree,
I had my first and rude poetic dream—
For what could Poesy of such a stripling deem?

There was a streamlet sparkling through the fringe
Of skirting woods that grew from either side
Upward two hills so high, that separate tinge
And hue of tree was in the distance dyed
Into such blue perspective, that to guide
The eye along the mountain-surface line,
Demarking it from ether, would have tried
The eagle's seeking for his eirie: mine
Have oft been weary scanning it on evenings fine.

Oh! the soft music of the fretful surge
That broke in tiny murmurs 'gainst the bank
And the loud thunder of the deep-mouth'd gurge
Where for awhile surceasing billows sank!
The spray too, effervescent, falling dank
To keep perpetual verdure on the flow'rs,
'Mongst which no deadly weed or poison rank,
But such the gratefulness of those sweet bow'rs,
Oh have I known more's bush had paid to evening hours.

Before mid-day was reckon'd well gone by!—
And then the new enchantments lent by Her,
The Queen of Heav'n, the Empress of the Sky,
Lady of Lakes, would not permit thee stir
Depart ere; She when set, came Lucifer
To show thee home with dubious light, ere morn
By too much l stre spoil'd the beauties rare
With which the moon invested every thorn,
For here the ray that best can beauteous scenes adorn!

The perfume too of that delicious dell,
So rich with odours of a thousand flow'rs,
That on thy lips the dew in sweetness fell
As if the sky had wept ambrosia show'rs!
And then the minstrelsy of the dark bow'rs
By blackbird, thrush, or robin warbled o'er,
So sweetly too, it seemed the "Elves and Hours,"†
Pergusa's lake, or fam'd Cayster's shore,‡
Ne'er echoed to their swans such pretty music-lore!

But come—enough of this wild picture, drawn
By memory of scenes now far away;—
See! 'bove the orient hills the young moon's dawn
Wakes like the soul of the departed day,
In all its spirit-like and mild array:—
Lovely, but slow and modest, as if now
Were her first entrance on the vesper gray!
We but embarrass her pale timid brow!
Let us retire, and leave her beauty free to glow!—W.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY-LANE.

The new spectacles continue their attraction at this house. It is probable the first novelty will be the pantomime, on which all hands are at work, from the lessee himself down to the lamplighter.

COVENT GARDEN.

Mr. Bunn's new management has been exhibiting signs of prosperity all the week through, but the benefit of Miss Adelaide Kemble on Tuesday, was the crowning attraction. We rejoice to say that it was brilliantly attended—the house crowded in every part—and eventuated a sum of more than £600 to reward a series of intellectual and delicious performances.

M. JULLIEN'S CONCERTS.—On Friday the 2nd inst. the first of a series of concerts under the direction of M. Jullien took place at the English Opera House, and, if possible, gave greater satisfaction than any of those of last year, the conductor's energies seeming to increase in eundo. Nothing could excel the precision, delicacy, and simultaneous force (when required) with which the magnificent Poetical Overture to "Der Freyschutz" was performed. M. Jullien's "Irish and Scotch Quadrilles," introducing an imitation of the Highland pipes (by the way a much more agreeable matter than the original) was one of the most successful performances of the evening—its encore was vociferously general. The solo performers were Mr. Lazarus, M. Baumann, Herr Koenig, M. Laurent, and though last, not least, Mr. Prospere on the giant instrument the Opheicleide, which is as gentle and as docile in his hands as Hamlet would have the recorder to be. Truly this gentleman's execution and power of subduing this usually obstreperous instrument passes all understanding, amongst those who have heard him; how vain would it be then to attempt a description of them to those who have not! If it were for nothing else, it is worth a visit to hear his "Rule Britannia" sent forth from his Leviathan instrument with a majesty and grace that no single one ever before equalled. The concerts altogether reflect the highest credit upon M. Jullien's taste, tact, and liberality, and no doubt will prove an unrivalled source of attraction during the season.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT-CHAT.

SIR HENRY BISHOP. This distinguished composer delivered his first musical lecture last week at Edinburgh, and was received throughout with the greatest applause. The honorary distinction which her gracious Majesty lately conferred on our national musician must be considered by everybody as most duly deserved; but it is not without some disgust that we see the abbreviations of "Mus. Bac. Oxon." attached to a name that has been rendered glorious without such empty honours; honours (?) which by their appendage only tend to link it in disgraceful association with many another wholly unmeaning set of "Musæ and her cunning."

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—This Society was originally formed for the encouragement of music in this country! We learn that, for the furtherance of this laudable intention, the directors are actively engaged in quest of foreign novelties for the ensuing season!

BRITISH MUSICIANS. With somewhat more national spirit than the last-mentioned, the members of this Society met on Saturday evening, for the chief purpose of performing some new MS. vocal and instrumental music. A quartet by Mr. Gledhill, and a sonata for the pianoforte and violoncello, by Messrs. Neate and Lucas, afforded particular satisfaction, as did also some excellent singing by Mrs. C. Harper, the Misses Williams, and Mr. Weiss.

THALBERG.—This man of ubiquity, as we certainly should have styled him some five-and-twenty years ago, will perform on Monday evening next at Hackney!—on Tuesday morning at Blackheath!!—same evening at the Hanover-square Rooms!!!—on Wednesday morning at Richmond!!!!—in the evening at the Bridge Hotel, Southwark!!!!!—on the next morning at Brighton!!!!!!—and then off for the Continent.

THE FOG.—The fog, which was "bad enough" on Tuesday, deepened in intensity during the latter part of Wednesday night, and so completely enveloped the Strand and all other parts adjacent to the Thames next morning in its dusky and impenetrable mantle, as to have literally converted day into night. The gas was turned on in all the shops, and candles were obliged to be used to carry on the necessary business of the day. We find that it was the same on Tuesday in Paris. We fear that many accidents must necessarily have taken place from unavoidable collisions on the river (especially), as well as in the streets and roads of and about the metropolis.

BADNESS OF THE TIMES.—On Thursday last, at a petty session for the parishes of St. Martin and St. Margaret, Westminster, upwards of 800 warrants of distress were signed by the magistrates for those two parishes alone.

* "Silence was pleas'd!" &c.

† There is a fanciful passage in Sir Wm. Jones's translation of the "Hymn to Menu," similar to this:—"The sweetness of the bower has made the air so fragrant that the dew before it falls is changed into rose-water"

‡ Perqusa and Cayster were famous for their sweetly singing swans; for which vide Ovid, &c.

THE QUEEN'S HUNTSMAN.

The fact of her Majesty's hounds being now regularly hunted affords a favourable opportunity for introducing the portrait of Mr. Davis, the royal huntsman. Not that he altogether depends upon our assistance for publicity or acquaintanceship. Thousands who have visited the popular race-courses, which her Majesty has thought fit to honour with her presence must recollect Mr. Davis as forming a prominent official in the royal train; to say nothing of those who have seen him in the exercise of his more legitimate vocation with the pack. To this fortunate set he is well-known as a keen sportsman and daring rider—ever ready with his well-trained followers to make the most of those means of sport which the country yields. To such as have felt the keen pleasure which the field affords it is unnecessary to say a word in favour of a good sportsman; whilst to all who have still this pleasure to learn, it is hopeless to attempt conveying any idea of the ardent, glowing sensations which form, as it were, an integral part of the instinct which leads men to dare the perils of a cross-country gallop, with five-barred gates and stiff fences, to say nothing of fractured legs or broken necks. To those who know it not, again we say it is a pleasure to come; and in addition to our former statement of his being a keen hunter—to a sportsman an all-sufficient introduction—we may add that he inherited his present post from his father, and, in addition to the perquisites of his office, enjoys a yearly salary of £500. He has a brother an artist, than whom no one is better able to give effect with the pencil to those scenes which the huntsman pursues in the field. Having found space to say thus much about "one of her Majesty's servants," we may turn to an establishment where his steed is ever and anon located, in common with those of his royal mistress and her favoured guests.

Our readers will recollect that in a former number we gave a sketch of Cumberland Lodge, Windsor, the official residence of the Hon. G. Anson, adjoining which are the buildings appropriated to Prince Albert's stud, and the new kennels for his favourite beagles. We now present a view of the royal stables, in which are lodged her Majesty's horses, surrounded by all the means and appliances calculated to add to equine comfort or condition. The ventilation—a most important point in the preservation of a healthy stable—has been studiously attended to; the details being regulated with the greatest care, under sound scientific advice and direction. The most complete cleanliness is observed, with scrupulous attention to neatness, which renders the tout ensemble one eminently calculated to please the eye, whilst it gives evidence of the careful solicitude best adapted to ensure the health of the animals for whom the buildings have been erected. It will, perhaps, be still borne in remembrance that discussions some time since arose in which these stables were made use of as a peg to hang party squabbles upon. Such are not worth raking up again, for, whatever justice there may be in the complaint that £30,000 a-year is too little for national education, when £70,000 is spent upon royal stables, we yet are amongst those who think that when a palace like Windsor requires a series of subsidiary buildings, they should be erected in a style worthy alike of the royal residence to which they are to be an appendage, and the great nation at whose cost they must be produced—more especially when the expense is but once imposed, and not likely to become an annual charge. Worthy, however, of Windsor and its forest, are these right royal horse palaces. Independent of the stall department for the cattle, the apartments of the chief groom, and those of the minor officials of the manége, are fitted up in a style of uniformity and neatness, which cannot fail to excite interest and commendation. In fine, the completeness of all the details should be seen to be appreciated; and such of our readers as may find will and leisure for a visit to the neighbourhood will do well to inspect the buildings which form the subject of our illustration.

ROYAL STABLES, WINDSOR.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

MOORE'S COTTAGE, MAYFIELD, STAFFORDSHIRE.

We have here a nook—a far-off corner of Old England—picturesque in itself, and surrounded by poetical associations. The cottage of the Epicurean—the quiet abiding place of "the poet of all the loves and all the grapes," the modern Anacreon and Irish melodist—Tom Moore.

When the politician smiles over the brilliant satire, the courtly minstrel sings the graceful songs, or the elegant ennuyée sighs over the fanciful oriental narratives of Moore, it would seem that the author should have written in some Eastern palace thronged with the gay and the beautiful—surrounded with bowers of roses, and encircled by vines—with many a white statue of graceful nymph, and many a singing fountain haunted by fairies. But it was not so, and the poet even in his lifetime has gained for himself so sure a place in the hearts of his countrymen, as to be indifferent to all opinions regarding himself not founded on a single consideration of his genius. He is one of the few who have been able to raise and sanctify what has been theirs, or has appertained to them; and the place where he has mused and sung becomes haunted ground, like the banks of the Avon, the gardens of Twickenham, and the meadows of Ayr. Among the spots thus dedicated to future fame, is the little cottage sketched below, for there lived the author of the "Irish Melodies," and there he is said to have written "Lalla Rookh." The right hand front window is pointed to as having belonged to Moore's little parlour, the window at the side belonged to his not very extensive library, and the trees visible above the roof are part of the orchard, his favourite study, in which some of his choicest lyrics were composed. The cottage has but few attractions for those that love splendour; it was not here he could be the soul of a gorgeous feast among the great ones whom his genius had won to be his familar friends. Still some of the best years of Moore's life were spent here, and they deserved to be happy since those who know him best, speak, after an interval of twenty-five years, with enthusiasm of his personal character as a son, a husband, a father, and a friend.

MOORE'S COTTAGE.

Moore's Cottage is in a secluded part of Mayfield, a village on the Staffordshire side of the river Dove, about two miles from Ashbourne. It is a spot not often alluded to in literature, though the neighbourhood has been peculiarly honoured by the presence of literary men. Three miles from Mayfield is Wootton Hall, where Rousseau lived several years—where he botanised, and where he wrote his Confessions. One mile from Mayfield, on the other side of the Dove, lived as great, and perhaps a much better, man than Rousseau, but who will not attain an equal renown, Michael Thomas Sadler. At Oakover, one mile from Mayfield, is the residence of Mr. Ward, the author of "Tremaine." Two miles further up the river, in the loveliest of all villages, a grotto is still preserved, in which Congreve wrote his first drama. A ten minutes' walk affords a view of the grand entrance to Dovedale, immortalised by old Izaak Walton. At Tissington, another most exquisite village, like the former, without workhouse or alehouse, lived Greaves, the author of the "Spiritual Quixote." At Chatsworth Hobbes lived and philosophised. Dr. Taylor, one of Dr. Johnson's most esteemed friends, was an inhabitant of Ashbourne. The great lexicographer was a visitor of this neighbourhood; and some of the most amusing of his conversations and peculiarities were recorded by Boswell while staying in this quiet town.

Mayfield Cottage has, at present, some claim to the notice of the lovers of literature, from its being now the residence of Mr. Alfred Butler, the clever author of the novels "Elphinstone" and "The Herberts."

Leicester.—Leicestershire Agricultural Society.—The annual meeting of this society was held at the Bell Hotel, Leicester, on Friday week. The show of stock, implements, &c., was held in the yards attached to the Bell Hotel, and was much more extensive than usual. The attendance of company considerably exceeded that of former years. About 200 persons sat down to dinner, among whom we noticed his Grace the Duke of Rutland, in the chair, supported by the Right Hon. Earl Howe, Lord Curzon, Lord C. Manners, Sir W. W. Dixie, Sir F. Fowke, Sir G. Palmer, Mr. Packe, M.P., &c. Upon the toast, "Success to the Leicestershire Agricultural Society" being drunk, the chairman said, the occupants of the land had now raised, by their zeal and industry, agriculture to one of the first positions in the arts and sciences. He congratulated the meeting on the decided improvement apparent in the show of that year. The chairman then proceeded to the distribution of prizes; after which he addressed the successful candidates, and congratulated the meeting on the number of servants of both sexes who had come forward to claim the prizes allowed for length of servitude, good conduct, &c. Lord Howe proposed the health of his Grace the Duke of Rutland. The chairman, in returning thanks, said, the greatest anxiety filled his mind to do the utmost in his power to promote the interests of the agriculturists, as he firmly believed that upon the prosperity of that body mainly depended the welfare of the nation. (Hear.) Since they had last met certain changes had taken place relating to the laws affecting the importation of cattle and corn. He should not now express any opinion upon those alterations, as he had not formed any conclusions upon the subject. He would, however, state that growers of corn had admitted that the duty might be safely lowered. From information he possessed he could positively state that the tariff had acted very prejudicially on farming produce, as the agriculturists had so alarmed themselves when the bill was first introduced, that they sent their stock to market two months before the time they otherwise would have done, and consequently, the beasts, not being in proper condition, did not fetch the value that the farmer ought to have received. (Hear, hear.) His grace, after thanking the company for the kind manner in which they had drunk his heath, resumed his seat amidst great applause. The company separated at a late hour, much pleased with the day's proceedings.

At seven o'clock on Monday night, during the thick fog, a tide-waiter, named Joseph Butler, doing duty in the London Docks, fell from the Quay into the Hermitage-basin, near High-street, Wapping. The alarm was immediately raised that a man had gone overboard, and the police constables on the beat procured the drags and endeavoured to save the custom-house officer, but did not succeed. About half-an-hour afterwards Inspector Walker, of the Thames Police, dragged up the body, and he immediately conveyed it to the dock station, where it was stripped and immersed in a bath, always kept warm for such purposes, and medical aid was called and the usual restorative means used, but without success.

SCENE FROM THE BALLET OF "ALMA."

We have ere a scene from the grand scrio-comic ballet of "Alma," a pure Adelphi gem of dancing, devilry, and melodrama. At the Adelphi everything is of the extreme order—the sentiment swoons—the agony is elaborately torturing—the laughter is either fiendish or slangish, as the case may be—the love is either dissolute or dreadful—the passion is in tatters—the fun in capers—the scenery in hysterics, beginning with a semi-fit in a black forest, and ending with as much blue or red fire, or both, as might serve for the illumination of regions not so near akin to human intelligence as the "devoted little temple in the Strand." Your ballet of "Alma" is one of the old stock; it is a sort of compound of Fitzball and Satan—reality and romance. It wears the second title of "The Spell of the....blank"—which blank is indicated mysteriously thus [redacted], by a mark black enough to set the playbill in mourning. It introduces Time as a captive—then the "Spirit of Mischief"—then the Spirit of Darkness—then the Carnival, wherein we presume the Spirit of Light predominates in spite of the disguises—and, as the great climax of wonder,

THE STORM OF FIRE!

This is a ballet à la George Robins, with beautiful leading lines, with spectre lovers, and ducal halls, and palaces of revelry, and arabesque dances, and waltzes of fascination, and Satanic courts, and galopades of all the characters in the infernal regions, and... but, as we cannot go much deeper, we pause, lest it should be said of us that

"Fools rush in where angels fear to tread."

But à propos of all the characters, by whom are they performed? By Mr. Paul Bedford, in the respectable rôle of Lucifer himself, and an actor, who, in that capacity would not be likely to find his match; by Madame Proche Giubelei, not the Alma Venus genetrix of Byron, but the heroine Alma herself; by Mrs. H. P. Grattan as Tinderina, and of course susceptible to the sparks; and last, not least, Wieland the magical, himself, the master of all the slippery business of the night.

Can we not insinuate into this theatrical corner a portrait of this same twisting, twirling, winding, leaping, flying, vanishing, appearing, wrestling, wrangling, swinging, bounding, creeping, prancing, capering Wieland? the best melo-dramatic devil on the stage; the most fertile body-twister and limb-disposer of all the body-corporate of jumpers and clowns; the living episode of elasticity and indiarubber, bearing every sort of pressure with preternatural pliability, and still returning to his proper shape unhurt; in short, the one ever active and (probably for that reason) never passive, Wieland. Oh yes, he can squeeze in anywhere: and therefore, he will squeeze in here! But, no! we cannot catch him yet. Either he has cut the wood-engraver, or the wood-engraver has not cut him; and in either case the light of his countenance is reserved for future illumination.

CONDUCT OF TRANSPORTS.—The Hobart Town Courier contains the following account of the conduct of a set of desperadoes under sentence of transportation, which gives a fearful insight into the incorrigibility of criminals when once the passions get the mastery. "Twenty prisoners, of the doubly and trebly convicted class, arrived here by the Marian Watson on the 8th inst. Upon their passage down they twice attempted to take the vessel; once they even endeavoured to set her on fire. They were received into the penitentiary upon their arrival; and, the very first night, eight of the number succeeded in freeing themselves of their irons, with the determination of effecting their escape, by rushing upon the constables of the gate, previous to their being locked up for the night. Upon this occasion a small double-barrelled pistol was found secreted in one of the loaves of bread in their possession. It is supposed that, in spite of the vigilance exercised in searching them, they must, in some way or other, have brought the pistol into the penitentiary with them; they, no doubt, intended to have used it as an intimidation with those parties with whom they came in contact, as it was not loaded. In consequence of this resolute attempt to escape thus made by these misguided men, they were still more strictly watched; and Mr. Gunn, whose well-known vigilance has almost passed into a proverb, was on the alert, and placed extra men on patrole during the night. It was fortunate that he did so; for, on Sunday night last, several of them again made a still more daring effort to effect their escape. They had no ordinary difficulties to contend against; for the strict daily search to which they were subjected had deprived them of their previous tools consisting of the pistol, and two knife-blades converted into saws: they were, moreover, watched by one trusty man in the same room with them, and another outside the door. During the previous day they had made a great outcry for water; and from a bucket, in which some had been carried to them, it appears that they succeeded in wrenching off the handle, which they broke in two. With these rough tools they commenced, as soon as they were locked up for the night, to make a hole in the wall of their room, large enough for a man to creep through. They previously seized and gagged the man in the room with them, and then worked away, in a quiet and dexterous manner, at the wall, placing the bricks noiselessly down on a blanket. They had also torn up other blankets, and muffled their irons to prevent the clinking. In the course of the night some of them succeeded in getting through the aperture, and had access to the back yard. At this juncture the man stationed outside their door thought he heard a clinking sound, and bawled out most lustily to the one inside to know if all was right, and not receiving any answer seized a piece, ran out into the yard, and fired it. In an instant Mr. Gunn and all the constables inside and outside were on the move. The men also were not idle, for in an incredibly short space of time three or four were observed to have gained the summit of the penitentiary wall. A constable immediately levelled his piece and pulled the trigger, but the gun missed fire; two other constables then levelled their pieces and were about to fire, when the men who were on the wall called for quarter, and surrendered at discretion. They have since been very heavily ironed, and still more closely guarded, and, we understand, will shortly be sent down to Port Arthur. The sooner certainly the better, for they are all men whose characters are stained with the worst of crimes. Indeed, we are not without apprehensions of the most serious kind, that these men will yet prove a source of great trouble and annoyance, if not of absolute danger."

On Friday last the citizens of Hamburgh, in compliance with a proposal made to them by the senate, adopted a law by which the Jews are to be henceforth qualified to hold freehold property, and reside in any part of the dominions of the republic. Hitherto, Jews have been authorised to reside and hold property only in one or two streets of the city.

Captain Loch, R.N., who is distinguished in the despatches of Sir Hugh Gough and Sir W. Parker, is son of James Loch, Esq., M.P.

THE FOG IN PARIS.—A thick fog has enveloped Paris for the last few days. It commenced on Saturday about noon, and gradually increased toward the evening, when objects could scarcely be recognized at 15 or 20 paces' distance. It entered the theatres so effectually as to incommode the audience, and the omnibuses on certain lines were obliged to go at a walking pace. On Sunday it cleared up partially towards the middle of the day, but returned in the evening. On Monday it continued all day, and increased in the evening, particularly in the Champs-Elysées, where the lamps could be barely seen across the road.

The celebrated Vestris, for many years known through Europe as first dancer at the Academy of Music, died on Monday, aged 83.

Meyerbeer has suffered a great domestic calamity. He has lost one of his brothers, scarcely 44 years of age. This brother, to whom he was much attached, was struck with apoplexy while walking in one of the streets of Berlin. He dragged himself home with difficulty, and died two days afterwards.

FLORICULTURE.

THE ORCHIS.

Of the singularly beautiful and interesting family of plants, of which we have one member figured above, the vastly greater proportion are natives of the tropical climates. Indeed, the teeming luxuriance of Brazil, and, for the most part, the line of coast extending at each side from it, furnish a countless supply of these curious vegetable productions. The Orchis tribe decrease in number and variety as we approach the northern climes, and in the arctic regions all traces of the family disappear. In Great Britain a few varieties exist, and these usually in low marshy situations, though the writer found, in one of his excursions, a very beautiful specimen of native Orchis, growing high and dry, on a hedge at Ivy-hill, near Aughnacloy, in Ireland. The subject of our sketch is one of the tropical Orchideæ which form the glory of our conservatories. For the information of such of our readers as are not possessed of the means of cultivating the tropical Orchideæ, we shall, by and by, detail the manner in which they are produced and sustained in this country; in the meantime we offer the strict botanical characteristics of the family. The perianth is superior, ringent, of six segments, in two rows, the three outer usually coloured, of which the odd one is uppermost, in consequence of a twisting of the ovary, and one, called the lip, is under most; this last is often lobed, of a different form from the others, and very often spurred at the base. The stamens are three, united in a central column, the two lateral usually abortive and the central perfect, or the central abortive and the two lateral perfect, rarely are all perfect. The anthers are either persistent or deciduous, 2 or 4 or 8-celled. Pollen is either powdery, or consisting in waxy masses, either constantly adhering to a gland or becoming loose in their cells. Ovary, one-celled, with three parietal placentas; style forming part of the column of the stamens. Stigma a viscid space in front of the column, communicating directly with the ovary by a distinct, open canal. Impregnation taking effect by absorption from the pollen masses, through the gland into the canal of the stigma. Capsule inferior, bursting with three valves and three ribs, very rarely bacate. Seeds parietal, very numerous. Testa loose, reticulated, contracted at each end, except in one or two genera. Albumen none. Embryo a solid undivided fleshy mass. We may mention that many of the Orchis tribe are not merely ornamental, but useful also: as vanilla is the fragrant seed-vessel of one species, while salep is made from the roots of certain European species, Orchis mascula, for instance.

The flower above figured is represented twice the size of nature, and the maculæ are brown on a yellow ground.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, Dec. 6, 1842.

Mon cher Monsieur, Our winter may be now pronounced as regularly set in, and all those light and airy fashions which have predominated hitherto have given place to that attire which the exigences of the season so imperatively demand. The employment of furs is become almost universal, and we see them attached to every portion of outer dress whereon such an ornament or such a trimming can be permitted. Large camails of ermine or of sable are in general use. There is now before me a most superb ermine camail, lined with pale blue satin; it has a small square collar turned back in such a way as to permit the blue lining to approach the face, and thus prevent the unfavourable effect which the dead white of the ermine would have upon the complexion. At the opening for the arms is to be found a pretty ornament of blue passementerie, terminated by a knot from which depends a tassel similar to the one which confines the collar. Nothing can exceed the elegant magnificence of this very beautiful, and, at the same time, very useful article; though it may, perhaps, be equalled in effect by the same arrangement in rose-coloured satin and sable, which I have also met with. I should here inform you that naked arms are all in fashion with those who possess such personal advantages; and the style of dress adopted for evening toilettes goes far to set off a beautiful arm, as they have very small sleeves, plain, and little ornamented; the effect of which would prove, if proof could be possibly required, that simplicity is always the most beautiful and the most becoming of all adornments. But to the simple and beautiful effect of a bare arm I have lately seen an additional charm given in the shape of pretty velvet mittens, which agree deliciously with that particular style of dress. These are in velvet, black, violet, or green, with embroidery shaded upon the hand, and laced from the wrist to the upper part of the arm with small cords terminated with tassels. Black mittens of this sort, with cords or jais or green, or with cords of gold, are in charming taste, and amply supply the place of bracelets. It is said that the Empress of Russia has sent pearls and diamonds with which to mount similar cords, to be attached to some mittens, with which Mayer is about to furnish her Imperial Majesty. Berthes are also becoming exceedingly fashionable: they are made of lace, black or white, as the case may be, open in front, the corners square and very high; they are now generally worn with all robes which have no collars. Many of these berthes are worn over velvet robes. The Venetian mantle is still very much in vogue, and is to be seen in velvet, satin, or Cashmere, and always appears to be effective. Let me however not forget to mention a very pretty robe de chambre in Cashmere, embroidered en soutache and silk, intermixed and lined with satin, and which is really very elegant. The robe Louis XVIII. is, however, the great novelty of the season, and I the more particularly mention it as it is equally useful for half dress. This is a robe of grenadine, however, I may except the finest delicious redingotes en quillings formed by a doubling between them in points de Venise, increasing in width towards the bottom, and leaving in the middle a sort of organdie, upon which are placed ruches, or a full trimming, as we should say, ribbons disposed in the same manner as the knots of the time of Louis XVIII. These same knots are upon the sleeves, and a berthe is worn round the corsage. Some of these robes, executed by the most satin redingotes now blue fringes, or in white, with fringes of cabbage green, are really exquisitely pretty. Nothing further strikes me as being particularly new or very uncommon; perhaps, however, I may except the finest delicious redingotes en black satin, embroidered in velvet relief, or green velvet redingotes, surrounded by a description of corded braiding of a much paler green, which has a very pretty effect. Velvet flowers are still fashionable, as are also garlands of moss interlaced with rose buds, upon ball-room dresses, nor should it be forgotten that aigrettes of heron plumes and of marabouts in three shades are considered as amongst the more becoming novelties now in fashion.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

HOWARD V. GOSSETT AND OTHERS.

The plaintiff is a solicitor, and the action was brought to recover from the defendants, who are the officers of the House of Commons, compensation in damages for injury alleged to be sustained by the illegal entry and possession of plaintiff's house. The matter originated in Stockdale's case, and the facts have been frequently before the public. The damages were laid at £10,000. The jury retired, and, after an absence of half an hour, found for the plaintiff, damages £100.

REGGINS V. COATE.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff to recover the sum of £1500, paid by him in the year 1826 to the defendant, who was formerly well known as "Romeo Coates," as the consideration for an annuity during the defendant's life.—Mr. Platt, Mr. Archbold, and Mr. Grady, were for the plaintiff; and Mr. Hoggins, Mr. Winser, and Mr. Atherton, for the defendant.—The payment for the first year was duly paid, but since 1827 no money had been received, the defendant having gone to Boulogne and remained there until a short time since, when he came over to Brighton, and was taken in execution on a judgment which had been obtained by the plaintiff against the defendant in respect of this annuity. The annuity was afterwards set aside, in consequence of some informality in the memorial of it, and it was to recover the amount of the consideration that this action was brought.—Verdict for the plaintiff.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

SIMON V. BALDWIN.

This was an action of libel brought by the plaintiff, a merchant of Jersey, against the defendant, the proprietor of the Hampshire newspaper. The alleged libel was contained in a letter signed "A Loyalist," published in the Standard on the 14th of March last, and had reference to an imputation of fraudulent practices in the carrying on business between Jersey and this country. It stated that the plaintiff was in the habit of importing corn from Prussia and France into the Channel Islands, as if for consumption there, and that on that ground it was admitted duty free, and that he afterwards exported the same corn to England as Jersey corn, whereby he also obtained an exemption from duty. The plaintiff denied that he had ever been guilty of such practices; and a writ of fieri facias had been obtained by the plaintiff against the defendant in respect of this annuity. The annuity was afterwards set aside, in consequence of some informality in the memorial of it, and it was to recover the amount of the consideration that this action was brought.—Verdict for the plaintiff.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

(Before Lord Abinger and a Special Jury.)

SMITH V. BOND.

This was an action to recover certain penalties under the 10th of Anne, for playing at a certain game called hazard. The statute enacted that all persons who lost money at gaming were entitled to recover it back by an action at law, provided they brought it within three months after their loss; but in the event of their failing to do so, any common informer could bring the action, and whatever penalties he recovered, one moiety was to be his, and the other was to go to the poor of the parish where the offence was committed, the penalties being the sum lost and three times its amount.—Mr. Thesiger, Mr. Kelly, and Mr. Lush were for the plaintiff; Mr. Platt, Mr. Richards, Mr. Clarkson, and Mr. Wyatt conducted the defence.—Mr. Thesiger addressed the jury on the part of the plaintiff, and after pointing out the penalties of the statute, said, without going into details, he would call witnesses before them to prove the infraction of it by the defendant.—Mr. Benjamin Thompson examined by Mr. Kelly: I know the defendant, Mr. Joseph Bond. I was in his employment in the month of June last. He kept a house in St. James's-street known as the "Junior St. James's Club." There was much play at French hazard there. It was carried on in a room on the second floor, where there was a table for play. The defendant occasionally superintended. In his absence I did. The play was carried on mostly by counters, representing several sums of money. There was a bank, over which a groom porter presided. His duty was to call the main and chance, and to receive and give money. His name was Norton. There was also another person of the name of Starkie who assisted. He is the defendant's (Mr. Bond's) nephew. The game of French hazard is played with a dice and box. Being asked to explain how the game was played, he said—"If, for instance, a player calls a main of seven, and throws five, he continues to throw until he either throws seven or five. If he throws the former first, he takes in the money, and if the latter, the caster or thrower. I recollect a Mr. Breddell coming to the club on the 2nd of June, 1841. He played at French hazard, and lost £7 in cash, and his draft for £200. He gave me the draft on a slip of paper. I waited on him the following morning, and he gave me a regular printed check on his bankers, the amount of which I received and paid over to Mr. Bond, the defendant. On the 11th of June, 1841, I recollect Captain Courtney coming to the house, and losing £100 in cash, and on the 14th he came again and lost the same amount in cash, and also his draft on the London and Westminster Bank for £200, which I handed over to the defendant; and on the 26th of the same month he returned again, and on that occasion he lost £170 in cash, and his check for £150, which were handed over to Mr. Bond. On the 29th of June Mr. Fitzroy Stanhope came, and lost £3 in cash, and a £50 draft on Herries and Co., bankers, St. James's-street, but I do not know whether it was paid or not. On the 10th of August subsequent I recollect Mr. Breddell coming again and losing £200, for which I received his check, which was paid the subsequent morning. On the 25th of August the Marquis of Conyngham came and lost £500, for which he gave his bill to Mr. Bond, which I hereby saw paid. On the 27th Lord Cantilupe lost £400, cash £200, and a bill for £200, which he held of the defendant Bond. On the 26th General Churchill lost £50, for which he gave a draft on his agents, Messrs. Cox and Greenwood, which was paid. On the 3rd of December the Marquis of Conyngham again visited the house, and lost £500, for which he gave his bill.—Cross-examined: I live at Chelsea, on my own means. I knew not who the plaintiff is. I have not the slightest interest in the present inquiry. I know a person of the name of Fearon. I never applied to him to make false dice. The defendant and I had some differences. I said him. I never, in the absence of Mr. Massey Stanley, asked a person of the name of Smith to make false dice. The money which Captain Courtney lost he paid in Bank of England notes. I never was charged with not paying over to the defendant the amount of a cheque bill which Captain Duff paid. I did pay it over to the defendant in the coffee-room, along with £5 which Captain Duff had lost at hazard.—Charles Andrew Breddell, Esq., of Cadogan-place, Chelsea, corroborated the last witness, and produced the two checks for £200, which he had lost at the defendant's house.—Captain Courtney was next called, and stated that he had only visited the house four times, and had lost a few hundred pounds, but had no precise recollection of losing the particular sum of £100, as stated in the declaration. A clerk from Cox and Greenwood's proved the payment of the £50 check on the part of General the defendant, in a person of the name of Starkie, the nephew of the defendant.—The Marquis of Conyngham, Lord Cantilupe, and Mr. Fitzroy Stanhope were called, and not appearing, Mr. Platt addressed the jury on the part of the defendant, and contended that if even they believed Thompson, the plaintiff's witness, in point of law he could not recover, inasmuch as the declaration charged the defendant with receiving money for gambling in the parish of St. James, whereas the payment of the money took place in the City, and he requested his lordship to reserve the point.—His lordship expressed a doubt how far the point would avail the defendant. The learned counsel, having concluding a most eloquent address, Lord Abinger most elaborately summed up the evidence.—The jury, after half an hour's deliberation, found a verdict for the plaintiff on five counts in the declaration, and for the defendant on all the others.—The damages, including the penalties, were for £3308.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT.

Lord George Lettus, son of the Marquis of Ely, appeared from the Queen's Prison, to be discharged. Three creditors had entered notice of opposition, but did not appear. Some inquiry was made as to property left by the insolvent at an hotel in Brussels, and it appeared that he had not been out on bail. His counsel said he had been eleven months in prison, and added that all the bona fide debts would be paid, but there were certain persons in the schedule for bill transactions that it would be a pity his father's property should be used to pay; his father had already paid £13,000 of his debts.—Mr. Commissioner Harris remarked that the debts in the aggregate were set forth at £152,000. Counsel corrected the commissioner. The debts were in the aggregate but £15,000, and they were, of course, entered over and over again.—The Court ordered his discharge.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

(Before the Recorder.)

Frances Rugg, 60, widow; Henry Rugg, 28, baker; George Nathaniel Stephens, 36, tailor; James Moland, alias Leeson, alias Christopher; James Rugg, 35, porter; and Thomas Harris, 24, shoemaker, who were on Saturday convicted of a misdemeanor, in having, by false pretences, defrauded the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery of the sum of £40, were, on Monday morning, sentenced as follows:—James Moland and G. N. Stephens, as being the chief conspirators in the fraud, to seven years' transportation; Thomas Morris and Henry Rugg, to one year's imprisonment, with hard labour; Frances Rugg, one year's imprisonment, without hard labour; and it was ordered that Henry Rugg, being in an ill state of health, should not be put to the labour usually performed.

Jeremiah Ironside, 24, and Peter Francis, 28, were charged with a misdemeanor, in unlawfully obtaining from Johanna Diedrich Lohmann four half-crowns, his moneys. Mr. Payne was instructed for the defendants. It appeared, from the testimony of several witnesses, that the prisoners had hit upon an ingenious method of raising the wind. Smith and Francis were Germans, and they got hold of some of their countrymen who were in needy circumstances, and, looking for employment, and introduced them to the effect that they who were recommended to be the bearers of some public establishment, and who was in a position to get them situations if they paid him a certain sum. By this representation the defendants succeeded, in several instances, in getting small sums of money from poor fellows who were seeking employment.—The jury returned a verdict of "Guilty," but recommended Smith to mercy, on the ground that they believed he had not been so active a share in the frauds as the other prisoners.—The Recorder, having commented in appropriate terms upon the heartlessness of the defendants' conduct, sentenced Francis and Driscoll to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour for eighteen calendar months, and Smith to two months of the same punishment.

Samuel Barnard, alias Samuel Bernard Ruffell, was charged with having obtained a quantity of goods by false pretences. The jury found the prisoner "Guilty;" and he was ordered to be imprisoned, and kept at hard labour in the House of Correction for six calendar months.

Samuel Hazeldon was charged with wilful and corrupt perjury.—Mr. Wilde conducted the prosecution, and Mr. Doane appeared for the defendant. It appeared that a person named Mosley had adopted legal proceedings against another named Arnold, the present prosecutor, and the defendant was employed to serve him with a copy of a writ. He afterwards made an affidavit that he had done so. Mr. Arnold, and some members of his family, swore positively that the statement made by the defendant was false; and it also appeared that he had omitted, when taken into custody, that he did not serve the writ upon Arnold.—A witness was called on behalf of the defendant, who swore that on the day referred to in his affidavit he saw him give a copy of a writ to a person who he said was Arnold, the defendant in the action. The prosecutor was recalled, and he said the prisoner had been in his company a hundred times, and that it was impossible he could have mistaken any one else for him.—The jury found the prisoner "Guilty," and he was sentenced to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour for six calendar months.

SENTENCES.—In the course of the day judgment was pronounced upon a number of prisoners, and some were brought up to have their sentences revised. Subjoined are the principal adjudications during the sitting of the Court:—To be Transported for Seven Years, 50; for Ten Years, 16; for Fourteen Years, 1; for Fifteen Years, 2. Imprisonment and hard labour, For Two Years, 5; for Eighteen Months, 1; for One Year, 15; and a great many to shorter terms.

The Court, at its rising, adjourned to Monday next, the 13th instant, when the December Sessions commence, at ten o'clock in the morning.

SURREY SESSIONS.

(Before Mr. Puckle and full bench of magistrates.)

George Meldram, a young man of respectable connections, his father being a wealthy farmer in Essex, surrendered on Saturday morning in court. The prisoner was indicted for stealing, on the 20th of November, from the person of John Carlton Nicholson, at Walworth, a banker's check for the amount of £4 6s., the property of Messrs. Overend and Gurney, bill and wine-merchants.—Mr. Charnock appeared for the prisoner, and called a witness to prove that his client had not taken the check with any felonious intent, but that he had taken it for the purpose of restoring it to the prosecutor on the following day, and was absolutely in search of him when the policeman came and took him into custody. The learned counsel called a host of witnesses to character.—The jury, after a short deliberation, acquitted the prisoner; upon which the chairman, addressing him, said that he was very fortunate to have escaped conviction, for the Court was in possession of a document of which there was little doubt he was the author, and had it been received as evidence, would surely have led to a very different result to that which the trial had taken. The prisoner then bowed and left the dock.

POLICE.

MANSION-HOUSE.—Deputy Peacock and some other gentlemen of the corporation waited upon the Lord Mayor for the purpose of complaining to his lordship of the shooting upon the Artillery ground at Woolwich. The deputy said, that on the day before, in passing by the Woolwich Artillery ground in one of the Star Company's boats, a ball passed over the raised ground into the river, within a few yards of the bow of the vessel. He considered that if the ball had passed a little nearer to him very great destruction would have taken place. The captain of the Howe vessel had undergone a similar accident on a steamer some years ago, and two or three years since the head of a waterman was actually blown off from the gunnery at Woolwich.—The Lord Mayor said, he had never heard of such a calamity, and asked whether it was generally known.—Deputy Peacock said it certainly ought to have been made known, and he did not know how it could have been concealed from the public knowledge.—Mr. Hobler said, the complaints had been made of the danger arising from the practice in the Artillery-ground, and that a representation to the effect had been given to the authorities in putting a stop to it.—One of the deputation to the Lord Mayor said, that bombs often struck the opposite bank of the river.—The Lord Mayor said, that the practice ought not to be extended to the river, and that he would at once write to the Ordnance Department upon the subject.

GUILDHALL.—Jane Jones, aged 34, a native of Merionethshire, was charged with begging before Sir Peter Laurie, on Monday, and expressing a wish to go home, if she could get a pair of shoes, Sir Peter discharged her and gave her an entire suit, and a pair. Shortly after she came back to say she could not think of leaving London, unless she had a pair of new pocketing. Sir Peter refused to extend the order, and she refused it, and it was torn up. On Thursday she renewed her application, but required shoes only. Mr. Alderman Copeland would not now give her shoes. Upon leaving the court she smashed a pane of glass, of the value of 7s., and was immediately charged with the wilful damage.—Mr. Alderman Copeland told her he should not indulge her wish to go to prison. Her proper course was to apply to some union for relief. The prisoner, on being discharged, smashed a second pane in the outer office. Mr. Alderman Copeland then committed her to Bridewell for two months.

CLERKENWELL.—Henry Stanhope Wentworth, alias Dr. Henry Stanhope, a monster in human shape, who has undergone numerous examinations before Mr. Combe, charged with a series of offences, was again placed at the bar.—Mr. Justin appeared for the prosecution, and stated that he could bring forward at the least fifty cases of robbery committed by the prisoner under most villainous circumstances.—The prisoner, it will be recollected, took apartments a few months back at Mr. Menzie's, in Charles-street, Clerkenwell, and on the same evening he stole from his landlord's sleeping-room two watches, value forty guineas, with which he decamped. Other similar robberies have, since he was in custody, also been charged against him, and to day tokens were two fresh ones—one of plundering Mr. Bruce, of 36, Wakefield-street, Regent-square, with whom he had been lodgings, of a quantity of jewellery; and another of obtaining from Mr. Eggs the gunmaker of Pall-mall, a brace of duelling pistols under false pretences. It also appeared that the prisoner, by his plausible manner, MORNING AND EVENING FAMILY PRAYERS, for every day in the year. By the Rev J. Morison, D.D. Assisted by Contributions from the Rev. Drs. Harris and Campbell, Messrs. Morris, Ultimates, &c. The work is strongly recommended by the Rev. Henry Melvill, Rev. Bourwood, D.D., G. Cheever, D.D., Robert Hall[illegible], Rev. James Sherman, J. Pye Smith, D.D., E. Vaughan, D.D., Ralph Wardlaw, D.D., John Kelly, J. Jeffrey, D.D., Caleb Morris, Thomas Raffles, D.D.

"The plan of the work is simple but instructive. For every day in the year, morning and evening, suitable prayers are given; commencing for the former part of the day the last of the preceding, and for the latter part of the day the first of the following, separate chapter from the Old Testament, and for the evening a text from the New Testament. A comprehensive prayer follows, illustrative of the portion of scripture, arranged to be read, and closely adapted to the text given."

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XXII.

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM

The Duke of Buckingham, whose portrait is peculiarly fitted to fill a place in the gallery of a number of our journal, which, we hope, we have made especially interesting to our agricultural readers, is better known in the world of politics by the title of Marquis of Chandos, under which he sat in the House of Commons, than by the title he bears as the inheritor of a ducal coronet and a seat in the House of Peers. As the Marquis of Chandos he first entered public life; as the Marquis of Chandos he attached himself to, and on all occasions advocated, the agricultural interest—an interest which is more comprehensive than almost any other, since what class, trade, profession, or even dignity, is not affected by it? All men are not philosophers, but all men may say with the philosophic Jacques of Shakspere, that they "do live by food;" the pursuit that provides the means whereby they live cannot therefore be uninteresting to any one section of society. This was recognised as a truth at a very early period in the history of mankind; we have no older record of his acts than the one which says "the profit of the earth is for all, the king himself is served by the field." And the influence of land has almost always been all-powerful in the government of states; the feudal system was the exercise of power by the possession of land unchecked by the influence of the wealth derived from commerce; land was power insomuch as he who had the most of it could support the greatest number of knights, and the value of a good stout partizan was not small in the days, when an Earl de Warrenne, questioned rather more closely than convenient by King John's commissioners as to the title by which he held certain lands, could throw his sword before the judgment seat at Westminster, and say "that is my title,"—rather a posing reply to an interrogatory in a suit in equity. All this has long passed away; other interests have arisen to importance in the State, but the lords of the soil are still to a very great degree the possessors of political power.

But great as the influence of the landed interest has been, it has had a hard battle to fight against the numerous interests that have been and are still banded against it. From the time when the "robber chiefs" of the Rhine, as territorial lords, built castles and erected strongholds, from which they levied tolls and contributions on the country around, occasionally plundering in a more undisguised method; and the Burghers of the Hanse Towns made a league against them, burning their castles and cutting the throats of the owners as the most effectual way of abating the nuisance—from that period till the present hour, land and commerce have been to a greater or less degree arrayed against each other. There is much mouth speech in the way of denial of this position, and that on both sides; but on both sides also there is a little self-deception. Let us pass speedies and come to facts. Look at the two colours on the hustings, the two commissioners at the close of Coningsby in the columns of the Morning Post, and the pages of the Bread-tax Circular; read the mutual denunciations, the exaggerated assertions, the consequences of change, painted on one side in hues bright as the rainbow, on the other shadowed forth as darkly as the sky of midnight, and by both parties, in all probability, overdrawn. The battle has changed the form of its weapons, but is not altered in the spirit of its enmity. The swords and spears of the Burghers of the Hanse Towns appear again in the tracts, and lecturers, and subscribed thousands of the Anti-corn-law League. Most deeply do we regret the bitterness of feeling that has been mingled by both parties in the question; but we are not about to inflict an essay on the Corn-law contest on the reader, in the disguise of a sketch of the Duke of Buckingham; it is only necessary to give some notion of the state of the quarrel, before describing the great champion of one of the principal contending parties.

Richard Plantagenet Nugent Bridges Chandos Grenville, Duke of Buckingham, is the second peer from the new creation, or rather revival of the title in 1822. He is a man distinguished for birth and wealth, even among an aristocracy in which there are so many both high-born and wealthy. With his broad lands and far-spreading acres, he inherits the blood of the Plantagenets. He has always been placed in a position in which he could hardly avoid being conspicuous; he seemed to be

> "By the hand of nature marked, > Quoted, and signed"

to be a leader; and surrounded as he has been by all the influences that bear on "his order," it is not surprising that he chose his side with the party whose interests he deemed identical with his own. But he not only linked himself with the politics of the Conservative party; he associated his name with one particular interest, and that interest he fought for with a boldness, earnestness, and consistency that made him, beyond all his compeers, the champion of the cause. When the influence of the landowners was threatened by the provisions of the Reform Bill, he introduced and carried the fifty-pound tenant-at-will clause, which secured to the land that preponderance which he contended was its due. The repeal, or the modification of the Corn-laws he has always opposed. It was the fact of the Duke of Buckingham forming one of Sir R. Peel's Cabinet that induced a general feeling of confidence among the agricultural party as to the maintenance of the corn duties. The first intimation of the coming change was the accession of the duke from the Cabinet, in the early part of last session. He retired with the dignity of the "blue riband;" and some doubts have been thrown on the consistency of his conduct on the occasion, but it does not appear that he has changed his opinions. His support of the recent changes has been very modified.

For the personnel of the noble duke we must refer to our portrait. When in the House of Commons he was a frequent speaker, generally displaying an earnestness and knowledge of his subject, possessing also a good command of language. His station, too, gave that weight to his opinions which wealth and rank will always secure. He succeeded to the peerage in 1839. He has great church interest, having thirteen livings in his gift; and is the lord of some half-dozen of the finest mansions in the kingdom, among which is the one immortalized by the pen of Pope, who, in pronouncing the effect of good taste and wealth, says that, where these are found—

> "Time may make the mansion grow
> A work to wonder at—perhaps a Stowe."

Sir James Graham will not (we understand) attend the Privy Council at Windsor on this day in consequence of Lady Graham and the family of the right Hon. Secretary for the Home Department having lately had an attack of scarlet fever, from the effects of which, however, we are happy to say they are fast recovering.

At a meeting of the proprietors of the Grand Junction Canal Company, held on Tuesday, at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, the report stated that the net tounages for the half year ending June were £10,276 less than in the preceding six months—a falling off attributable to the general depression of trade in the country. A dividend of £5 10s. was declared for the half year.

THE FIRE IN FRIDAY-STREET.—For several days past the chief officers attached to the City police force have been actively engaged under the direction of the Commissioner, in tracing out, but without success, a clerk of the name of John Shawman, on a charge of robbing his employers, Messrs. Harvey, Brand, and Co., Scotch shawl merchants, of Friday-street, Cheapside, and also on suspicion of having wilfully attempted to burn down their warehouse. The partners having questioned the accused, were not satisfied with his explanations, and were about sending to the Mansion House for an officer, when he contrived to leave the warehouse unobserved, and has not since been heard of, carrying with him notes to the amount, it is said, of £500. Information of the robbery has been forwarded throughout the country, offering a reward of £30 for his apprehension. He is described as being five feet eight inches high, fair hair and whiskers, and in age about thirty-nine years.

FATAL EFFECTS OF TERROR.—A young man was committed last week to Bridewell from Guildhall by Alderman Farebrother, on a charge of having broken a window in the shop of Messrs. Doudney, of Fleet-street. The worthy magistrate declared his intention of seeking an old act of parliament, by which, he believed, "flogging at the cart's tail" might be inflicted at the termination of his imprisonment. The accused appeared in good health when charged at the police-office, but on entering the prison he became very ill, and gradually sinking died at an early hour on Sunday morning.

ACCIDENT IN THE LOWTHER-ARCADE.—On Tuesday morning a youth named West, seventeen years of age, the nephew of Mr. West, of the Lowther-arcade, Strand, fell from the first floor window to the pavement below, falling upon his head. The unfortunate youth was instantly conveyed to Charing-cross Hospital, where it was ascertained that, in addition to a fractured skull, he had sustained a violent concussion of the brain. He lies in a hopeless state.

COMMERCIAL NEWS.

The information received from the manufacturing districts during the week has been in every respect satisfactory, confirming, as it fully does, all the predictions which we ventured to make in our last publication concerning the probable and speedy restoration of commerce and of manufactures to a sound and healthy state. At the outports cotton wool has continued in considerable demand, not for speculation, but for actual consumption; and the sales effected have been large, the advance in prices which had occurred during the previous week being fully maintained. In Glasgow these favourable symptoms of returning prosperity are more particularly visible. Money, which during the late commercial depression throughout the west of Scotland had been deposited in the joint-stock banks for safety, is now again gradually coming into circulation, increasing the wages of labour, and materially adding to the wealth of the community. Many factories, as we mentioned in our last, which, for several years past, have been idle, are again placed in active operation, giving, in abundance, productive labour to additional thousands of families. The fact is, "the stocks of goods on hand, suitable to the markets of India and China, are small, and by no means equal to the expected demand during the ensuing spring and summer months; and to make good this, at all events, probable deficiency causes, in a certain degree, the existing activity." At Ashburton, and throughout Devonshire and the neighbouring districts, a great deal of business has been done latterly amongst the manufacturers of serges and other articles of the same description, to the great advantage of the working-classes. Many establishments in this line which had ceased working for several years are again in employment, and we mention one in particular which, after having been closed for nearly five years, last week gave productive labour to nearly fifteen hundred human beings. Leeds, Bradford, Wakefield, and those parts wherein sheep's wool is the principal raw material of manufacture, the accounts received latterly are equally satisfactory. The revival of trade was general, and the unexpected harvest of the present year's wool was almost universally entertained. A fair demand already existed for woollen good, and a gradual improvement in prices was also in progress. Under these favourable circumstances, labour, which is the nation's real wealth, everywhere was becoming more abundant, the advantages of which the labourers must soon reap in advanced wages. In London, which may well be called the beating centre of the civilised portion of the globe, notwithstanding partial disadvantages, greater activity than usual is everywhere displayed, and public credit and general confidence between man and man are rapidly on the increase. In the sugar market, since the reduction of the duty of 63s per cwt., now chargeable on foreign sugar, to one of 30s, and also that of 24s per cwt., now paid on colonial and East India sugar, to one of 16s. These proposed alterations, if carried into effect, must ultimately do more than double the existing home consumption of sugar, add materially to the present comforts of all the industrious classes of society, and eventually increase the sum now annually paid into the treasury from this great source of public revenue in proportion to the increase of its consumption. For coffee and many other descriptions of colonial produce the consumption increases, and considering the late reduction of the duties previously charged on various of these articles, fair and remunerating prices continue to be obtained by their proprietors. These are all undoubtedly pleasing prospects, but when we direct our attention to the operations in Mark-lane, this scene of gratification entirely changes. On the Corn Exchange, that most important of all marts to the human race, no improvement in the value of any description of agricultural produce is yet visible, and, when we mention the London Corn Exchange, we at the same time include the corn-markets throughout Europe and America, because round it all the others revolve. Since our last report no activity whatever has been evinced in the sales of grain, and the value of all descriptions of agricultural produce remained very much depressed. The stocks of really fine foreign duty-paid wheats, in particular, are becoming less and less weighty on the different great markets of consumption, and sales of home-grown grain must become easy in proportion to the failing away of foreign competition. This circumstance, added to the well-authenticated deficiency in quantity which the last crop produced, encourages the opinion that, within a few months, the corn trade will be restored again to a healthy condition.

Little alteration has occurred in money matters during the week. The value of public securities, not funded, is rather lower. The premium of 55s., which Exchequer Bills commanded last week, has fallen to one of 50s., occasioned partly by considerable sales made by those who anticipate to commence a more profitable employment for their money in the purchase of Exchequer Bill investments, and partly by the certainty of their interest being reduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when the time arrives for their renewal. In Consols, for the opening next month, little business is at present doing, and prices remain extremely steady. Little stock of the description has for years now been floating in the market, and, fortunately, there is little inducement for rumous speculative operations. Capitalists continue to direct their attention to railroad investments, and their operations have caused the shares of the London and Birmingham line to advance to a premium of £102 on each. In foreign securities the transactions of the week have been few, and have not in manner attracted public attention. For the discount of approved commercial bills, money continues to be plentiful, and the rates of interest continue to be unusually moderate. On the whole the money market cannot be placed in a more wholesome condition than we left it when our present number went to press. There is abundance of it in circulation for the numerous purposes of the revival of trade, and the Bank of England also retains within her vaults specie of little less value than twelve millions sterling.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—The arrivals of English wheat coastwise, as well as by land carriage, and samples up to our market having been very small this week, we have had a trifling improvement in the demand for that description of corn at fully, but at nothing quotable beyond, previous currencies, and good clearances have been effected by the traders. In foreign wheat, we have and in bond, exceedingly little business has been transacted at late rates. The barley trade has again ruled inactive, and the prices have been with difficulty supported. Good sound malt has met a fair, other kinds a dull, sale, at unaltered quotations. On account of the receipts of oats from Ireland having been on the increase that article has sold heavily, on somewhat easier terms, say 6d per quarter. Beans and peas have been unending, and, in some cases, is per quarter cheaper. Flour has mostly supported its value.

ARRIVALS.—English: wheat, 2180; barley, 5250; oats, 3130; and malt, 2320 quarters; flour, 2070 sacks. Irish: barley, 00; oats, 3310 quarters. Foreign: wheat, 4860 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 46s to 55s; ditto white, 57s to 60s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 49s to 57s; do. white, 51s to 58; rye, 34s to 38s; grinding barley, 27s to 29s; malting do., 30s to 32s; Chevalier, 32s to 34s; Suffolk and Norfolk malt, 56s to 62s; brown do., 50s to 54s; Kingston and Ware, 56s to 62s; Chevalier, 63s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 23s to 24s; potato do., 25s to 26s; Youghal and Cork, black, 17s to 18s; do. white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, new, 34s to 36s; do. old, 34s to 38s; grey peas, 36s to 38s; maple, 33s to 34s; white, 30s to 32s; boilers, 32s to 37s; per quarter. Town-made flour, 40s to 42s; Suffolk, 38s to 40s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 36s to 38s; per 280 lbs. Foreign.—Free wheat, 50s to 62s. In Bond. Barley, 20s; oats, new, 18s to 17s; do. feed, 14s to 16s; beans, 20s to 26s; peas, 23s to 27s; per quarter. Flour, America, 23s to 24s; Baltic, 22s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—Linseed and rapeseed have gone off steadily, but in all other kinds of seeds exceedingly little is passing.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 48s to 57s; Baltic, crushing, 42s to 46s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 45s to 46s; hempseed, 38s to 40s; per quarter; rapeseed, 19s to 20s per cwt.; brown mustard seed, 10s to 11s; white do., 10s to 10s 6d; tares, 5s 6d to 6s 0d per bushel; English rapeseed, new, 36l to 38l per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, 9l 10s to 10l 10s; do. foreign, 7l to 7l 10s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, 5l 5s to 6l per ton.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 48s 6d; barley, 27s 9d; Oats, 17s 9d; rye, 38s 1d; beans, 30s 11d; peas, 34s 5d.

Imperial Averages of Six Weeks which govern Duty.—Wheat, 49s 1d; Barley, 28s 1d; Oats, 17s 10d; Rye, 30s 11d; Beans, 31s 7d; Peas, 33s 9d per quarter.

Duty on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s 0d; Barley, 9s 0d; Oats, 8s 0d; Rye, 10s 6d; Beans, 10s 6d; Peas, 9s 6d.

Bread.—The price of wheaten bread are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5½d to 6½d for the 4lb loaf.

Tea.—This market wears a dull aspect, and, in some cases, rather lower prices have been taken by the merchants.

Sugar.—We have very little variation to notice in the value of any kind of sugar since our last. The market is well supplied with inferior description.

Coffee.—The market is steady for home use, and prices are quite as high as last week.

Rice.—This article is rather dull, but the quotations are quite as high.

Oils.—We have again to report much dulness in oils, at about previous rates.

Provisions.—We have had very little business doing in Irish butter. Foreign qualities are unaltered, with a sluggish demand. The bacon market is firm, but we cannot call prices higher Tallow.—The market is, on the whole, dull, yet prices keep up. P.A.C. on the spot is 38s 3d.

Wool.—The public sales have gone off with much spirit, at prices fully equal to those of the last auctions.

Coals.—Old Tanfield, 16s 6d; Townley, 16s; Killingworth, 18s 6d; Stewarts, 22s; Caradoc, 22s; Hartlepool, 22s; Hartley, 17s per ton. Ships arrived, 12.

Smithfield.—The supplies of each kind of stock on offer having proved large, the demand has ruled heavy, at drooping prices. Beef, from 3s 2d to 4s 4d; mutton, 3s to 4s 2d; veal, 3s 6d to 4s 4d; and pork, 3s 6d to 4s 4d per 8lbs., to sink the offal.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—Beef, from 2s 10d to 3s 6d; mutton, 2s 10d to 3s 10d; veal, 3s 4d to 4s; and pork, 3s 4d to 4s per 8lbs., by the carcase. In these markets the trade has ruled excessively heavy at the above quotations.

DEMORALIZING PUBLICATIONS.

A case has been attracting the notice of our contemporaries, which, although springing out of the mere adventures of a police-office, naturally and strongly invites comment at the hands of the journalist who professes to have a regard for family morality, and a desire to preserve intact the decencies and purities of social life. It would seem that a powerful and noxious stream of poison has been gradually, insidiously—and what is worse, with impunity—mingling with the waters of society, and corrupting them—not in their dark and shaded windings, but in the shining presence of the sun. The pestiferous and dangerous evil to which we allude is the open and defianceful sale and exhibition,—before the face of daylight, and in the teeth of the law,—of low, blasphemous, and infamous placards and publications—of the vilest order—the most horrible and loathsome impiety—the most cankerous and leprous in their defiling and brutalizing spirit—and calculated to work upon the minds of the lower classes with the most disgusting and vitiating effect. These publications—which seem to have succeeded, and, perhaps, in a measure, to have sprung out of the dying corruptions of Socialism—have been latterly horribly on the increase. They are thrust into the shop windows of the lowest order of abandoned ruffians—in the full blaze of their profligacy—and in the open thoroughfares and public streets—and nothing can exceed the revolting nature of the outrage against decency and religion which they have been so long suffered to commit. The legislature, however,—strong as it is to do the public that crying act of justice,—has never interfered to put them down—while the "Society for the Suppression of Vice," with its abundant funds and large appliances of power, has lain lazy, dormant, and inert—content with the torpid virtue of character, without displaying any of the active benevolence and useful humanity which are the incumbent duties of an establishment of the kind. The ulcer of blasphemy has been allowed to spread, and now it seems only by an accident that public indignation is directed to obliterate the sore. The casualty we have to speak of arose thus:—

A Mr. Lewis Knight Bruce, a son of the Vice-chancellor, while passing down Holywell-street (a locality by the way which is one of the most pestiferous and abominable in the metropolis, although still a bustling and busy thoroughfare), was struck with the prominence of a placard in a shop window, which upon inspection he discovered to be of the most horrible and revolting description. In itself it outraged every feeling of Christianity; conjured obscene associations with whatever is deemed of sacred import and has a reverenced and holy name; invoked wretched contempt and fierce brutal hostility for and against the great Deity himself, and put the fiat of unblushing crime upon every sentence of the polluted document which it enrolled in shameless print. Mr. Bruce experienced the natural emotions of horror and disgust at the sight of the vile abomination, and entering the shop demanded its removal of a boy who had the irresponsible charge of the repository of filth and sin. On meeting with a refusal, he took the law into his own hands, breaking the shop windows, snatching away the placard, and on resigning himself to custody, and being taken to Bow-street for the offence of breaking the glass, displaying it to the magistrate as an infamy which justified the act of violence he had committed against it.

The magistrate rather encouraged Mr. Bruce to glory in what he had done than the reverse, and, dispensing with the usual fine, merely required him to pay for the windows, at the same time impounding the amount of the damage to see whether the miscreant publisher of the blasphemy would come and claim it in a court that would then be enabled to take cognizance of his crime.

We could almost find it in our hearts to join the magistrate in praising the conduct of Mr. Bruce if justice did not whisper to us that it was founded in indiscretion, and that the decision of the bench was itself obnoxious to sound judgment. We readily enter into the warm and generous impulses of the high-spirited young gentleman who felt his whole being outraged by the indecent blasphemy which he had pulled down—we can imagine him horror-struck, indignant, and inflamed with an almost virtuous passion at the depraved exhibition that met his gaze—and we can make allowance for the blood of manhood rushing impetuously through veins warm and young, on a question which ruffled his judgment and disturbed and agitated his heart. Nevertheless we know that he committed, in the act of violence, a fault against society, which the law may palliate by circumstance, but has no right to recognise as justifiable merely because it leads to good. Mr. Bruce should have been fined. The state of society in England demands that men should not break windows upon virtuous impulse! That would never do. When poor men starve, and, under the new poor-law, break windows in their destitution to obtain the shelter of a workhouse or a gaol, they are punished in spite of all the allowance to be made for hunger, misery, and perhaps a goading, stinging, infuriating conviction of the cruelty and injustice of their want. We do not in their cases allow the emotions or the infirmities of human nature to put the peace and order of society in jeopardy, upon principles either of humanity or of right. We should not therefore do it in the case of Mr. Bruce; but, as the punishment would probably be light to the pauper, so might the fine have been made so to the gentleman; and the magistrate's opinion might have marked his sense of the goodness of his motive, while the law vindicated its supremacy upon the indiscretion of the act. Mr. Jardine might have honoured and admired Mr. Bruce—as we are glad to acknowledge we do ourselves—but he should have fined him also, nevertheless.

The adventure, however, is, or rather will be, a source of decided good; it has disclosed a fester to society which it dare not now suffer to grow to head; it has opened a sewer which the law is bound to cleanse; it has stirred the eloquence of the press to put down blasphemy and impurity, as by the utterance of a single voice; it has directed public indignation against a band of ruffians who would live and fatten upon the vice of the community, and engender wickedness which they can neither control nor understand. Moreover, it will make men ask wholesome questions of each other. Where has been the vaunted vigilance of the "Society for the Suppression of Vice?" Where are your protectors of public morality? Where your public prosecutors? And in what corners of concealment are the domestic functions of your governments allowed to sleep? The horrors of a brutal and obscene impiety are displayed to all orders of your public congregation, and within a stone's cast of your church; and there is neither clergyman, nor magistrate, nor churchwarden, nor officer of justice, to step in and put it down.

We may contemplate with awful dread the frame of mind that could engender Atheism, and still claim a soul—we may regard Deism with a sorrowfulness akin to shame—we may form various estimates of the religious efficacy of the several creeds of Christianity—and we may hold the established religion of our country to be the purest, the most beautiful, the best; but we do not, particularly in the columns of a newspaper, seek to force our opinions upon others, or stir one step upon the path of theological disputation. We will tolerate all things, save those which are degrading, immoral, and unjust. Blasphemy and obscenity are all these. Lord Erskine has laid it down as law, that opinions and religions in England are free—that a man's belief is a question which can be mooted only between his conscience and his God, but that no man has a right to more than this spiritual freedom; that no man is entitled to disturb the peace of society by violating feelings which are accepted as of holy birth and growth, and which custom has admitted sacred—in a word, that he may not offensively and notoriously commit a moral desecration of the faith in which other men enshrine their hopes of happiness to come. A man may be opposed to Christian burial, but he may not, therefore, unearth our graves or disturb a funeral on its progress to the tomb. The principle is the same. The law gives the licence to opinion, but stands in the teeth of indecent violence, and sets the bounds of order and society against the inroads of blasphemy and moral filth. Now then let the law be vindicated by the authorities, and the horrible monstrosities we have recorded be punished in proportion to their flagrancy, and to the disgust and loathing by which they are regarded by good citizens and honest and virtuous men.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—It appears by the Paris papers of Sunday that the King of the French, after presiding at a cabinet council on Saturday, left the Tuileries in the afternoon for Fontainbleau, and was expected to return to Paris on Monday.

The Moniteur contains Royal ordonnances on the report of the Keeper of the Seals, making various judicial changes and promotions. M. Moreau, counsellor of the Cour Royale, replaces the late M. Dupuy as President of that court.

The Moniteur publishes returns of the Minister of Marine and Colonies of the number of slaves emancipated by virtue of the royal ordonnances since the end of 1830. The numbers stand thus: Martinique, 21,816; Guadaloupe, 12,016; French Guiana, 1354; Bourbon, 4134.—Total, 39,820.

The interesting trial of the employés of the Versailles Left Bank Railroad, for the responsibility attached to the frightful 8th of May catastrophe, has ended, after several days, by the acquittal of the accused. The court condemned the civil parties demanding damages in the costs, amounting, it is said, to upwards of 10,000f. (£400). This last part of the decision has been regarded as a great hardship for the survivors and the relatives of the unfortunate victims of the accident; but the Gazette des Tribunaux explains that the Judges could not decide otherwise according to the law.

SPAIN. We are indebted to the Morning Post for the following account of the bombardment of Barcelona and surrender of the town to the Queen's troops, supplied by the intelligent correspondent of that paper.

"Barcelona, Dec. 4. Four P.M.

"I send you a few hurried lines by the first steamer leaving for France to give you a few details of the bombardment of Barcelona. The town can no longer be recognised, it is destroyed in several parts, and the buildings are still burning. The French sailors are rendering every assistance with their engines to put out the fire, and assist the inhabitants, who have undergone a frightful bombardment of twelve hours. The Captain-General of Catalonia commenced the fire from the fort of Monjuich yesterday at half past eleven, until past midnight. The firing ceased this morning, and a parliamentaire again summoned the town to surrender at discretion, or, in the event of refusal, the bombardment was to recommence at four o'clock. The hard terms were accepted, and the disarmament of the corpos francos has begun. A white flag is waving on all the buildings to demand an arrangement. The troops, with the Captain-General Van Halen and his staff, have just entered. The house of the French consul received three shells and a cannon-ball, as the artillerymen from the fort of Monjuich aimed at the dismantling of the tricoloured flag which waved over the house.

"December 5.

"I have just been going over the town to witness the extent of the disasters it has experienced from the bombardment. The damage done is immense, and nearly all the houses have more or less suffered. A great many buildings are destroyed, among which is that of a Deputy of the Cortes, Senor Velosegui, valued at £2000. Some notion may be formed of the extent of the damage done by the shelling, when I mention that 817 bombs were thrown from the fort of Monjuich. The Barcelonese will have it that the engineers and artillerymen of the English, as well as their ammunition, did all the mischief, although the crews of the ships of war remained on board spectators of the work of devastation.

"The Captain-General, by a decree dated yesterday, has dissolved the National Guards, and every individual who does not give up his arms will be punished with death. A forced contribution of £400,000 is imposed upon the people of Barcelona, and the state of siege is maintained. The Regent has not yet entered here, but the Captain-General and Zurbano are seen in the streets. It is impossible to describe the melancholy aspect of the population. The English ships of war saluted this morning, and the Queen's troops replied from the fort of the Atarazanas."

The Messager of Monday night contained the following despatch:—

"PERPIGNAN, Dec. 9.—The shops were closed yesterday at Barcelona. In default of chiefs 200 soldiers and militia have been arrested, and several of them shot.

"The Cyclops steamer has towed away the Formidable, and an English frigate has also left.

"The French Government steamer Gassendi left Barcelona yesterday evening, and touched at Port Jendres, with despatches and 21 military passengers.

"Van Halen has prorogued for six hours, from the 6th, the time granted to deliver up arms. The uninhabited houses are to be left open, to be certain if there be any arms concealed therein."

(From the Barcelona Impartial of the 6th inst.)

THE bombardment commenced from the fort of Montjuich on the 3rd, and lasted until two o'clock in the morning of the 4th. It is calculated that, during that time, one thousand projectiles of different sorts were thrown into the town. The loss occasioned by the bombardment is very great. Several houses have been burnt, several large magazines destroyed, and many of the walls and roofs and doors of other houses have been severely shattered by the bursting of the bombs. Fortunately not many lives were lost. In the midst of the firing a party of men and women were observed in the streets singing, and it is worthy of remark that at such a time so much coolness and indifference to danger should have been shown. The obstinacy of some senseless beings, in seeking to defend themselves against the danger, is the only cause of the misfortunes which have arisen. The alcaldes are deserving of every praise for the services they have rendered to this unfortunate city in such a critical moment, as well as those citizens who so ably seconded their exertions, particularly those who formed part of the junta, and who at that moment put themselves in communication with the Captain-General. General Zurbano entered the city last evening with a battalion of the regiment of the Infante, and at four o'clock they were received by Gen. Van Halen and his staff, followed by two or three battalions and two squadrons of cavalry. The most perfect tranquility now reigns in the city, but a number of people continue to be assembled in the streets and squares. The Regent, followed by the Minister of War and his staff, are at Sarrea, and it is said that to-morrow he will enter Barcelona.

The Toulousain says:—"When the Etna, after towing the Formidable off the sand-bank, passed the Rodney in gaining her anchorage, the captain and officers of the latter took off their hats and cried out several times, 'Thanks, thanks, Sir, you have saved the Formidable!' At the same moment the whole crew manned the yards, and loudly cheered the Etna, and the crew of the Formidable, imitating the same example, gave six cheers for that steamer, which, on its side, replied to each vessel by shouts of 'Vive le Roi.'"

BARCELONA, Dec. 8.—Van Halen has extended the delay for the giving up of the arms and ammunition of the insurgents, twenty-four hours not having sufficed for the purpose. The disarmament will be complete, not even a fowling-piece or a pistol is to be left in the possession of an inhabitant. The number of troops is daily on the increase. More than 12,000 men are now here, and the soldiers are quartered in the houses of the citizens. It is believed that the English treaty of commerce will be signed, and this force will be ready to insure the submission of Catalonia. We have been informed by an officer of engineers, who was in the fort of Monjuich, that the firing only ceased after the bombs had been exhausted, 1600 shot having been fired altogether into the town. The population will insist on the English intervention. They now say that the ships would have fired on the town if there had been a continuation of hostilities; and an aide-de-camp of the Captain-General has asserted that the British vessels were quite ready.

The arrests amount to more than four hundred. The prisoners have been conducted to the citadel, where there is a permanent military commission sitting. Great indignation exists at this arbitrary act, after such a terrible bombardment.

The Regent still remains at Sarrina, one league from the city. Everybody thinks he will not enter here, to find the contrast with his reception in 1840.

The English squadron consists of three ships of the line, two frigates, and one steamer.

AMERICA.—The packet-ship Roscius, Captain Collins, which sailed from New York on the 25th ult., arrived at Liverpool on Wednesday, after a fine passage of 18 days.

The papers received by this conveyance extend from the 21st to the 25th ult. inclusive, but their contents are unimportant.

The Madisonian, the official journal of Washington, has a paragraph on the subject of the rumoured changes in the Cabinet. It says: "Many rumours being abroad of expected changes in the President's Cabinet, we feel it to be our duty to state, as we are able to do, that no changes in the offices of heads of departments are likely to take place before or during the approaching session of Congress; and that whatever change may after that time occur (if any) will be in the spirit of most friendly relation between the President and all the present heads of departments."

Neither the money, the produce, nor the stock market had undergone any material alteration in the interval between the 20th and the 25th ult. Treasury notes had been in demand; some of the banks had been purchasing at par, but not many notes were offering. Foreign exchanges were very firm. The supply of bills was moderate. The receipts from the south had been less than had been anticipated. The rate on London was 106 to 106¼; on Paris, 5f. 40c.; on Amsterdam, 35¾ to 36¼; on Hamburgh, 34¾ to 34¾; and on Bremen, 75¾ to 75¾. Cotton was heavy, and prices were rather in favour of the purchaser. The receipts of flour had been unusually light, and holders were demanding an advance.

The tonnage-duty charged on the British Queen, of which the Belgian Government had complained, had been refunded on the consul of that Government. No doubt was therefore entertained that relations between the United States and Belgium would be restored to their former footing, immediately on the fact being known to the Government of Belgium.

A dreadful gale had taken place on Lake Erie. The Buffalo Commercial Advertiser describes it as most terrific and destructive. The wind blew a perfect hurricane, and the air was so filled with snow that an object could scarcely be seen twenty yards distant. The cold, too, was most intense, and the suffering very severe, in consequence of the entire want of preparation for so sudden a visitation of the angry elements. Eleven vessels were wrecked, and a number of lives lost.

Advices have been received from Havannah, viâ New Orleans, to the 8th ult. The royal mail steamer Thames had arrived at Havannah from Tampico, with 300,000 dollars in specie. She brought advices from the capital of Mexico to the 23d of October. General Brovo arrived on the 20th, and immediately entered on the duties of his office, as President ad interim. His excellency had declared the State of Yucatan in a state of blockade. Except the island of Carmen, whence flour and provisions were permitted to be introduced. The expedition against Yucatan, which had sailed from Vera Cruz, consisted of fifteen sail, carrying 3,900 troops. Mr. Turnbull, who had been arrested on landing on the island, was brought to Havannah on the 3d ult., as a prisoner. His arrival caused a great excitement in the city. There was even talk of putting him to death, but through the exertions of the British consul that disposition of him was changed to an order for immediate departure from the island and a prohibition over its return. On the 6th he was on board the steamship Thames, for Nassau and England. A private letter says, that "Mr. Turnbull pleaded insanity, which plea was admitted, to save trouble, and he was pronounced lunatic."

The advices from Texas are to the 4th ult. General Woll had retreated from San Antonio, taking with him about 70 prisoners.

The Canada papers received by the Roscius come down to the 19th ult., but they do not contain any news.

COUNTRY NEWS.

ABINGDON.—A CHAPTER OF ACCIDENTS.—About eight o'clock on Saturday night last, the utmost alarm prevailed in the town of Abingdon, Berkshire. It appears that a short time previous to the above hour, the Cheltenham van, on arriving near the market-place, unhappily broke down, and the body, with its contents, falling against a house on the roadside, considerable damage to the frontage and the unfortunate driver of the van very narrowly escaped being killed upon the spot; as it was, he sustained a dreadful fracture of the thigh, together with other serious injuries, and lies in a very deplorable state. Several articles of various descriptions, which the van had contained, were strewed about the road, and before they could be removed, a tandem, driven by two Oxonians at a rapid rate, came in collision with the heterogeneous mass, and an upset was the consequence. The drivers fortunately escaped unhurt, but their groom, who was seated behind, was thrown with considerable force to the ground, and when picked up it was discovered that his right arm was fractured between the elbow and shoulder joints. The vehicle having got entangled with the wheels of the van, was shattered to atoms, and the shaft horse much injured. A few days previous to the above, a female lost her life near the same spot, by being driven over by two persons driving tandem; they, however, have hitherto managed to elude detection.

BOLTON.—CONFESSION OF A MURDERER.—Last year a woman named Jackson, the wife of a joiner, came by her death by falling out of a window in Bengal-square, Bolton, which was generally supposed at the time to be the result of accident. There were some slight allusions of a suspicious character made respecting Jackson, her husband, at the time; but he appeared at the inquest and gave an account of the occurrence apparently in an open and candid a manner, that he was believed. He soon after left Bolton, and went to London, where he shortly afterwards re-married. He has recently died, and before his death he made a full confession of his awful guilt, in having caused the death of his wife, by pushing her through the window as she leaned out of it.

BOSTON. POWERFUL EFFECTS OF A DREAM.—Last week when Mr. Robert Tempest, butcher, of Howell croft, Boston, was sleeping in bed with his wife, he dreamed that she had gone out of her mind and become insane, which had such an effect upon him, that he got out of bed and jumped through the room window, breaking eight sash windows, together with the frame. He alighted on the pavement in the street, and in a short time rose up and walked into the house. He received a severe fall, and now lies in a weak state.

CAMBRIDGE.—The Cambridge branch of the Incorporated Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts held its sixteenth annual meeting, at the Town-hall, Cambridge, on Tuesday. The Bishop of Ely took the chair shortly after twelve o'clock, and opened the meeting by reading prayers; at the conclusion of which the secretary, the Rev. J. Pullen, read the report, which contained much of interesting and gratifying information. It spoke of the building up of new churches, the formation of new bishoprics in our dependencies, and of the good prospects of future extension of a pure and abiding Christianity amongst the distant nations. Amongst the sees to be erected, the report mentioned those of New Brunswick, South Australia, the Cape of Good Hope, Ceylon, Sierra Leone, Port Philip, Western Australia, and Northern and Southern India. The secretary read extracts from letters and communications received from the dioceses of Montreal, Toronto, Newfoundland, Australia, Barbadoes, Calcutta, and Bombay, which stated that in each and all of these dependencies the mission of the gospel was proceeding with abundant evidence of present improvement and promise for the future. The Rev. Professor Whewell, Master of Trinity, and Vice-Chancellor of the University moved the adoption of the report. Excellent were also delivered by the Mayor of Cambridge; the Rev. Dr. French, Master of Jesus College; the Rev. Wm. Carus, Dean of Trinity College; George Pryme, Esq., barrister-at-law, and professor of political economy in the University.

Last week John Hunt, who keeps a public-house in Waterbeach Fen, near Cambridge, went into the house with a loaded gun, which he discharged at his wife, and instantly escaped. The gun was discharged at the poor woman's head, and, melancholy to state, the charge blew away part of her lower jaw, and, passing in an oblique direction, also took off and lacerated the upper part of her shoulder. Mr. Pinchard, surgeon, of Cottenham, was called in and dressed the wounds, but it was not thought possible the poor creature could long survive the extensive injuries she had received. Mrs. Hunt is the daughter of an old gentleman named Newton, who left the scene of the tragedy only a few minutes before the arrival of the infuriated husband. Hunt is about forty-five years of age, and it was generally supposed, at Waterbeach, that he had committed suicide. The miscreant evaded the vigilance of the police and constabulary until Monday evening, when he was taken on the road near the Six-mile-bottom, Cambridgeshire, by a constable who suspected him from his woe-begone and thoroughly-wretched appearance. He made no resistance, and he was conducted by the constable to the gaol of Cambridge.

CHEPSTOW.—THE RECENT MURDER.—At the conclusion of the inquest, the coroner having minutely recapitulated the whole of the evidence, the jury, without hesitation, returned a verdict of "Wilful murder against Edward Rees," who was committed on the coroner's warrant to take his trial at the next assizes for the county. The prisoner was forwarded to Monmouth gaol by the Liverpool mail, and as the coach proceeded from St. Arvans, the heartless ruffian rose up and gave three cheers, waving his hat at the same time as he bid farewell to the scenes of his unspeakable iniquity. Rees is a man of diminutive stature, and only 26 years of age.

CHICHESTER.—The fifth annual report of the Diocesan Association has just been issued. The progress of the society is in every way satisfactory, and the past warrants a sanguine anticipation that its future operations will produce a large augmentation of the good which it has already effected. Originally the association had a two-fold character—that of providing adequate church accommodation, and in the larger parishes additional curates for further spiritual services; but in 1839, a diocesan board of education was established, which shortly after became merged in the association, the establishment of training-schools for masters being at the same time recognised. The total grants for the present year have amounted to £2205 12s. 7d. The report contains an affectionate allusion to the recent bereavement sustained by the society in the death of the Right Rev. Dr. Shuttleworth, late Bishop of Chichester. The present Bishop, Dr. Gilbert, has accepted the office of president.

LIVERPOOL.—THE COLLISION ON THE MERSEY.—Owing to the opinion given by the Solicitor-General and Mr. Crompton, that the inquest on the body of John Brown, the seaman killed on the night of Wednesday, the 30th ult., by the collision which took place on the river Mersey between the steamers Royal Victoria and Prince of Wales, should be taken before the coroner for the county of Chester, and not before the coroner for the borough of Liverpool, it was accordingly resumed at one o'clock on Tuesday, at the Seacombe Hotel, whither the body was conveyed in a coffin, before Mr. Churton, one of the coroners for the county of Chester. There were no fewer than nineteen witnesses in attendance, including several masters of vessels, and other nautical men. The interest which the case excited was considerably enhanced by a knowledge of the fact, that the nature of the verdict would determine whether an action at law should be commenced by the proprietors of one of the vessels against the owners of the other for the recovery of the amount of damage sustained. The jury, contrary to all expectation, declined to hear any testimony as to the exact manner in which the collision took place: the speed at which the steamers were going at the time, and many of the other attendant circumstances, were involved in some obscurity, owing to the discrepancy in the evidence of the several witnesses who had been examined on both sides. The Coroner recapitulated the whole of the evidence, commenting upon it as he proceeded, after which a verdict of "Accidentally killed" was returned.

OXFORDSHIRE.—INCENDIARY FIRES.—On Sunday evening last, as the good people of Steeple Claydon were leaving the church, between seven and eight, a fire was observed in the farm-yard of Mr. J. D. Jarvis. Some diabolical scoundrel had entered the hovel by doors from without, and had fixed some burning matter inside of the roof of the hovel, but being happily so soon discovered it did but little injury. The farm is the property of Sir Harry Verney, Bart. The next night, a little before nine o'clock, fire was seen to issue through the roof of a barn occupied by Mr. Robins, which was soon one mass of flame, burning down the barn, hovel, and stable. The dwelling-house had no doubt been fired in two places, but owing to its being old, wet, and a moss thatch, it only smouldered into black ashes. The farm is the property of Mrs. Tatham, widow of the rector of Lincoln College, Oxford. Her carriage was damaged, her harness entirely consumed, and the horses with difficulty were saved. No doubt exists but that both fires were the work of incendiaries. Mr. Jarvis and Mr. Robins are both excellent masters, and particularly kind to their labourers and the poor. Sir Harry Verney has offered a reward of £50, the inhabitants £20, and the County Fire-office £50 on conviction of the offenders.

WAKEFIELD.—We regret to announce that the eminent firm of Messrs. J. L. Fernandes and Sons, corn-merchants, soke-millers, and wine-merchants, were made bankrupts on Thursday week. The firm was extensively known as millers, coal-owners, manufacturers, and corn merchants, and the extent of the liabilities must be very great. We hear that a heavy law-suit, instituted against Mr. Fernandes and others, by Mr. Hemingway, of Oulton, and which was this week decided in Mr. Hemingway's favour, and the recent ruinous depreciation in the price of grain, are said to have been the causes of this most extensive failure. At the corn-market at Wakefield the stoppage was the subject of general conversation, and great alarm prevailed in consequence. It is said that the liabilities of the firm are not less than £20,000.

WORCESTERSHIRE.—MURDER.—Another of those un-English occurrences, which have of late become too common, the use of the knife in a quarrel, which, in this instance, has resulted in the death of one young man, and the apprehension of six others, one being charged as the murderer, and the other five as accessories, has just occurred. The scene of this sad tragedy is Rouse Lench, a small village about thirteen miles east of Worcester. The neighbourhood of Rouse Lench being woody, foxes are tolerably plentiful, and as they are constantly laying the farmers under contribution, the latter are not a little pleased when one is captured. When a fox is caught it is taken in triumph to the various farm-houses, where the captors receive a reward. On Saturday last, George Green (the deceased), Edward Archer (who stands charged with his murder), George and John Bullock, John Clarke, Charles Tandy, John Court (the whole of whom have been apprehended as accessories), and some others, having got a live fox, had been pursuing it, and early in the afternoon they went to the house of Mr. Isaac Spiers, the Bell Inn, Rouse Lench. They left the Bell perfectly sober, and went in the direction of Radford; and when they had arrived near a beer-house, about a quarter of a mile from the Bell, some words ensued between the deceased and Archer, who forthwith began to fight. Having fought one round, they were engaged in a second, and, while struggling together, Green suddenly exclaimed, "I'm stabbed!" fell to the ground, and almost instantly expired.

IRELAND.

The Irish Court of Delegates have decided the disputed deanery of St. Patrick's in favour of the Rev. Dr. Daly, as they were of opinion, four to one, that the vote of Dr. Todd for the Rev. Dr. Wilson was bad. The vote of the Archbishop of Dublin was unanimously pronounced valid.

THE MEETING OF MAGISTRATES AT CASHEL.—About thirty magistrates attended the summons of Lord Glengall. The greatest anxiety pervaded the meeting to carry the objects of their coming together into effect. His lordship was in the chair. A reward list was opened, when nearly £2,000 were subscribed, one thousand being offered by the relations of the deceased (Mr. Scully). A proposition was also submitted and agreed to, that government should be memorialized to devise and enforce a better system for the registry of fire-arms. Not a word about the fatal cause of all the outrages—not a word about the relations of landlord and tenant. The Hon. C. Callaghan was called to the chair, and thanks returned to the Earl of Glengall.

How to Tranquilise Ireland.—At Petty Sessions lately held in Roscommon forty-eight tenants of the Marquis of Westmeath were convicted of cutting turf on land in their own possession for twenty years. They prayed an appeal, addressing themselves to a Bench consisting of Sir William Lynar, S.M., Patrick Howley, S.M., Francis Nesbit, and Godfrey Hogg, Esqrs. The latter magistrate was in favour of the right of appeal, declaring he considered it a cruelty that persons should be convicted for the exercise of a privilege to which they considered themselves entitled for so long a period. He was overruled by his brother magistrates, including the two stipendiaries, and the accused parties (men and women) were duly committed to the county prison, to the amazement and terror of the whole population.

Bank of Ireland.—A meeting of the proprietors of the Bank of Ireland stock was held on Monday to receive a report from the board of directors for the past half-year. The report recommended the usual dividend of four per cent, for the half year, being eight per cent for the year upon the original stock of the company, now quoted at 179½. In answer to a question from one of the proprietors, it appeared that the directors had to take £15,000 from the Reserved Fund to make up the present dividend. Heretofore the dividend has been paid out of profits. Perhaps no fact could be mentioned more strikingly illustrative of the stagnation of trade in Ireland than that which we have now mentioned. When such an establishment as the Bank of Ireland is thus affected in regard to its profits, commercial desires must have ceased indeed.

Resistance to Poor-rates. The Tuam Herald says, "So formidable is the resistance to the payment of poor-rates in that part of the Ballinasloe union called Scheeclan, that Mr. Nolan, the collector, attended the petty sessions of Mount Bellew on Tuesday, for the purpose of making an affidavit to ground an application to Government for a sufficient force to protect him in the execution of his duty."

SCOTLAND

Ayrshire.—Last week a man named Marshall, who is said to be the last of a distinguished race of pirates of that name, attempted to murder a female named Gardner, by stabbing her with a knife in the abdomen. The unfortunate man had previously swallowed a great dose of arsenic, of which he shortly afterwards died. The woman is recovering from her wound. Jealousy is said to have urged the wretched man to the perpetration of this dreadful crime.

We are sorry that we are not able to report any abatement of the severe epidemic which has been so prevalent in Dundee for the last three months. We are, however, happy at being able to state that the present epidemic has not been very fatal.

Allan Maconochie, Esq., advocate (son of Lord Meadowbank), has been appointed Professor of Civil Law in Glasgow.

Glasgow.—On Thursday se'ennight, the people residing in York-street, Glasgow, and to a considerable distance around, were startled by an extraordinary crash, produced by the fall of a lately-erected grain store, situated to the rear of the elegant and substantial bonding warehouses in York-street. The building, which was thus unexpectedly levelled with the ground, at the time the casualty took place, contained a large quantity of grain, such as wheat, barley, peas, and oatmeal. The loss must be very considerable; and we have heard it estimated altogether at between £4000 and £5000. Upwards of £2000 will, it is stated, be required to restore the building. Fortunately no person was injured. The store, we believe, is the property of Messrs. A. and P. Rintoul.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS—TUESDAY.

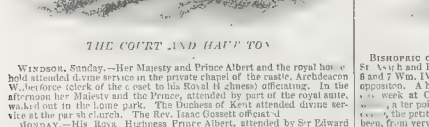
Tuesday being the day to which Parliament stood prorogued, both houses met pro forma.

The Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Haddington, and Lords Fitzgerald and Vesey, as Lords Commissioners, having taken their seats in front of the Throne, the Usher of the Black Rod was directed to summon the House of Commons to hear the Royal Commission read for the further prorogation of Parliament.

In a few minutes afterwards the Commons, who were represented by the clerks and officers of the house, appeared at the bar, when the Royal Commission having been read,

The Lord Chancellor, in the usual form and words, declared the present Parliament to be further prorogued to Thursday, the 2nd of February next, and ordered them and here to meet for the dispatch of divers urgent and important business."

The Commons then withdrew.



THE COURT AND HAUT TON

Windsor, Sunday.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert and the royal house hold attended divine service in the private chapel of the castle, Archdeacon Wilberforce (clerk of the closet to his Royal Highness) officiating. In the afternoon her Majesty and the Prince, attended by part of the royal suite, walked out in the Home park. The Duchess of Kent attended divine service at the parish church. The Rev. Isaac Gossett officiated.

Monday.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Sir Edward Bowater, rode out on horseback. In the afternoon her Majesty rode out in the park, in a pony phaeton, driven by his Royal Highness Prince Albert. The Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal were taken out in the royal pleasure-grounds for a short time this morning. Sir Henry Wheatley arrived at the east e to day, on a visit to her Majesty. Sir R. Peel and Archdeacon Wilberforce took their departure.

Tuesday.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert took their usual walking exercise.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert rode out on horseback, attended by Sir Edward Bowater.—His Royal Highness the Hereditary Duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz arrived at the castle at a quarter to two o'clock from Kew, and lunched with her Majesty and Prince Albert. His Royal Highness took his departure at three o'clock.—Sir Henry Wheatley took his departure.—Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited her Majesty at the castle this morning.—The royal dinner party this evening included the following personages:—Viscount and Viscountess Canning, the Earl of Liverpool, Lord Sydney, the Hon. Misses Devereux and Murray, the Hon. Captain Duncombe, Sir Edward Bowater, Major-General Wemyss, Colonel Grey, and Dr. Prætorius. The band of the 2nd Life Guards was in attendance.

Wednesday.—The Queen and Prince Albert walked this morning in the Home-park. Afterwards his Royal Highness rode to Swanley, attended by Viscount Sydney and Sir Edward Bowater, as usual on horseback. After the royal party had most excellent sport. Lord Rossmore (late Hon. M. Westenra) had the honour of joining the Prince and his suite at their sport at Swanley. The royal party returned to the castle to lunch. Her Majesty and the Prince rode out in a pony phaeton, his Royal Highness driving. On their return, her Majesty and Prince Albert walked for some time in the garden of the East terrace, the afternoon being very fine. His Excellency the Belgian Minister and Madame Van der Weyer arrived at the castle, on a visit to her Majesty. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Fanny Howard, and Sir George Cooper joined the royal dinner circle at the castle in the evening. The party also included Monsieur and Madame Van der Weyer, the Earl of Liverpool, the Viscountess Canning, Viscount Sydney, the two wands of honour, the groom and the equerry in waiting on the Queen, and the equerry in waiting on Prince Albert. Covers were laid for sixteen. Her Majesty's private band and the band of the Foot Guards attended at the castle in the evening.

The Earl and Countess of Eglinton, on the occasion of the anniversary of the birth of their infant son, Lord Montgomerie, had several coursing matches for the amusement of their family and tenantry. The noble earl and countess have a large party visiting them. The earl's tenants on the Auchens barony celebrated the birth-day of the heir of their respected and liberal landlord with great rejoicing.

It has been authentately declared that it is the intention of Lord Morpeth to write a book in reference to his tour through the United States.

Sir Robert Peel arrived in town on Monday morning, from a visit to her Lord Wharncliffe, lord president of the council, was unable to preside at the Privy Council on Saturday last, in consequence of an attack of gout.

A letter from Vienna, 30th ult., in the Carlsruhe Gazette, states that the marriage of her Royal Highne's the Princess Clementine of Prussia with a Prince of Saxe Coburg Kohary has been positively decided on.

On Monday morning the Archduke Frederick of Austria paid farewell visits to their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Gloucester, at Gloucester House, and the Princess Sophia at Kensington Palace, and afterwards called at the Earl of Aberdeen's, and most of the leading members of the Government, and the corps diplomatique.

Death of the Hon. Henry Butler. We have to record the death of the above Hon. gentleman, who expired on Tuesday last, at York, from gout in the stomach. The deceased was second surviving son of Edward, late Viscount Mountgarret, by Lucy Henrietta, second daughter of the first Earl of Carrick, and was born Feb. 16, 1773. He married Sept. 3, 1811, Miss Anne Harrison, youngest daughter and co-heir of Mr. John Harrison, by whom he leaves issue a son and three daughters. The hon. gentleman was brother and heir presumptive of the Earl of Kilkenny, and of the Hon. Pierce Butler, M.P. for the county Kilkenny.

Last week Mr. Frank Stewart, son of Lord Dudley Stewart, sustained a violent concussion of the brain by a fall from his horse whilst riding in the vicinity of Cambridge; but, although very dangerously affected, he is now considered to be in a fair way of recovery.

The Crown Prince of Hanover, accompanied by Aide-de-camp Major Von Stolzenberg, and his physician, Dr. Spangenberg, set out a few days ago for Aschaffenburg, on a visit to the Princess Mary. It is said that the palace at present inhabited by the Crown Prince, will be fitted up for the future residence of the young couple, and that the marriage will certainly take place at the beginning of next year.

A letter from Vienna, Nov. 29, says:—"Princess Constantia Czartorysky died yesterday, after a short illness, at her country seat, Wenhaus, near this city, aged 32. She has left a husband, four sons, and a daughter, to deplore her loss. The former is brother of Prince Adam Czartorysky, now in Paris."

Sir Charles Des Vœux led to the altar, at All Souls Church, Langham-place, on Tuesday morning, the Lady Cecilia Paulet, daughter of the Marquis of Winchester. The happy couple left town to pass the honeymoon at Tunbridge-wells.

Strathfieldsaye.—The Duke of Wellington isnot expected to return to Apsley-house until after the Christmas holidays.

Death of Mr. Robert Haworth Peel.—We have to announce the death, after a protracted illness, of the above gentleman, brother of the Right Hon. Sir Lawrence Peel, chief justice of Ceylon, and nephew of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Peel, Bart., who died at St. Asaph on Saturday last. The deceased was in his fifty-third year, and was late in the 3rd Dragoon Guards, from which regiment he retired in 1830.

The Hon. Colonel Douglas Pennant, M.P., has given £200, and the Marquis of Anglesey, Lord Willoughby De Eresby, and the Bishop of Bangor, each £100, towards the subscription fund for establishing and erecting an infirmary for the two counties of Carnarvon and Anglesey.

Departure of the Archduke Frederick of Austria.—His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge visited the Archduke Frederick of Austria on Tuesday at Mivart's Hotel, and took leave of his Imperial Highness. Many of the leading nobility called also at the hotel to pay farewell visits to the illustrious member of the imperial house of Austria. His Imperial Highness gave an elegant déjeuné à la fourchette on the morning to his Excellency Baron Neumann, Austrian Minister, Baron Koller, charge d'affaires; Baron Lebzeltern, secretary; and the other gentlemen of the Austrian embassy, and the members of his suite. In the afternoon the Archduke Frederick, accompanied by his Excellency Baron Neumann, and attended by Baron Lebzeltern, Count Ranzau, Captain Brandt, and Archel, quartermaster Du Mont, attached to the person of his Imperial Highness, left Mivart's, for Portsmouth, proceeding by railway as far as Gosport, to join his vessel, the Austrian frigate Bellona, after a sojourn of nearly four months in this country, during which time his Imperial Highness has both received and given most princely entertainments.

Portsmouth, Wednesday.—His Imperial Highness the Archduke of Austria and suite arrived here from London by special train, yesterday afternoon at five o'clock, and proceeded immediately from the Gosport terminous to the landing-place, where a boat from the Bellona was in waiting to convey them on board. His highness did not land again, but dined and slept on board the Bellona. It is understood that the archduke will not take his departure until Monday or Tuesday next, when he will leave for Gibraltar and the Mediterranean. In the meantime he will visit all the public establishments of this port, which, from the shortness of his stay upon his first arrival here, he was unable to do. Captain Brandt, of the Bellona, left this morning for London, and will return on Friday or Saturday. His highness landed this afternoon at the dockyard, where he was met by Admirals Sir Edward Codrington and H. Parker, and a number of naval officers, who accompanied him over the various departments of the dockyard.

General Alava, the Spanish minister, visited the Earl of Aberdeen on Wednesday at the Foreign-office.

Chatsworth.—The Duke of Devonshire, who intends to visit his marine villa at Kemp Town, will keep open house here, and also at Bolton Abbey, the week after next. The new conservatory is unequalled in Europe for its extent.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

Bishopric of St. Asaph and Bangor.—The union of the two sees of St Asaph and Bangor, which will take place unless that portion of the Act 6 and 7 Wm. IV. relating to the same is repealed, meets with strenuous opposition. A highly respectable and numerous meeting was held last week at Carnarvon, when petitions to Parliament against the measure, after pointing out the increased necessity for episcopal superintendence, the petitioners say "The bishoprics of St. Asaph and Bangor have been, from very ancient times, endowed with lands solemnly dedicated to the maintenance of the Church in North Wales; and they cannot feel it consistent with the interests of religion or with the demands of justice, or even with the report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, to sanction a further diversion of the revenues of those funds to the endowment of a Bishopric in a district unconnected with Wales, and one of the wealthiest in the empire."

The sum of £400 has been granted by the University of Durham towards the erection of a new church at South Shields.

University of Durham.—The following presents have been recently received by the Museum connected with this University:—1. From the Zoological Society of London, fifty skins of mammalia and birds, several of them of a rare and interesting character, including a cassowary, a crane, a curassow, a guinea fowl, a Bonelli's eagle, a swan, albatross, carrion vulture, condor, cockatoo, bee-eater, Columbia, and several scarce woodpeckers, also a common monkey, sloth, bear, and Axis deer. 2. From the Rev. George Gilly, Queen's Quadrangle, rector of Houghton-le-Skerne, two bronze ancient celts and an ancient sword, supposed to be British, discovered in June last on the estate of William Dent Quenton, Esq., at Lowthorpe, near Driffield, the two former of which are noticed in a communication in the last number of the Gentleman's Magazine. 3. From the Rev. George Townsend, canon of Durham, some grains of wheat, taken by Sir Gardner Wilkinson from an Egyptian mummy, buried in a tomb fifteen hundred years before the birth of Christ. It is doubtful whether or not these will vegetate. A report on the subject has been issued by the Committee of the British Association of Science, presented at the meeting at Manchester last June. 4. From the Rev. Henry White, of Manningham, East Indies, an albatross (immature bird), and three petrels, taken off the Cape of Good Hope.

The Rev. R. H. Whiston, M.A., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, has been appointed to the Head-mastership of the Worcester Cathedral Grammar School, which is to be opened immediately after Christmas.

Oxford, Dec. 13.—Mr. Furneaux, commoner of Lincoln College, was on Saturday last elected Scholar of that society; and Mr. Grainger, also a commoner, one of Lord Crewe's Exhibitioners. At the same time, Mr. Ince, from King's College, London, was elected Dr. Hutchins's Scholar of Lincoln.

EVERY BODY'S COLUMN.

DECEMBER

Should be a cheerful month, weather or no. It should be a warm one, though never so cold. People blow their fires and use their bellows well while the wind bellows without. Farmers are glad over Usher. Men of measures to secure the comfort of their bodies, and preserve the coat of their stomachs. Though the Legislature does not set the middle class regnor to the carrying of many of their bills. Pastry-cooks begin to mind matters; and "eyes" are turned towards "pies." Politics no affect sincerity; and Peel, foot sweet, becomes candid. Grass acts of plum-pudding are effected by means of a grocer; and Pump-tree-street is the most sweetest locality in St. Giles's. The Irish daily feed fresh raisins for flocks there. With the sale of plums money gets earned but the sovereign's just now more valued than ever; and, at the great theatres, Stirling is the go. The markets grow lively, and Smithfield puts forth its show. Cows have lots of stuffing, and get so heavy that it is quite common to ask for pig of lead. About oxen and sheep there is a decided yore fat-ye-a. Beasts visit beasts, and human fat cattle—to surrey the quadruped—walk, pump. Butchers display fine truths. Boating-day arrives, and with it the knees of tradesmen; but they only make a bit when they are paid. People are obliged to wait for their own Nor till night. Merry drinks and games then stir not the fire, but the fire-side. The younger branches of families are indulged in wine that is elder; universal suppertop is the place of universal suffrage; and the only ballot is for the cosis in the cake. Christmas is as brave a fellow on land as ever Admiral Winter was at sea, and should be toasted accordingly. He lights our fires, and leaves us without fuel; he tows up our colliers to warm our toes; and, though he is too kind to sink the barges, he always scuttles the coals! He is no revolutionist; for, whilst warming the tittle, he has a respect for the grate. "He is," says the Frenchman, "our defender, by de fender; and if he do seem cold, it is only because he is neither a bore nor a muff."

CURIOUS SALE.

An old man, following the occupation of bone-collector, residing in the vicinity of Southampton, passing a marine-store shop in that town, saw in the window a gold piece of Queen Anne's coinature, having upon it the head of an ox, which was full of small holes and very much obliterated with rust and age; he inquired the price of it, which was 8s. The old man, having the money, said, "I will give you a shilling a week until I have it upon for it, if you will save it for me;" this was agreed to. At length the picture was paid for, and the old man hastened to his humble home with it, where he was persuaded by some of the neighbours to have it varnished, and carried it to Mr. De Lainey, who then resided in Southampton (and now of No. 32, Prince's-street, Bristol), for that purpose. Instead of varnishing the picture, Mr. De Lainey being struck with its beauty, restored it by a newly discovered process. After it was done, he offered the old man £20 for the picture. "No," says he, "if it's worth £20 to you, it is worth £20 to me, so look at." Mr. De Lainey then communicated with some connoisseurs in London, who came and examined the painting. One of them commissioned him to purchase it for him at any price; but, strange to say, though he offered nearly one hundred pounds until the amount of twenty guineas was offered for it, the old man still refused to part with his treasure, but is it expected that he ever will dispose of it although he is in actual want. The painting is supposed to be the finest Cupy in existence.

GHUENEE PRIZE IDOLS.

Some of the papers mention the bringing away the celebrated gates of Ghuznee by General Nott, as if it were the general's own idea carried into effect; but we are informed that it was one of Lord Ellenborough's instructions to him to bring them back to India, whence, as many of our readers know, they were taken upwards of eight hundred years since, by Mahmood the First, on his return from his twelfth and last invasion of the Hindoo land. All our home "Overland" readers may not be aware that they were taken from the famous brahminic temple of Somnat, in Guzerat, of which Mahmood, having broken up a huge idol, notwithstanding that its priests offered him several crores of rupees (or millions sterling) to forego his iconoclastic design, discovered in its belly such store of diamonds, pearls, rubies, and other precious stones, that the sum offered as ransom was a mere trifle in the comparison—a regular Belly God that! What the particular purpose of the governor-general is, in having the gates brought back, we do not yet precisely know, but it is probably to send them to England as curiosities and mementos, for he cannot design to bestow them on any Hindoo temple of the present day (he would raise a loud religious outcry if he did), but it may be regarded as a gracious mark of our lasting triumph in Central Asia, and one which will exalt the British name in Hindoo estimation, for depriving the Mussulmans of such a trophy of their conquest over the followers of Brahma. Mahmood's name, also, with which he struck off the idol's nose, is being brought away from its place in the mosque at Ghuznee, at which the gates were fixed.

ANTONYMA.

Nor body have I, foot, nor hand,	When cash is scarce, and bills are hush,
Though I've one eye I cannot see,	Your London tailor seeks my aid;
Yet the first lady in the land	And many an economic sigh
Is known from herself pourtray'd in me.	I bear 'twixt love-sick swain and maid.
Than me no serjeant at the law,	No chancellor, or justice ermin'd
More cases hath endorsed, or	Thus my devoir each booby claims,
More pleas and counts determin'd;	And though to business hard of
No busy body e'er had more	hearing,
Secret affairs in charge than I,	They fix on me ten thousand names,
Yet when I'm old you see no store	And seldom but I see pe a friend.
Of cash, but thank-ess pass me by.	Now gentles tell the name I boast.
You ask a favour—send a cheese;	So may you ne'er deplore my fate,
You want a cap, or toy from town,	So may you safely pass a post,
Upon unlucky me you seize,	Without black eye and broken
And for the service pop me down.	pate.

SCEPTICS.

Pyrrho, a Greek philosopher, who flourished about three hundred years before Christ, established a sect, whose fundamental principle was, that there is nothing true or false, right or wrong, honest or dishonest, just or unjust: or that there is no standard of anything beyond law or custom, and that uncertainty and doubt belong to everything. From this contending and seeking after truth, and never finding it, the sect obtained the name of Sceptics, or Pyrrhonians, from their founder.

"DONE FOR."

A wag, a few years since, procured some eye-wash of a quack oculist, to be applied to a gaseye which he wore. The oculist, not being very sharp-sighted, did not discover there was some defect in the eye, but that it was something that he warranted a cure or no pay. The eye was washed and departed. In a week or so after he returned with the empty eye, and apparently in great distress. "O, doctor, doctor!" said he, "your stuff has wholly destroyed my eye." At the same time opening the eye to the empty socket with his finger, to the horror of the gaping oculist. "Is it possible! can it be possible!" exclaimed the eye-tinker. "I never administered to operate so before. Well, my dear sir, I can do nothing but return your money." "But you must do more, sir. What else can be compared with the loss of an eye?" replied the wag. "If you will give me five dollars, I will sign a pledge never to expose you; but if you do not, I will prosecute you forthwith, and sure as a ramrod man." The oculist forked over a check for the amount, and the covey cut stick pertickler, for Texas.

A COMICAL CUSTOMER.

A facetious gentleman, travelling in pursuit of pleasure, on arriving at Indesit place in the evening, was met by the hostler, whom he thus addressed:—"Boy, excuse that dirt on the vehicle—allow me to denote him an adequate supply of nutritious aliment; and when aurora of morn shall again illuminate the oriental horizon, I shall award you pecuniary compensation for your valuable hospitality." The next understanding a word, ran into the house, saying, "Master, here's a Dutchman wants to see you."

NUMBER AND ELOQUENCE OF THE ECCENTRICS.

The number of persons at present belonging to the Eccentric Society is about 200. The number that have belonged to it since its commencement is nearly 7000. Perhaps no other debating society for such it may be called) has produced so many remarkable characters, or so many original speakers. Those who were members at that period, and still live to tell the tale, as having surpassed, in eloquence, humour, and effect, anything I ever elsewhere heard. Among the eloquent "Eccentrics" of the period of which I speak, there was a Mr. Brownlee, a reporter on the Times paper, whose happiest oratorical efforts are said to have been almost superhuman. They must certainly have been something very extraordinary in his treatment, as I remember to have heard him say, "I have taken down the most excellent public speaking in my time, but I never heard anything at all approaching to that of Mr. Brownlee." Joseph Jenkins, "a new work by the author of "Random Recollections."

Some geographical intelligence of interest has lately been received from Egypt. M. D'Arnaud, a French traveller, who formed part of an expedition despatched by Mehemet Ali to ascend to the sources of the Nile, has reached the upper part of the stream. According to the general opinion, the Nile, after a direct course from its mouth towards the south, turned to the west, where it was supposed it took its source. M. D'Arnaud had arrived at a point where the river turns off, and in his letter he states that the principal branch, both in width and volume of water, came from the south and not from the west. It is, therefore, towards the south that he has pursued his journey, to seek the source of the great artery of Egypt. It appears that the vessel which carried M. D'Arnaud was dashed to pieces in the Nile, and the collections of natural history, made by the members of the expedition, were lost. The journal of the voyage, and the geographical documents, have been saved.

INTERIOR OF THE HALL OF COMMERCE, THREADNEEDLE-STREET.

The attention which this novel edifice has attracted in the City, induces us to give of it such elaborate illustration as every feature of national architecture deserves at the hands of a public journalist who, like ourselves, can combine pictorial representation with letter-press description. The Hall of Commerce is the work of private enterprize, and has suddenly sprung up in the heart of our great metropolis at the bidding of one ingenious and industrious tradesman, who, deeming that the vast purposes of City Trade demanded a noble area for their operation—and seeing the Old Exchange in ruins before his door, projected the scheme of erecting a vast and spacious temple devoted to the worship of Dives, and affording splendid and unrivalled accommodation to the merchant princes of our "wondrous island of the West." It remains to be seen whether the contemplated design of the enterprizing proprietor will succeed, and the original and almost natural purpose of such an edifice be turned to what may fairly be deemed its legitimate appropriation. We partly doubt this. We know the almost obstinate attachment of business men to the old localities of their commerce, to the busy bustle-fraught confined and musty nooks and corners in which many of them have ferretted out their fortunes and which they deem to be the genuine lurking-places of commercial comfort. We have seen them regarded with an almost superstitious veneration, and the very cobwebs respected as they hung. The money-haunts of the old school have about them a sort of pleasant ancient familiarity which will not be hastily shaken off for the freshness of a new and less cordial atmosphere, and the clear, bold, white, polished classicality of a temple stately in its dimensions and brilliant with a gush of light. You cannot easily get your old sitters away from Garaway's, the Jerusalem, the auction mart, the North and South American—and places of such cast and character; they feel easier than in the new and proud hall which chills them with its cold elegance and cheerless grandeur—and they prefer the symbols of a glass of sherry, a sandwich, and a bill of the sale, to the most beautifully chiselled sculpture that ever filled a panel or adorned a niche. Once, however, get over their prejudices—destroy their old associations—and entice them into the habit of frequenting this new Chamber of Commerce—and then its aptitude, its splendour, and its usefulness, will be no longer denied. It is a very remarkable and magnificent edifice, and every way worthy to be the theatre of the commercial action of the most important city in the world. It is in itself indeed a credit and an ornament to London, and an addition to the noble architecture of which she may justly be proud.

The Hall of Commerce has been erected by Mr. Moxhay, a biscuit-baker in the neighbourhood of the Change; who, leaving for a moment the oven for the hod—flour for lime—and bread-bricks for bricks and mortar—has betaken himself to the improvement of the metropolis, and called up a new object for the admiration of the architectural world.

The exterior of the new building is one of simple and semi-classic grandeur—rising to a fair and stately elevation, and with a broad and dignified plainness, which depends only upon one elaborate and beautiful ornament for relief—and upon the frieze of scroll work below the cornice of the roof, gracefully designed and boldly carved. There are no projections but this cornice and the Grecian pediments from the wall. The embellishment we have alluded to is a sculptured panel, admirably executed in bas-relief, by an artist of the name of Watson, to whom we pay the cheerful meed of praise.

SUBSCRIBER'S ADMISSION MEDAL.

The allegory represents Commerce supported by Law and Justice, diffusing peace, liberty, industry, and civilization over the world. The sculptor has expressed this meaning distinctly and dramatically on one side are groups of vintagers and navigators, with Britannia giving liberty to the negro slaves; on the other Peace heralds the fine arts to the savages. The different groups are well arranged, so as to be connected without crowding; the design is in classic taste; and the figures are boldly sculptured, with broad, striking effect, in common stone. The interior (of which we give a beautiful engraving, having represented the exterior in a former number of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS) is even more admirable than the exterior; it is planned with skill and judgment, and most beautifully decorated. The ground-floor is divided into two lofty and spacious saloons of noble proportions, and well lighted: that on the left is square, with a semi-circular recess; the cornice supported by pilasters with Corinthian capitals, and the ceiling ornamented with a chaste and elegant coving formed of the lotus-leaf and flower: that on the right is a most superb apartment, and in point of proportion and enrichment one of the finest rooms in the metropolis. Its dimensions are one hundred and thirty feet long, forty-four feet wide, and fifty feet high; three square apertures in the ceiling, glazed with sheets of plate glass, in a novel manner, let in a flood of light and show the sky above. At one end is a semicircular recess, which, as well as a square recess at each side, is ornamented by two fluted columns with Corinthian capitals: these columns and pilasters support the entablature, which is ornamented by a frieze of the most beautiful character, consisting of a rich and fanciful scroll of fruits and flowers, designed with picturesque freedom, and executed in very high relief, equalling in lightness and projection the best wood-carving. From a bold cornice springs the coving of the ceiling, which is light and handsome, in accordance with the rest of the decorations. The coup d'œil is singularly elegant: the just proportions of the room prevent it at first sight from appearing so large as it really is; but its airiness and daylight brightness produce that agreeable sense of space and amplitude which is so seldom experienced in modern apartments even of great pretensions. Much of this is owing to the excellent plan of lighting from the roof by means of skylights, with side-panes inclining inward towards the top.

We may add to this description a decided opinion of our own—that the admission of sculpture into the end and on either side of this spacious hall would be a marked improvement of the general effect; and we agree with a contemporary that fresco-painting might also be introduced to beautiful advantage. As an ensemble, however, we must regard the Hall of Commerce with unfeigned admiration; and conclude with the expression of a hope that, soon after its opening in the ensuing January, its fine resources as a national edifice may be brought advantageously into play, and its halls tenanted and astir with the active and kindling commercial spirit of intelligent and enterprising London.

PRIZE HEREFORD OX, AND FARMING IMPLEMENTS.

We this week present our readers with an Engraving of the Hereford ox, to which the highest money prize of the Smithfield Club was awarded last week. He was bred by Mr. Perry of Monkland, near Leominster. His sire, a celebrated bull named Goldfinder, was exhibited with the above and five other offspring at the Leominster cattle show three years since, when a handsome prize was awarded to them. His dam was also bred by Mr. Perry, and with himself sold to the Duke of Bedford for one thousand guineas. He has been shown five times, and has gained a prize at every exhibition. When only a yearling he passed from the hands of the Duke of Bedford to those of Sir William Wake, baronet, of Courtier Hall, near Northampton, under whose care he was fed. It is not a little singular that the same prize of the Smithfield Club (first prize second class) was last year awarded to an ox by the same sire—out of the same dam.

The display of implements at the Smithfield Cattle Show was more numerous than usual, and exhibited many wonderful improvements over the more common handicraft instruments of agriculture. We were particularly struck by a clod-roller, contrived to manipulate the soil, as well as reduce the ruggedness of its surface. A spiral-toothed turnip-cutter, of immense power and durability, and a dibble with shifting apparatus adapted to various widths of furrow and different distances for plantation, almost commanded our admiration. But what more especially claimed our consideration were the three subjects we have chosen for the subject of our illustrations. The first of these is a machine, patented by the Tweedale Company, for the manufacture of draining-tiles. An inspection of our accurate engraving will at once explain its action. The clay, as will be seen, is drawn by machinery through a series of mould-collars, till, by the gradual coalition of their forms, it is shaped into an arched tile, which for accuracy of form, and evenness of surface and texture, is greatly superior to those in ordinary use. From this results a better-formed drain, and consequently more perfect drainage. This mode is also much cheaper than the old one. We regard its invention as of national importance, and shall look to its future progress to assist in no small degree the improved growth of our field-fed prizes.

The second is a very complete cattle and pig feeding apparatus, by Crosskill, of Beverley, drawn from a model. The potato-steamer, the potato-washer, the wrought-iron feeding-carriage and wheelbarrow, the circular iron pig-trough, &c. &c., will all be readily distinguished. The whole as it stands is adapted for a considerable-sized farm, but any one of the objects represented would, if adopted by the common peasant, tend to increase the cleanliness, health, and value of his cottage stock-yard.

The third is one of those inventions which will tend to increase the cleanliness and comfort of our sheep. These animals are frequently suffered by small farmers to be infested by numerous hordes of parasitic vermin, because, in their indolence or poverty, they have failed to supply themselves with the necessary apparatus for dipping them in suitable curative mixtures. Others, again, regard the necessary operation of dipping as a "disagreeable job," and, postponing it to a more convenient season, lose the favourable moment, and meantime the poor sheep becomes incurably diseased. The loss of his carcase and the damage of his wool is the reward of the owner's procrastination. But here we have an apparatus for dipping so commodious in its shape and arrangements, and so cheap in its construction, as to be within the reach of all. No sheep ought now to be neglected; and we have much pleasure in commending the remedial apparatus to our country readers.

THE COLOSSEUM PRINT.

We have now to call the attention of our readers and subscribers to the promised prospectus of our Colosseum Print—a superb and original work of art, produced upon the grandest scale—which we pledged ourselves to present to all the readers of the

who should have punctually subscribed to the paper during the first six months of its existence. The great success which we have achieved now enables us to go to an extent of enterprise that we are sure will more than crown the highest expectations of the public.

THE COLOSSEUM PRINT

derived its title, in the first instance, from an intention of presenting a magnificent engraving of LONDON AT ONE VIEW—to reflect, as it were, a similar grand picture to that so long exhibited at the Colosseum. The better taste, however, of our artists and advisers reminded us that we should thus exclude that wondrous leviathan of our metropolitan architecture,

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL;

and to this important recollection was added a suggestion that a much finer field of what may not inaptly be called "Panoramic glory" was presentable from another lofty eminence of London, which it, however, required official authority to enable us to reach.

TWO SPLENDID VIEWS OF THE METROPOLIS

have been the result of the above proposition, taken north and south, from the summit of the

by the generous and nobly-granted permission of General Maitland, for himself and his co-trustees, who thus confided to us an exclusive right that stimulated our proprietors to a degree of exertion which they hope will prove worthy of the signal mark of favour they have received. Their

COLOSSEUM PRINT,

which will really be, in its superb dimensions, what the term "Colossal" is in reference to size, will then present two

ORIGINAL ASPECTS OF LONDON.

The upper or south view will comprise all that magnificent sweep of picturesque objects which stretch from the Surrey shores of the Thames, as far as they are visible on the right, to beyond the Tower of London, with its adjacent vessels of shipping on the left. The splendid range of manufactories which line the river, grow upward from the far distance to the gazer's eye, until they are closed with, and screened by, the venerable Abbey of Westminster, at once, with its solemn religious grandeur, absorbing mind and sight. But that fine pause of contemplation over, and away travels the eye, using as it were a kind of memory to bring present the old familiar features of the "City of the World." Look at the beautiful range of bridges spanning that river, which, though its waters are but silver, has been designated, for their burthen, the "river of gold." Mark the long lines of streets, the grand public buildings, the spires of old and new churches pointing to the sky, the Monument, the ancient Bridge-street, the fork-like Tower, and 'mid all, and above all, the eternal grandeur of St. Paul's! And these objects are so woven into the picture, that they are not parts of a confused mass, but prominent beauties of such a clear and well-defined architectural panorama as was never before embodied in the forms of art.

THE LOWER OR NORTH VIEW

turns the gazer upon a still more broad and open district of the metropolis. It stretches over the beautiful Parks; includes the Royal Palaces and mansions of our nobility; involves the finest streets in the world, Regent-street, Piccadilly, Portland-place, Whitehall, Trafalgar-square, and the superb gathering of fashionable clubs; and, in a word, concentrates within its focus all the palatial magnificence of western London to contrast with the staid and solid greatness of its commercial aspect: endless wealth-accumulation on the one hand, and on the other an expenditure whose lavishness might startle kings.

Such are the two sections of the UNRIVALLED PICTURE which we are about to present in all good-will to our readers, and now the only other points connected with it which we wish to impress upon their attention are

ITS UNDOUBTED FIDELITY AND TRUTH

It is, in plain terms, a Mirror of the Metropolis, and for its reflection we are indebted to the light of the sun.

M. Claudet was expressly commissioned by us to construct a Daguerreotype apparatus, whereby we have obtained a series of drawings that are as it were "impressions of the city itself," with all the niceties of perspective preserved, and an accuracy of detail never before equalled in panoramic art.

NOTICE

THE COLOSSEUM PRINT will be ready on New Year's Eve, when all persons will be entitled to receive it who have subscribed for six months from the commencement of this paper, or for six months previous to the publication of the print, or who pay a six months' subscription in advance from the time of the issue of the plate. This is the definite and distinct answer to all correspondents who have addressed us on the subject, and is a general one to the public at large. The engraving is upon so grand and magnificent a scale, that it cannot be finished and a sufficient number printed before the time appointed for publication. Our subscribers have already so reasoned that the immense request for printing becomes most important, and any delay that has arisen is attributable only to the necessity for such careful and deliberate management as will make disappointment next to impossible

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1842.

In some comments which will be found below we have occasion to allude to a case in which tardy justice has eventually punished a hardened and unrepentant criminal, who, having previously incurred the penalty of transportation for life, had his sentence—as we think most improperly—remitted by the Government of the day, and has subsequently earned again—with most active and vigorous persistence in crime—as large an amount of position, short of death, as the law is powerful to bestow. We have now to make reference to another trial against a number of persons for causing the death of a man at sea by suffocation—in other words, by strangling him with a rope after a fashion of wild and wanton barbarity that one would think could exist only on board a pirate ship. The case in question exhibits the exact converse proposition of that which is propounded by the other trial, and displays justice as maim, halt, and blind, and unable to overtake the guilty, he their guilt made ever so manifest before the world. The trial, in short, was stopped for want of technical legal evidence, and because the law officers had not framed the indictment without flaw—in a word, because of the improper negligence of the prosecution, which has thus virtually, if not literally, connived at the escape of persons whose brutal cruelty deserved the sternest severity of the law. This evil was so flagrant that Baron Alderson found himself called upon, by a judge's sense of rectitude and duty, to notice it emphatically from the bench as one which it was disgraceful to find tolerated in a Christian country; and truly so it is, and yet its frequency of occurrence has resolved itself almost into a rule. The officers connected with the heavy charge of endeavouring to procure the fair administration of justice in our criminal courts are as careless as a low attorney of the interests of an impoverished client; and the county and Government prosecutions are continually conducted with the smallest possible regard to legal acumen, accuracy, and vigilance. The consequence is that your rogues escape, either to shock or to victimize society again. We would ever incline to mercy, but wretched and ill-considered indeed is the clemency that covers crime, while the negligence that gives it a loophole is worse. Here we have three cases of what we may almost call a profligate indolence or indulgence of the authorities with regard to criminals. One is a case of blasphemy unprosecuted at all; another a case of manslaughter, prosecuted without effect; and a third a case of wholesale swindling, abandonment, and infamy, which did indeed grasp a punishment at last, but upon the head of a man who would never have offended society with his new crimes but for a previous scandalous remission of a sentence which was to pay the penalty of the old. Baron Alderson may well say that "these occurrences disgrace a Christian country."

In our columns devoted to the record of the proceedings of the Central Criminal Court will be found a case which loudly demands comment from the journalist and attention from the public. We refer to the trial of a man named Staunton, who figured in the police reports some short time since, but whose case then occupied small space in this paper, because it revealed a series of cruel seductions, heartless deceptions, and vicious actions, the detail of which we conceive to be foreign to the true province of a paper devoted sincerely to the domestic circle. Some revelations were, however, made in which the name of a minister of State was implicated, and we waited only for the settlement of the affair in a court of justice before we meddled with it. Other journals, less scrupulous of the charge of pre-judging the case, or exciting prejudice against a man who was to stand trial before a jury of his countrymen, did not hesitate to canvass the conduct of the Minister referred to, and to speak in no measured terms of the party zeal which led him to the commission of a sin against the society of which he was a member, and the laws which he was placed in the position to enforce. It appears that in the year 1836 one Henry Stanton, alias Stanhope, alias Winkworth, was tried for a series of frauds and robberies, and upon the clearest evidence found guilty, and sentenced to transportation. Thus circumstanced he applied to the Hon. Mr. Goulbourn, and referring to some services said to have been rendered to the Government in Ireland, prayed a remission of his sentence. Notwithstanding the nature of his offence, he received a free pardon in return for his secret services. What the exact nature of these services were there is no evidence to show, but from the result of the application there appears to be no doubt that they partook of a character which forbade publicity.

The legitimate object of punishment is the diminution of crime, by the wholesome dread which the infliction is supposed to produce. To give full effect to this intention, the penalty must be definite and certain; and every exercise of power which interferes in any degree with this certainty destroys the object which the Legislature and the law have in view.

To make an unjust distinction between criminals is to destroy the whole moral force of punishment; and that which, equally dispensed, is but justice, when unequally imposed becomes tyrannic cruelty. Society also requires that, when a criminal has been convicted and condemned, he should be removed from the community which his crimes have injured; that he should be deprived, as far as possible, of all opportunities of repeating those acts which have outlawed him from social privileges. In this case, however, we find all these reasons set at naught—all these considerations waived; and a criminal convicted of a series of offences of the most dangerous character pardoned, acquitted of all punishment, and let loose upon the world to commence a fresh career of villainy, because he had done secret service to the Government of the day. The result of this unjust exercise of executive power has been exactly what might have been predicted. Relieved from the durance to which his conduct had properly condemned him, the villain stalks from the prison-house to begin anew his course of crime. Seduction, swindling, bigamy, and open spoliation are added to the list of his previous iniquities, and for six years he preys upon the community, upon whom he has thus been recklessly let loose. At length, he is again placed in the felon's dock, his conviction secured, and the judge on the bench joins in expressing the opinion which had long before been arrived at by the public—a regret that the sentence before passed had not been carried into execution.

Now that justice is about to be vindicated, we may, as far as the individuals implicated in it are concerned, allow the case to pass with the expression of a fervent hope that the present exposure will have the effect of checking henceforward the improper exercise of executive authority, and that no occasion will hereafter be given for complaint that royal clemency has been perverted into a means of injury to the community at large.

FOREIGN POLITICS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, DEC. 14.

The intrigues for a change of Cabinet are in active progress, but meet with no success as yet. The King of the French clings to a Ministry which has rendered him such important services by calming the war excitement, and restoring France to the European concert. The negotiations for a Molé and Thiers coalition have entirely failed. The latter wishes to resign out of office until he has completed his work on the Empire, for which he is to receive £10,000 when finished. M. Thiers prefers that Guizot should be Minister for a year longer, than that Count Molé should become Premier and again consolidate the Conservative party. Count Molé will try his hand now with the Dufaure-Passy party, but, it is confidently predicted, with no success. Salvandy is lukewarm for Molé, and Lamartine cannot be depended upon. The Ministry being, therefore, united holds its head high, and will open the session by claiming a direct vote of confidence in its acts. It is not yet certain that there will be a speech from the throne. There is no answering for intrigue here for twenty-four hours, but at the hour I write the Cabinet looks strong. It will be assembled on the Spanish affairs, on the Belgian customs union treaty, and on the right-of-search question; but M. Guizot, it is whispered, feels confident that at the tribune he can satisfy the Chambers that no other Minister could have pursued any other course than the one he has followed.

My belief is that the Ministry is disposed to act fairly in its foreign relations, but there is an under-current in French intrigue which sometimes disturbs the best intentions. Thus I fear that the conduct of M. Lesseps, the French consul at Barcelona, has seriously compromised his Government, and that a serious quarrel may ensue between the English and French Cabinets, if that functionary be not disavowed and dismissed. I may communicate something further on this subject in a future communication.

A very pretty quarrel between the Journal des Debats and the Presse occupies public attention. They are both Conservative organs, that is, support the côté droit, or dynastic side of the Chamber of Deputies. The Débats is Ministerial, being paid out of the Secret Service Money, a large monthly subvention. The Presse expects to be Ministerial when there is a Molé Cabinet. En attendant, it stands high at the Court, the Princess Adelaide, the King's sister, being one of the shareholders. The Presse has for Editor M. Emile de Girardin the Deputy, he who settled the Republican Armand Carel in a duel. The Editor of the Débats is M. Armand Bertin. Rivality of interests has caused these papers to fall out, and the wordy warfare may lead to a split in the conservative camp. The Presse now attacks the Soult-Guizot Ministry, and the Débats defends it. There was a grand political and literary solemnity the other day at the French Academy on the admission of Baron Pasquier, the President of the Chamber of Peers, the Chancellor of France, as a member. Every personage of note in the diplomatic and scientific world was present. The Chancellor had to praise his predecessor, the devoted tutor of the Duke of Bordeaux. M. Mignet, the âme damnée of Thiers, had to reply to and eulogise the Conservative Chancellor. To a foreigner the scene presented much flummery and hypocrisy. To a Frenchman it afforded delight, to prove the fluency of language, and to establish the truth of Talleyrand's axiom, that "words were given to man to conceal his thoughts." Extremes may meet, but are they compelled to embrace? Mignet, au fond, is a republican—Pasquier has been the man of every Government—and the late Bishop of Hermopolis a devoted Legitimatist!!!

We have had the opera of "Tancredi" revived at the Italians; but the artists representing it thought that Rossini had not done enough for their respective pretensions. thus, the tenor (Corelli) added to the cantabile in the first act the coda of a cavatina from Donizetti's "Gemma di Virgi;" the bass (Compagnoli) introduced one of Bellini's airs; Madame Persiani could do no less than sing the grand scena composed by her cara sposa for "Ines de Castro;" and, finally, Pauline Garcia Viardot—et la Brute?—revived Pasta's interpolation of Nicolini's air as the finale. Now is not all this abominable? What constitutes the charm of "Tancredi," as written by Rossini, is its naïve inspiration, its simple cantabile, without the abundant appogiatura; its expressive and passionate phrases, and not the perpetual assault of fioriture between Pauline and Persiani. Where was the ravishing melody "Di tanti palpiti?" What had the myriad of notes of Pauline—what those prolonged shakes—what had those distant intervals in common with the swan of Pesaro? The amateurs are angry, and justly so. "How did you like the opera?" said a dame of the Chaussée d'Antin to a distinguished lady of the Faubourg St. Germain. "Mais, mon Dieu," was the reply, "I find the dénouement changed. Poor Tancredi is executed in real earnest." It is rumoured in the musical circles that Rossini is coming to Paris, to produce a new opera. Is not this news? You remember the mot of Rossini. Some one noticing the successes of Meyerbeer and Halevy, who are Jews at the Academie Royale, asked Rossini when he was going to bring out another opera. "I am waiting," replied the grand maestro, "until the Jews' sabbath has passed."

Halevy's "Charles le Sixth," to which Delavigne's libretto, is in active rehearsal at the French Opera, and it is hoped to produce it next month. The fog caught Duprez's throat the other night in "The Huguenots," and Marié was obliged to finish the opera; but Duprez took his revenge last Friday in "The Zaire," singing splendidly. Mlle. Pauline Leroux has reappeared in the ballet of the "Diable Amoureux;" but it is feared that Fanny Elssler will go to Berlin and Vienna, and not visit us this season, to pay off the damages obtained against her by the French Opera for prolonging her stay in Yankeeland. Theophile Gautier, the Presse feuilletonist, and author of that charming creation, "Giselle," has a new ballet ready called "The Peri," which will be out in a few days. Apropos, we have lost Vestris, who died last Monday week, having nearly attained his 83d year. Born in 1760, he came out in 1772, and retired in 1816. Perrot and Taglioni were amongst his pupils.

The Prince of Moscow (Marshal Ney's son), who is a pretty composer, is establishing a society like that of the Ancient Concerts in London, to perform the music of the old masters.

The death of the Count of Candia (Maria's father) will prevent the appearance of that tenor for some time at the Italian Opera.

The incomparable Déjazet is making quite a sensation in a new piece at the Palais Royal, called "Capitaine Charlotte," who is not Werther's Charlotte, but a Parisian modeste, who in Lisbon captivates in male attire the queen. The piece is replete with piquant situations, which you will be able to appreciate yourself, as Déjazet visits London in your season.

The political world has been scandalized at a theatrical début at the Odéon, the second Théâtre Français. Under the name of M. Max, a person has appeared in the part of Oronnone, in Voltaire's "Zaire," who formerly held the distinguished post of Sub-Prefect of Compiègne. M. Hippolyte Bonnellier (for that is Max's real name—what a pity he was not sufficiently aristocratical to be Almack's in his career!) was one of the July combatants, and was Secretary in 1830 of the Provisional Government; but having been disappointed in his political career, although the post of Sub-Prefect may lead to a Minister's portfolio, he has taken to the stage, to the great annoyance of governmental men, who find public functionaries lowered in the eyes of the public by such a début. M. Max, for the rest, was quite successful, and is accepted as a most promising tragedian.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert has just presented twenty guineas to the funds of the Westminster Literary, Scientific, and Mechanics' Institution, of which his Royal Highness is the illustrious patron. The Duke of Northumberland, the Duke of Buccleuch, the Duke of Sutherland, the Marquis of Lansdowne, and the Marquis of Westminster, are among the distinguished donors to this institution.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Bishop of Llandaff, attended a meeting of the Ecclesiastical Commission at the office in Whitehall-place, on Tuesday afternoon.

On Tuesday, his Excellency the Turkish Ambassador accompanied by Mons. de Place, and by his excellency's dragoman, inspected very minutely the different departments of the Westminster Bridewell. His Excellency expressed great admiration of the cleanliness and good order of the establishment. His Excellency is a young man, about twenty-five years of age, possessing a very pleasing manner and countenance. He has been Ambassador at the Court of Great Britain about six months.

Major Malcolm, of the 3rd (the King's Own) Light Dragoons, who brought the important despatches from our Plenipotentiaries in China, after transacting business at the Foreign-office, left the London Hotel, Albemarle-street, on a visit to his mother, Lady Malcolm, at Warfield Park, Berks; and on Tuesday the gallant officer returned to town, accompanied by her ladyship, and again had an interview with Lord Aberdeen. It is understood that the Major, who is son of the late Sir J. Malcolm, formerly Governor of Bombay, will not remain in town more than a fortnight, when he will return to China with despatches from the Foreign-office.

Captain Whittingham, with despatches from Sir Hugh Gough for Lord Stanley, her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for War and the Colonies, arrived in Town on Tuesday, and attended at the Colonial Office in the afternoon. Captain Whittingham is the bearer of a number of Chinese standards, captured by the British army during the recent operations in China.

THE NATIONAL STATUES. Sir Robert Peel has confided the execution of the statues which Parliament voted last session to the memory of the three modern heroes to furee sculptors from the capitals of the three kingdoms. Mr. MacDowal, A.R.A., of Margaret-street, Cavendish-square, has been selected by him to model that of Lord Exmouth; Mr. Steele, of Edinburgh, that of Lord De Saumarez; and we observe that at a recent meeting of the Royal Dublin Society Lord De Grey announced that on his recommendation the monument to Sir Sydney Smith had been confided to Mr. Kirk, of that city. Sir R. Peel has announced his desire to discontinue the old practice of giving a monopoly of all the great orders to artists of great name, and to make the patronage of this kind at the disposal of Government available for bringing forward men whose fame has not yet risen to a point commensurate with their genius. We understand that in this instance the Premier visited in person the studio of Mr. MacDowall before making his selection. Mr. MacDowal is the sculptor of the charming statue of "A Girl at Prayer," in the last exhibition of the Academy.

FOUNDER'S DAY AT THE CHARTERHOUSE.—This anniversary, instituted in honour of Thomas Sutton, the founder of the Charterhouse in 1611, was celebrated on Monday. Amongst the Carthusians, of whom there was a great number present, dressed in the order of the Brothers, were the Rev. Archdeacon Hale, Lieutenant-General Hodgson, Drs. Babington and Paul, Messrs. Wallord, Hodson, Webster, and others. At four o'clock the members, amounting to more than 100, accompanied by 150 of the scholars, walked in procession to the chapel, where the service for the day was performed, the choir being accompanied by Mr. Walker on the new organ which has just been erected by order of the governors. The Bishop of London then delivered an impressive discourse from the fourth chapter of Peter, ver. 11 —"That God in all things may be glorified." The right rev. prelate concluded the discourse with a general admonition to the youths in attendance as regarded their schoolmates and other duties. The congregation then proceeded, headed by the bishop and governors with their wands, up the grand staircase to the large room, where an oration in Latin was delivered by Mr. W. P. Hale, son of Archdeacon Hale, the master. It was couched in very elegant language, and addressed ad Carthusianos. It dwelt, amongst other things, on the recent decease of the Rev. Dr. Fisher, who had been 38 years master of the school, and also on the demise of the Earl of Harrowby, one of the late governors. The speaker concluded, amid much applause, with some well-expressed compliments to the Bishop of London. After inspecting the chapel, which has recently been enlarged and beautified, and likewise the hospital, which contains upwards of 80 infirm and aged men, the governors and members dined together at the large hall. During the day a déjeûner à la fourchette was given to the boys and to all the pensioners connected with the charity.

At a Court of Bailiffs, Wardens, and Assistants of the Weavers' Company in Basinghall-street, Under-Sheriff Hardwick was unanimously elected clerk of the Company, in the place of Mr. John Phipps, resigned.

CHARITIES FOR THE BLIND.—A general court of the governors of this charity, established in connection with the Painters' Company, under the wife of Mr. John Stedman, Mr. Cook and others, was held on Wednesday at the Painters' Hall, Queenhithe; Mr. Roberts, the master, in the chair. The report stated that the charity was instituted in 1797, for the benefit of aged blind men and women, who, to become qualified for pensioners, must be upwards of 60 years of age, have been totally blind for three years, and unable to maintain themselves. The institution now extended its aid to all persons of this class throughout England, on receiving a certificate from the minister of the parish. At present there were 150 pensioners on its funds. After some routine business, relating generally to the affairs of the institution, an election to fill up vacancies on the list of pensioners took place, and the meeting broke up.

ALMSGIVAL DISPENSARY. On Wednesday morning a quarterly general court of governors of the above dispensary was held in the board-room, Aldersgate-street. Mr. Herring, the treasurer, was in the chair. The secretary read the report, from which it appeared that the number of patients relieved and cured by the dispensary during the past quarter was greater than at any former period, by between 200 and 300, making the applicants above 2,000. The institution was considered to be of more immediate service to the poor than the hospitals; for in the latter patients were only taken on particular days, while the former distributed its relief throughout the week. The committee anticipated much support to the charity from the anniversary dinner, fixed for March next, at which Lord Carrington, whose noble father had given £600 to the institution, would preside. The report was received, after which thanks were given to the chairman, and the meeting separated.

THE WEATHER.—A most extraordinary change took place in the weather on Monday night. The atmosphere, after being cold and damp, suddenly changed to the genial mildness of spring; and Tuesday more resembled a fine May or June day than the middle of December—the sky having been unobscured by clouds, and the sun having shone out with warmth and brilliancy.

We are glad to find that the London and Birmingham Railway Company have adopted the recommendation of the jury who sat upon the body of the unfortunate Mrs. Bye, and placed a luggage van between the tender and the first passenger carriage in their different trains, by which it is hoped that fatal consequences may be prevented from attending accidents for the future.

CHURCH EXTENSION.—There are now twelve new churches in the course of erection, or about to be commenced, in various parts of the metropolis; one in the Kent-road, in the parish of St. George, Southwark, one in the parish of Paddington, another on the site of the old Broadway chapel Westminster, a large church with a lofty Gothic tower, in which a musical peal of bells is to be placed, in Wilton-square, Knightsbridge; three in Bethnal-green parish, and a church in St. Pancras parish. Sites have been chosen for a new church in the Waterloo district of Lambeth parish, another in St. Botolph Without, Aldgate, in the county of Middlesex, and a third in St. George-in-the-East. The new parish church of St. Giles, Camberwell, building on the site of the old edifice, which was destroyed by fire, is progressing rapidly, and will be a noble and spacious edifice. The new church at Paddington will be a great ornament to that neighbourhood.

NEW POLICE COURT.—Tuesday night's Gazette contains an order in council, directing that the police court now established in Wapping, and known by the name of "Thames Police Court," shall, from and after the twenty-first instant, be removed to the new building lately erected in Arbour-square, Mile-end Old-town.

THE MODEL PRISON.—The commissioners for the government of Pentonville Prison held a meeting on Monday. There were present the Duke of Richmond, the Earl of Devon, the Earl of Chichester, Lord John Russell, Sir Benjamin Brodie, Dr. Fergusson, Major Jebb, Mr. Crawford, and Mr. Russell. It is understood that the rules and dietary are finally settled, and that the prison will be occupied in the course of the present week.

LLOYD'S.—A general meeting of the subscribers of this Institution was held on Wednesday, at the South Sea House, G. R. Robinson, Esq., in the chair; when, after the business connected with the internal arrangements of the establishment had been disposed of, the following votes from the funds were unanimously agreed to, viz.:—£212 to twelve fishermen, for saving the crew of the barque Watt, from Quebec to Plymouth, run on shore near Eastbourne, 26th October. £212 to twelve inhabitants of Barnes, near Sheerness, for rescuing the crew of the Restigouche packet, from Gibraltar to Bilboa, wrecked near that port, 24th October.

DREADFUL FIRE AND LOSS OF LIFE.—At a late hour on Wednesday night last the victuaries of the Moorfields and Goodman's-fields were thrown into a most painful state of excitement by the outbreak of a dreadful fire, accompanied by fearful sacrifice of human life, in Little Prescott-street, Goodman's-yard, Minories. The premises in which this deplorable event originated were situate at the west side of the street, within a few yards of the Blackwall Railway. They consisted of a dwelling-house, four stories high, the property of Mr. Cook, a soap-boiler, in Goodman's-fields, who lets them out to numerous families, to the number, it was reported, of no fewer than 25 individuals. The discovery was made at about a quarter past ten o'clock, by some of the inhabitants, whose attention was attracted by the smoke and sparks issuing from the room over the shop tenanted by the Dutch-drop maker. They instantly commenced knocking violently at the street-door, whilst others endeavored to arouse the inmates by throwing stones at the windows; but for a little time none of them made their appearance. At last the front door was opened, and two females rushed out across the street in a state of nudity. By this time police constable Thomas Rutlege, 192 of the H division, came up, in company with other constables, when an attempt was made to force a passage up the staircase, but it was found impracticable, in consequence of the smoke and heat, which were intense. A few minutes afterwards two females made their appearance at the windows of the second floor, in a state of great suffering. It was evident the window was their only means of escape, and the crowd, which had now increased to nearly one hundred persons, shouted out to them to hold on until some ladders were brought, while others called for them to jump out. One of the poor creatures got one of her legs over the sill of the window, and after remaining in that position for a second or two, threw herself out, and fell with awful violence upon the pavement, smashing, apparently, every bone in her body, the height being upwards of 35 feet. Directly afterwards the other preeipitated herself in a similar manner; but, fortunately, her fall was in a slight way broken by alighting on the lead front of the shop-window; before being picked up she was found to be dreadfully injured, and as soon as the stretcher could be procured, she was forthwith conveyed to the London Hospital. The other unfortunate sufferer proved to be dead. She was recognised to be Julia Holland, and the other sister, Nancy Holland, both young women under the age of three and twenty. In the interval the terrible element had made rapid progress; it had extended up the staircase to the rooms above, and shortly shot forth from the roof, attracting an immense concourse of persons to the spot. Immediately the firemen on the premises used every effort to ascertain whether any person remained on the premises, but such was the consternation that prevailed that they were utterly unable to obtain the slightest information upon the subject. Shortly after the fire had been somewhat got under Mr. Braidwood directed several of his men to discover whether any person was missing, and shortly they went from a poor man, named Proudfoot, who tenanted a room on the second floor, that three of his children were not to be found. He said he had saved his wife and two children, but whether any one had perished in the ground-floor he was unable to say, as everyone was running about in all directions in quest of them, and appeared almost distracted. Upon this information Mr. Braidwood ordered two of his men to ascend the scaling ladders, which had been placed against the wall of the premises, and the rums would permit, to search among them. At one o'clock in the morning two bodies, namely, those of the children, were found by Carter and another of the brigade among the rafters of the flooring, on the second floor, horribly burnt and disfigured. These proved to be poor Proudfoot's children. Shortly after another body of a child was found on the same floor, apparently a girl of about six years. On further searching the ruins, the firemen discovered three other bodies, namely, that of an elderly female and two children. The latter are supposed to be the mother and sisters of the unfortunate creatures, Julia and Nancy Holland, who threw themselves out of the window. It is impossible to identify them, nothing remaining but their trunks, burnt almost to a cinder.

SERIOUS ACCIDENT.—On Wednesday afternoon a serious accident occurred to a man named Charles Smith, 45 years of age, at the terminus of the Croydon Railway, at London-bridge. It appeared that whilst he was employed, with some other workmen, in hoisting up a large block of stone to the top of the new buildings now in course of erection at the terminus, one of the planks of the scaffolding gave way, and he was precipitated to the ground from a height of between 40 and 50 feet. He was conveyed to Guy's Hospital, where he lies in a very dangerous state.

DETERMINED SUICIDE. At ten o'clock on Monday night a female jumped off the swivel bridge in Old Grave-lane, Wapping, into the London Dock, which is upwards of 24 feet in depth, and an alarm being raised by the people who were passing over the bridge at the time, a Thames-police-constable, named Joseph Sham, 40, procured the grapples and dragged for the body. In about threequarters of an hour it was found, and conveyed to the station-house in the London Dock. Dr. Bloomfield, who was in attendance adopted the usual means to restore animation, but failed.

About three o'clock on Saturday afternoon, two persons, having the appearance of gentlemen, called at Mr. Smith's the jeweller's in Duke-street, Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, and expressed a wish to look at some gold chains, and were accordingly conducted to the showroom. While there they examined various articles, and departed at last without making a purchase. Some time after they had left it was discovered that they had stolen and carried off with them a single-stone diamond ring, weighing 4 grains, valued at £30; a ditto, 5 grains, valued at 16 guineas; a diamond ring, with seven stones, valued at £21 10s; and a half-hoop diamond ring, with seven stones, valued at £11.

Information was received at the general police-office, Great Scotland-yard, of the following robbery perpetrated in the merchandize-office of the terminus of the Great Western Railway:—The sum of £16 in sovereigns and half-sovereigns, and £5 in half-crowns, was stolen. The robber is supposed to be a person named Shepherd, in the employ of the railway-carrier, who has since absconded, and a reward has been offered for his apprehension. He is five feet nine or ten inches in height, dark swarthy complexion, with black whiskers. He was dressed at the time in a black frock-coat and waistcoat, and corderoy trousers.

On Tuesday morning last an attempt was made to murder a female named Elizabeth Marnus, who acts as barmaid at the Auction Mart Tavern, in the City, by a young fellow who is employed as potboy in that establishment. It appears that, after discharging a pistol, loaded with ball, at his victim, who incurred no serious injury, after passing through her right side, lodged in her clothes, the assassin endeavoured to cut his own throat, but was arrested before completing his purpose. It is said that slighted love was the cause of this fierce attempt. The female is expected to recover.

ROBBERY AND ROBBERY.—On Monday night, or early the following morning, the house of Mr. Coates, the extensive wine-merchant and gin-shop keeper, in High-street, Whitechapel, was burglariously entered, and cash, consisting of gold and silver, and amounting to upwards of £70, carried away by the thieves.

POSTSCRIPT.

Friday Evening.

WINDSOR, Thursday.—Prince Albert hunted with his beautiful pack of beagles in the Great Park. The Queen and Prince Albert took their usual early walk in the Home Park in the forenoon, and in the afternoon her Majesty and his Royal Highness again walked out. It is now fully determined that her Majesty will not visit Claremont until after Christmas. It is expected that the Court will leave Windsor for about a week or ten days, in the early part of January, for Claremont, returning to the Castle from thence, and proceeding to Buckingham Palace, for a lengthened stay, the last Monday or Tuesday in that month.

THE TELEMAQUE.

The works upon the Telemaque have been suddenly brought to a close; not that the treasure has been found, and, therefore, the object for which they were commenced been accomplished; nor, on the other hand, because there is any proof of the non-existence of that treasure; for the engineer expresses himself more confidently than ever upon that point, and Mr. Davis, chain, cable, and anchor manufacturer at Havre, has addressed a letter to the editor of the Journal du Havre, in which he states that, on the 26th ult., about two o'clock in the afternoon, he obtained the perfect conviction that the vessel really contained articles of food. He concludes his statement thus:—"I cannot doubt the responsibility of this declaration, when goes to the extent of guaranteeing the truth of facts which I have myself witnessed." But whether there be treasure on board or not, the operations for the present have been discontinued. The engineer, in a letter addressed to the editor of the Times, gives the following reason for adopting this course:—

"Quillebœuf, Dec. 12, 1842.

"Sir,—In prosecuting the salvage of the Telemaque, it would have been advisable to have conclud ed the same this season, but from the fact of the winter having set in, the exposed position of the works, the difficulty of keeping the men at their work, on account of the boldness of the water, the increasing rapidity of the ebb-tides bringing down large quantities of sand, I am obliged to suspend the operations until April next. If the place in which Le Telemaque was sunk were of an ordinary kind, it would not have required so long a time to have brought this affair to an end; but the nature of the tides is such, that it is only during the neaps that anything can be done with safety, as the ship is lying across the stream, this seriously increasing the difficulty; the ice also descends the river in great quantities during the winter, so that a continuance of the works for a longer time would be attended with great risk and uncertainty; the vessel is now surrounded by a double line of piles, secured by chain cables and anchors, and is in a fine position to be operated upon, as soon as the winter shall have passed away, when the work will be immediately commenced. Until now, we have only taken out boxes of timber, but we have too many evidences of the existence of treasure on board to think of abandoning the enterprise until the last morsel of the ship and cargo shall have been delivered.

"I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

"W. H. TAYLOR.

"Engineer of the works of the Telemaque."

There is a rumour, that in removing the harpoons a considerable portion of her starboard side, which is underneath, owing to the dilapidated state of the wreck, has sunk. If this is the case, it will at once account for the necessity of postponing any further operations upon the wreck until the spring, although it can be easily raised again, yet it will require more time to do it than the present advanced state of the season will allow.

THE FIRE IN GOODMAN'S-FIELDS.—CORONER'S INQUEST.—The inquiry into the circumstances of the above melancholy catastrophe was commenced on Thursday before W. Baker, Esq., and a respectable jury, at the Royal Standard beer-shop, corner of Great Prescott-street. Frightful as the consequences of the fire appeared from the previous statement, the extent of human life sacrificed on the occasion was unfortunately proven not to be so great. It is now ascertained that no less than eight individuals have fallen victims to this distressing calamity. But, although the loss of life has been so extensive, it is not a little remarkable that the house itself is only partially burnt, the ground-floor has escaped without injury, except from water, and the first-floor rooms (in one of which it originated) are not completely gutted. Above this story the destruction is complete, and it was in these floors that the wretched inmates lived who have been thus suddenly called to their account. The first-floor front room, in which the fire broke out, was tenanted by a Dutchman named Younker, or Vandyke, and his wife, an elderly woman. Several witnesses were examined, but as Younker was not present, and as the bodies could not be identified, the coroner adjourned the inquest. Younker is a man of some property. He had been in the neighbourhood during the morning, and about eleven o'clock, while looking over the ruins, discovered a box, partly burned, containing diamonds to the amount of £200 in value.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT, THURSDAY. (Before Mr. Baron Alderson and Baron Gurney.)—Mr. Barnes Reynolds, aged 23; David Barnes, 33; George Deane, 23; James M'Donald, 23; and George Soile, 26; sailors, were placed at the bar, charged with feloniously killing and slaying Joseph Hogg on the high seas, within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England.—The prosecution was conducted by Messrs. Bodkin and Doane. The prisoner Reynolds was defended by Mr. Clarkson; the other prisoners by Mr. Ballantine, Mr. Wilkins,—Several witnesses having been examined, Mr. Baron Alderson said he considered that the evidence was of sufficient to sustain the indictment, and the prisoners were accordingly acquitted.

Edward Stallope Wentworth, alias Mr. Henry Stanhope, alias Sinclair, aged 30, and described as a labourer, was indicted for stealing, in the dwelling-house of Mr. John Meadows, after a previous conviction for felony, two gold watches, and other property, the goods of his employer.—Mr. Doane gave the facts of this case at length, after which

The prisoner was under examination by the police-office. Several witnesses having been examined, the prisoner addressed a long and rambling defence, the gist of which was, that the whole affair was a conspiracy against him.—Mr. Baron Gurney. Have you any witness to call?—Prisoner. Oh, no; certainly not.—The jury having heard the summing up of his learned judge, immediately returned a verdict of Guilty.—Proud was then given of the prisoner having been formerly convicted of stealing three watches, value £30. He was tried in March, 1839, and sentenced to transportation for life. Mr. Baron Alderson inquired how it happened that the prisoner had got free from the sentence of transportation for life?—Mr. Clarkson said that he understood it was in consequence of representations having been made to the secretary of State that the prisoner had during the troubles in Ireland, given great and useful information to the Government. It appeared, however, that it must have been given by some older member of the prisoner's family, or by some person of this same name. Mr. Clarkson then said that there were several other charges against the prisoner.—Mr. Baron Gurney said it was quite unnecessary to allude to them, as nothing that could be brought forward could enhance the punishment which the court had determined to inflict. His lordship then addressed the prisoner, and having commented upon his conduct, informed him that he might be assured the sentence now about to be pronounced would be carried into full effect. It was, that he be transported beyond the seas for the term of his natural life. A female in the gallery: Thank God!—There were strong symptoms of an indisposition to applaud by the auditors at the passing of the sentence on the prisoner, but it was checked by the officers of the court.

NEW COURT.—(Before the Common Sergeant.)—George Reles and Thomas Williamson, who had been tried on several charges of felony, and also were convicted of stealing nine chests of tea, value £92, were brought up to receive judgment.—The Common Sergeant said that he only refrained from transporting them in consequence of the character they had received. The sentence was, that they each be imprisoned in the House of Correction for one year.

VIEW OF QUILLEBŒUF.

The great interest and curiosity that has attached to the raising of the supposed treasure-ship Telemaque, and the fact that the leading morning journals appear to have thought the subject of sufficient importance to warrant their having correspondents at the scene of action, have induced us to place the whole affair before our readers in the form of illustration, and to add an accredited account of the transactions up to the moment almost of our going to press.

Quillebœuf is a small unimportant town on the right bank of the Seine, about ten leagues from Havre, and is inhabited chiefly by pilots and fishermen. The navigation of the river in this locality is extremely difficult and dangerous, in consequence of the extraordinary nature of the sands, which shift their position from time to time from one part of the river to another; so that the channel which to-day is perfectly clear and safe, may, in a few days, be choaked up with sand, and a new channel may be opened where now there is a sand-bank. In addition to the shifting sands, there is another source of difficulty that vessels have to contend with there, in the peculiar nature and extreme rapidity of the tides, which run with such velocity, that any ship which may have the misfortune to touch the sands would be immediately thrown on her side by the force with which the water rushes upon her. This was the case with the Telemaque.

At the commencement of the year 1790, during the French revolution, the Royal Family of France, and a number of the nobility and clergy, had decided upon quitting the country in the hope of saving their lives and such part of their property as they could carry off. The king was unfortunately arrested in his flight at Varennnes and taken back to Paris, where he was kept a prisoner until his execution. On the 1st of January two vessels, the Telemaque and another, left Rouen, with the ostensible purpose of proceeding to Brest. The authorities suspecting that they were laden with the wealth of a number of the royalists who were about to quit the county by stealth, gave orders to have them detained and examined. The consort of the Telemaque was overtaken in the Seine, and a considerable quantity of plate and money belonging to the Royal Family was found on board and seized, and conveyed under a strong escort to Pont Audemer. The Telemaque escaped seizure by being wrecked; this occurred on the 3d January, 1790. Shortly afterwards the French Government determined to make an attempt to raise her, and sent a strong body of men and some of the first engineers from Cherbourg, to endeavour to accomplish it. At the end of three months, however, the enterprise was abandoned as impracticable. Since that period several other attempts have been made by different parties, all of which were ultimately unsuccessful. The reason why all these attempts have failed is this:—the ebb tide runs ten hours, and the current passes the wreck, towards the sea, at a velocity of from five to ten miles per hour, until it is met by the flût, or bore of the ascending tide, which only takes two hours in making, although, during this short period, the water rises nearly 12 feet. The method by which the attempts were made to raise the wreck was this:—Several large barges, of from 300 to 500 tons each, were moored near the spot, and heavy chains were passed under the bows and stern of the wreck, and made fast to the barges, with the expectation that when the flood tide came in it would lift them, and thus weigh the wreck, which at the top of high water they could land. This plan never succeeded from this cause:—To pass the chains under the wreck and fasten them to the barges requires time; meanwhile the tide is rapidly falling, so that while one chain is being fastened those previously fastened are getting slack as the barges fall with the tide. The chains are, therefore, not equally tight, and cannot bear their proportionate weight. In five minutes the flood tide comes rushing up the river meeting the descending ebb, and forming a wall of water from three to five feet in height. This strikes vessels, or whatever may be in the way, with overwhelming force. The barges are struck by this advancing wave, and are lifted instantly three or four feet, and by this sudden rise they are either crushed themselves like egg-shells, or the chains, from the unequal strain upon them, are parted one after the other like so many pieces of thread.

Mr. Taylor, the present engineer, has acted upon a different plan based upon this principle, that the power to be applied in lifting the ship, in order to be effective, must be entirely independent of the rise and fall of the tide. The "Times" has given the following admirable and graphic description of the operations which have been adopted to remove the wreck from its submarine bed:—"In the first place a chaland or hulk was moored with two anchors ahead and three astern, adjacent to the spot where the Telemaque was sunk. A temporary stage was erected on the side of the chaland, upon which an apparatus for driving piles was fixed. A number of piles were then driven through the sands until they took firm hold of the rocky foundation beneath, and as soon as a sufficient number of them had been driven in, another stage was erected upon them, from which the operation of pile driving was continued until the whole of the wreck was surrounded with piles, the stage being extended as the piles became fixed. Each pile, after it had been driven in, was still further secured by a chain cable, with an anchor at the other end, being fastened to the top. The anchors were carried by the boats to some distance and then let go, so that in addition to the lower part of the piles being firmly fixed in the ground, the upper part was also securely moored. This was deemed necessary to guard against the great strength of the tide itself, which runs like a sluice, but more particularly to guard against any thing which might be driven, by the force of the tide, on the piles, which, in all probability, without this precaution, would be carried away. Having thus well secured the piles, which were to serve as the foundation upon which the apparatus for raising the ship was to be placed, several large beams of timber running over the whole length of the vessel, from stem to stern, and similar beams in a tranverse direction, all well secured together, were placed upon the stage, forming a strong bridge or cradle immediately over the wreck. Rods of iron, each 30 feet in length, 8 feet of which were barbed or jagged, so that when once driven in they would take a firm hold, were then forced by the pile-drivers through the whole breadth of the ship, as she lay on her beam-ends, entering the port side, and thoroughly perforating the timber with which she is laden until they took hold of the starboard side, which is underneath the whole. These rods, each having a chain to it, were driven in all parts of the vessel, and the chains made fast to the bridge or cradle above. Particular care was taken that the chains were all made fast at the same tension, so that when the leverage should be applied to raise the cradle, no one chain should have a greater strain upon it than another. In driving in these rods, a circumstance occurred which tends in some measure to confirm the supposition that there is bullion on board. A number of them were easily driven through the ship, but many others, after perforating the vessel a few feet, met with some metallic obstruction which prevented them from being driven further in. When about 80 of these harpoons had been fixed in the vessel, and all made fast by their chains to the cradle, as already described, the cradle was raised by means of a number of screws which were placed under it, and simultaneously set in motion. This powerful leverage fully accomplished the object intended by the engineer, which was, to raise the wreck a sufficient height from the sands to allow the chains in which it was intended to sling her to be passed under her keel. Several chains were so passed under her, and the ends of each made fast to the cradle, so that the weight of the vessel was transferred from the harpoons to them. In this position the cradle, to which the wreck was now securely slung, was raised by the screws from time to time, until the uppermost part of the wreck—her port side—was brought to the surface at low water."

RAISING THE TELEMAQUE.

DEATH OF LORD HILL.

This melancholy event, which has been anticipated some time, we regret to state took place on Saturday morning last. His lordship expired at 20 minutes before nine o'clock, at his seat, Hardwicke Grange, near Shrewsbury. For some weeks past his lordship had been confined to his room, and his health had been gradually declining. His relatives and friends have been unremitting in their attendance upon him, and his last moments were cheered by the presence of those who were nearest and dearest to him. The following is a brief narrative of his lordship's eventful career:—

His lordship was born August 11, 1772, and was second son to the late Sir John Hill, Bart., of Hawkstone, who married Mary, one of the daughters and co-heiress of John Chambre, Esq., of Petton, in this county, by which lady he had 16 children, twelve of whom survived their mother. Lord Hill entered the army in the sixteenth year of his age, and commenced his military duty at Edinburgh, where he had the advantage of the best society, and received from many of the nobility and first families particular notice. His removal from Scotland took place in consequence of an offer he received of a Lieutenancy in Captain Broughton's (afterwards Lieutenant-General Sir John Broughton) independent company, on his raising the usual quota of men; this he soon accomplished, and then removed as Lieutenant to the 27th. His friends being anxious for his early promotion, obtained permission for him to raise an independent company, which gave him the rank of Captain in the army, in the year 1792; and having proceeded to Toulon, he was employed as Aide-de-Camp to the then successful generals commanding there, namely—Lord Mulgrave, General O'Hara, and Sir David Dundas. Captain Hill had not at that time attained his 21st year; but had the honour of receiving from each of his commanders decisive proofs of their approbation. He was slightly wounded in his right hand at the time General O'Hara was taken prisoner, and narrowly escaped with his life; it being undetermined for some minutes between himself and a brother Aide-de-Camp, Captain Snow, who should ascend a tree for the purpose of making observations respecting the enemy, the latter went up and received a mortal wound, whilst Captain Hill, standing immediately beneath, was preserved unhurt. His next appointment was to a company in the 53rd, with which regiment he was on duty in Scotland and Ireland.

His conduct at Toulon recommended him to the notice and friendship of Lord Lynedoch, who made him the offer of purchasing a majority in the 50th; this step was gladly acceded to by himself and friends, and was soon followed by promotion to a lieutenant-colonelcy in the same regiment. He went through arduous duty with the 90th at Gibraltar and other places, and had his full share in the memorable Egyptian campaign. In the action of the 13th of March, 1801, Major-General Craddock's brigade formed the front with the 90th regiment, commanded by Lord Hill, then Lieutenant-Colonel, as its advanced guard. On this occasion Colonel Hill received a wound on the right temple, from a musket-ball, the force of which was providentially averted by a strong brass binding in the front of his helmet; the blow was, however, severe, and he was removed from the field of battle in a state of insensibility.

Very soon after the return of the troops from Egypt, the 90th was ordered to proceed through Scotland to Ireland, and Colonel Hill continued unremittingly to perform his regimental duty, till he was appointed Brigadier-General on the Irish Staff. His principal stations in that country were Cork, Galway, and Fermoy; the inhabitants of which places manifested their approbation of his conduct by public addresses inserted in the Dublin papers. On leaving Cork he was presented with the freedom of that city. Early in the summer of 1808 he embarked with his brigade at Cove to join the army in England destined to act in the Peninsula, and most of our readers are in possession of the authentic facts connected with his lordship during the warfare.

On General Hill's arrival in England in the beginning of the year 1809, he found himself appointed Colonel of the third Garrison Battalion, and about the same period he became possessed of Hardwicke Grange, an estate left him by his uncle, the late Sir Richard Hill, Bart.

The General had not been many days in London before he was directed by his Royal Highness the Duke of York, Commander-in-Chief, to hold himself in readiness to take command of the troops ordered from Ireland for the second expedition to the Peninsula.

At the battle of Talavera General Hill was slightly wounded on the head; after which, the activity which enabled him to surprise a considerable corps of the enemy under General Girard, at Arroyo del Molino, is indicative of his high attainments as a military man. On this latter enterprise he captured the Prince de Aremberg, who was sent prisoner to Oswestry, and afterwards to Bridgenorth, both in this county.

After the battle of Arroyo del Molino, his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, in his speech at the opening of Parliament (1810), noticed in the following terms General Hill's success:—"The successful and brilliant enterprise which terminated in the surprise, in Spanish Estremadura, of a French corps by a detachment of the allied army under Lieutenant-General Hill, is highly creditable to that distinguished officer and the troops under his command, and has contributed materially to obstruct the designs of the enemy in that part of the Peninsula."

In addition to the above gratifying declaration, his Royal Highness conferred on the Lieutenant-General the honour of Knight of the Bath, and appointed him Governor of Hacknese Castle.

On the dissolution of Parliament in 1812 General Hill was elected for the borough of Shrewsbury.

In 1813 and 1814 the inhabitants of Shropshire erected a magnificent column, as a testimony of esteem to his lordship. In May, 1814, General Hill was created Baron Hill of Almarez and of Hawkstone, and an annuity of £2000 per annum was voted by Parliament to his lordship and his heirs male, with remainder to his nephew.

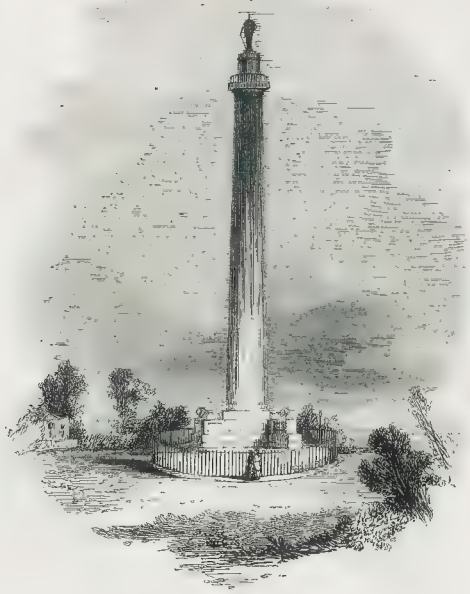
Peace having been signed at Paris in May, 1814, his lordship returned to the bosom of his venerable father and his friends at Hawkstone in the following month, where he hoped to pass the remainder of his days upon his estate, and among his friends; but he was immediately appointed to take command of an expedition against the Americans. Happily, however, negociation with that power terminated with the signature of peace, and the prospect of tranquility again opened to the world; but, alas! the hopes of repose were blasted by the return of Buonaparte from Elba, on the 4th of March, 1815, and his re-ascendancy in France. Immediately after this latter event, Lord Hill was ordered to take a command in the Netherlands, and was present at the ever memorable battle of Waterloo. His lordship on that occasion had a horse shot under him, and his two brothers were wounded.

To his military prowess let Portugal, Spain, the South of France, the Netherlands, the Duke of Wellington, the armies of the allies, and even those of the enemy, bear witness.

After the restoration of the Bourbon family to the throne of France, his lordship was appointed second in command of the army of occupation in that country, where he remained till the evacuation of the country by the allied armies.

In the year 1828 his lordship was appointed the General Commanding-in-Chief of the army of England, a situation at the Horse-Guards, which he continued to fill under several ministries.

Though we believe Lord Hill, as a commander, never suffered defeat, yet no heedless sacrifice of life ever purchased for him the field of victory. The laurels he bravely won were solely attributable to his generalship and extraordinary skill in directing the energies of the troops under his command. "With Hill," it was usually observed by the soldiery, "both life and victory may be ours."



MONUMENT TO LORD HILL AT SHREWSBURY.

PORTRAIT OF LORD HILL.

The most significant as well as the most graphic epitome of Lord Hill's brilliant career, is perhaps that inscribed upon the fine Doric column erected by the gratitude of the inhabitants of Shrewsbury, just at the entrance of the town. It is as follows:—

"To Lieutenant-General Rowland Lord Hill,
Baron Hill of Almarez and Hawkstone, G.C.B.,
Not more distinguished for his skill and courage in the field
During the arduous campaigns in Spain and Portugal,
the South of France,
And the memorable plains of Waterloo, than for his benevolent and paternal care in providing for the comforts, and supplying the necessities of his victorious countrymen, and for that humanity and generosity which their vanquished foes experienced and acknowledged;
The Inhabitants of the town and county of Salop
Have erected this column and statue
As a memorial of their respect and gratitude
To an illustrious contemporary
And an incitement to emulation
In the Heroes and Patriots of future ages.

The foregoing is translated as follows:—

"To their Countryman, Rowland Lord Hill,
Baron of Almarez and Hawkstone,
His Neighbours in the County and Town of Shrewsbury have erected this Column and Statue, A. D. 1816.

"To his Military Prowess at Portugal, Spain, the South of France, the Netherlands, the Duke of Wellington, the Armies of the Allies, and even those of the Enemy, bear witness.

"Rolica, Vimiera, Corunna, Talavera, Busaco, Arroyo del Molino, Almarez, Vittoria, Pyrenees, Nivelle, Nive, Hillette, Orthez, Aire, Tarbes, Toulouse, and Waterloo."

There is not one of these remarkable events, to the glorious consummation of which the daring intrepidity, or imperturbable coolness, promptitude, and presence of mind, of his lordship, did not materially contribute. Perhaps the one in which he most distinguished himself, and the success of which is almost exclusively attributable to him, is the desperate fight of Almarez, in 1812, March 16th, from which he took his second title. Wellington, having reserved for the plan of operations, directed Sir Rowland Hill to destroy the bridge of Almarez, defended on both sides of the river by very formidable works and a sufficient garrison. The French soldiers were crowded on the parapet of the bridge, watching the progress of an attack upon Miravete; which, however, was merely a feint, intended to have been simultaneous with the escalade. They had no suspicion of an attack till the rush of the assailants at their rear announced the opening of their firing parties alarmed them, already on the alert, into swift resistance. With a good order, exceeded only by their valour, the 50th Regiment, and one wing of the 71st, ascended the parapet, and the defenders gave way. Their contest for the interior defences was not short: they abandoned the entrenchment and tower, and fled to the tête du pont. Here was a scene of great confusion, of the pursuers, atta tended to him a paper; the following is a copy:—"The humble memorial of Caroline Sheriff, daughter of Sergeant Major Sheriff, 10th Regiment of Foot, which was lying in Glasgow, and while there had the rout to move rather suddenly, while I was not in a state to make any removal. I returned and found he had gone to Gravesend, where he embarked for the East Indies two days previously to my arrival, and I was thrown on the world without a friend to assist me; put through the kindness of his Grace the Duke of Wellington, and also Lord Hill, they have kindly given me a free passage to go to my father; but not having any one to assist me in providing provision for my voyage, I make this humble appeal to a generous public, which I trust will not be made in vain. The smallest donation will be most thankfully received and gratefully acknowledged by your poor petitioner, CAROLINE SHERIFF." On another page of the sheet upon which the memorial was written were the names of Lady Emily Harding, Lady Jersey, Lady Powis, and Lady C. Greville; together with signatures purporting to be those of an equally elevated station, and as it would appear, also liberally subscribed to the "necessaries" applicant out of her deficiencies. He (Dr. Campbell), imagining from what he had heard that the professor was an impostor, went out with the intention of calling upon Miss Parker, and on his return he found that the prisoner had made her escape, leaving behind her the memorial and a number of the nobility and gentry's cards of address; he lost no time in forwarding the papers, &c., to Mr. Mendicity Society, through the instrumentality of whose officer the prisoner was at length apprehended. It was farther proved that the prisoner had been in custody upon two or three previous occasions, and that she was known to be an assistant of begging letter impostors. In July last, when she was at Queen square police-court, she said that her father was Sergeant-Major of the 1st Life Guards.—The prisoner, who divided all her spoils with the movement or cards, and said that she had never been at Dr. Campbell's, was committed to the House of Correction for three months.

CLERKENWELL.—Mr. Osborne King, a surgeon, residing in Bernard-street, Brunswick-square, was charged with assaulting and obstructing police constable 41 E in the execution of his duty. The complainant deposed that he was on duty in James-street, Brunswick-square, on the previous night, between eleven and twelve o'clock, when the prisoner came up to him, and used abusive language towards him. Witness told him to go home, and that he had taken too much wine. The prisoner then followed him round Brunswick-square. He told him repeatedly to go away, but, as he still followed, he took him into custody. Mr. Greenwood: What did you take him into custody for?—Complainant: In order to put an end to the execution of his law, and for having been drunk.—Prisoner: I protest to God I was as sober then as I am now. I have been most cruelly treated, sir, and I hope you will do me justice.—Mr. Greenwood: Had you been drunk, policeman, what it was the prisoner had done, which justified you in taking him into custody.—Policeman: He was noisy and annoyed me. He dogged me round the square, and called me a "thief!"—Mr. Greenwood: I don't see surely you do not take every man into custody who uses abusive language to you.—Policeman: I did not remember it.—Mr. Greenwood: Is there any other charge against this gentleman?—Police sergeant Dodd said he was the acting sergeant at the station-house when the prisoner was brought in: he was drunk, and subsequently attempted to escape from the cells.—Mr. Greenwood: You can now make your defence.—Mr. King, who seemed to be in a state of great excitement, replied, I spent the evening with a friend in Tower-street, and was returning home perfectly sober, when I met the complainant at the corner of James-street. The fact is, he and other policemen there have an antipathy against me because I complained of one of them for ordering one of my servants. I found him in my area and complained of him. When I met the constable in question, he was the same, and said "Ah! the same saucy word. He told me I was drunk, and he ought to know my business. His manner and language so much enraged me that I did not go, but asked him how dare he make use of such language to a gentleman. For this he ordered me into the police-station, and I went with him. Another policeman, a tall man, who happened to be pass ng at the time, exclaimed against the severity of the complainant's treatment, and said the policeman had no business to take me into custody as I was doing no harm. I never saw the man before in my life, but he accompanied me to the station-house, and offered himself as bail for me, but I was dragged into a cell and locked up all night. I had been confined in that shocking cell all night, and was perfectly sober.—But the acting sergeant says you were drunk when you came to the station-house.—Prisoner: I solemnly swear I was not; I was greatly excited, because I knew that being charged in such a manner with drunkenness would probably ruin me in my profession.—Complainant: You attempted to bribe me; you offered me 5*s.* to let you go.—Prisoner: I did not, but the gentleman misunderstood me did.—Complainant: I did not misunderstand you.—Prisoner: On my way to the station-house I called on Will to protect me as an M.P. to witness the treatment I was receiving.—Mr. Greenwood: Where is Will?—The Wandsworth gentleman, and he was probably one of them there.—One of the officers of the court said: That Will was up there on business also at that time.—Police-constable 7 admitted that the gentleman did call upon him to witness the transaction. The prisoner called him when dragged into the cell, after bail had been refused, he wanted to get back to the charge-room to obtain the address of the gentleman who accompanied him, which was refused. It was evident that he could not think of engaging a magistrate to bail himself out. Mr. Greenwood: Do you think you could identify the gentleman who accompanied you to the station-house?—Prisoner: I could not, but the gentleman said he was a Lincoln's-inn field barrister, and he was probably one of them there.—Mr. Greenwood: Is there any other charge against this gentleman?

for the display in their brilliancy and importance of those points of character in a general which influence the course of battles and decide the fate of worlds.

A task of such importance may not be hastily assumed, and certainly cannot be easily accomplished. But in proportion to the obstacles to success is the amount of approbation due to the author, who, possessing the good taste, sound judgment, literary skill, and military experience requisite for the undertaking, copes boldly with the subject, and, mastering at once its broadest range and minutest details, grapples with, secures, and completes the work. This has been done, and done ably, by Mr. Maxwell, who, having a soldier's knowledge united to a soldier's enthusiasm, has finished this history in a style and tone worthy of himself and of the great warrior whom his volumes claim as their hero.

This biography, now completed and published as one entire work, found its way to our desk just as the news arrived of the death of Lord Hill, and we turned to it with additional curiosity from the recollection that the great soldier of whose career it chiefly treats had for a companion in many of his well-fought fields the gallant general just gathered to his fathers. Mr. Maxwell's book thus gained an additional claim to instant attention, and we opened the pages to regard once more the career of Wellington, and to glean some detailed particulars of the actions in which Lord Hill was more immediately concerned. In another column we are giving graphic as well as historical particulars of the departed soldier, and we here select a few passages to show to perfect the style of this high-toned and important history, and give some scenes of soldierly adventure illustrative of the life of the memorable spirit even now departed. We shall select also from the illustrations a few of the vignettes which, in addition to steel plates and plans of battles, embellish Mr. Maxwell's volumes. They all bear the impress of military character—slight-pictured glimpses of the scenes and positions which crowd thickly upon each other to perfect the picture of "active service." Dropped here and there into our columns, they may well embellish the narrative of a soldier's life.

The regular and orderly succession of events in the career of Lord Hill being given elsewhere in this paper we confine our present extracts to a description of particular scenes or incidents of which a life of active military service affords so many soul-stirring and graphic instances. One of Hill's chief battles was that of Arroyo Molinos. Soult had detached Girard with four thousand infantry and a thousand dragoons to prevent recruits and supplies from reaching the Spanish general. This force became so troublesome that Wellington determined, if possible, to oblige it to withdraw, and Hill was selected for the service. With energy and promptitude he put his corps into motion to attack the Frenchmen, and following his movements with great skill succeeded in effecting the

SURPRIZE AT ARROYO MOLINOS.

Arroyo Molinos is a little town situated at the foot of one extremity of the Sierra de Montanches; this mountain, which is every where steep, and appears almost inaccessible, forms a cove or crescent behind it, the two points of which are about two miles asunder. The Truxillo road winds under the eastern point; the road to Merida runs at right angles with that to Alcuescar; and that to Medellin between the Truxillo and Merida roads. The ground between Alcuescar and Arroyo Molinos is a plain, thinly scattered with cork trees and evergreen oaks; and General Hill's object was to place a body of troops so as to cut off the retreat of the enemy by any of these roads. Late in the evening, the allied corps reached Alcuescar, a village within four miles of Arroyo de Molinos. Their approach was not detected. The French had neglected to patrol; and the antipathy of the Spanish peasants to Girard, whose severity had been extreme, prevented him from receiving any intimation that a dangerous enemy was beside him. At two o'clock in the morning, Hill marched for Arroyo; and abandoning a bivouac, which throughout a tempestuous night had been uncheered by a single fire, through storm and darkness he moved silently on his enterprize. The delay in marching was alarming, but he reached a hollow within half-a-mile of the place at half-past six. Here, and undiscovered, his dispositions were rapidly completed. A column, under Lieut.-Colonel Stewart, marched upon the town; a second, under Major-General Howard, made an extensive detour round the right of Arroyo, to gain the Medellin road; and the allied cavalry moved between the brigades, ready to act wherever their services might be useful. A brigade of Girard had marched two hours before; but Dombronski's infantry, and Briche's dragoons, were only falling in on the Medellin road, when the alarm was communicated by a solitary videt. Girard was at first incredulous; but above the howling of the storm, the rush of infantry was heard, and in a few minutes the 71st and 92nd Regiments burst into the street, while the wild music of their bagpipes was heard amid the cheering of the Highlanders, playing the very apposite tune, "Hey, Johnny Cope, are ye wankin' yet?" Girard, and part of the dragoons had not quitted the village, but they now galloped off, making a bold and irregular resistance, while the infantry formed square, and attempted to cover their retreat. But their pursuers came fast upon them; one Highland regiment lined the vineyard fences—another formed line upon their right—the 50th Regiment secured the prisoners—and the rest of the column, with part of the cavalry, extended round the village, and cut off all escape. The English guns had now got up, and opened a crashing fire on the squares, while the French cavalry were dispersed by the charge of the allied dragoons, and the 18th rode bravely forward, and captured the artillery. But Girard kept his infantry together, and continued his retreat by the Truxillo road; the right column of the allies was, however, already in possession of that line, the cavalry and artillery were close upon the French flank, and the left column, having re-formed, was again coming up fast. Girard's men were falling by fifties, and his situation was desperate, yet he would not surrender, but giving the word to disperse, endeavoured to escape by scaling the almost inaccessible rocks of the sierra. His pursuers, not less obstinate, immediately divided. The Spaniards ascended the hills at an easier point beyond his left, the 50th Regiment and Ashworth's Portuguese turned the mountain by the Truxillo road; the 28th and 34th, led by General Howard, followed him step by step up the rocks, and prisoners were taken every moment, until the pursuers, Briche's loaded, were unable to continue the trial of speed with men who had thrown away their arms.

This clever and spirited affair was enhanced in value by the fact of a moral advantage being gained by it. It was "the first indication of a spirit of hopeful enterprize" in the British army during this campaign—and gave the troops a consciousness of their own superiority, which they henceforth sought opportunities of displaying. The success was obtained at a trifling waste of life on the side of the British—their opponents sustaining a heavy loss in killed and wounded. They lost also upwards of twelve hundred prisoners, incinding a general (Brun), a colonel of cavalry (Prince d'Aremberg), and thirty or forty inferior officers.—Passing rapidly over a succession of other services we come to another eventful day in Hill's career. It was the ACTION AT ST PIERRE.—HILL AND WELLINGTON.

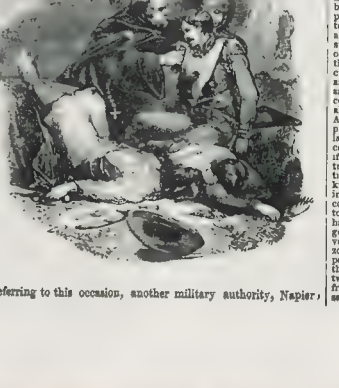
Had Sir Rowland Hill been still a nameless soldier the battle of the 13th would have established him at once as an officer of high pretensions. On the heights of St. Pierre, he found himself, with 13,600 men, and fourteen pieces of artillery, in his front assailed by seven infantry divisions, mustering 35,000 bayonets; in his rear threatened by the corps of General Paris and the cavalry under Pierre Soult. Never did a general abide a battle against greater odds and achieve a bolder victory! The thickness of the morning favoured Soult's order of attack, and his dispositions were consequently unobserved. Three infantry divisions, the cavalry of Sparre, and twenty pieces of artillery, marched against Hill's position; Foy's and Maransin's corps succeeded as a support; and a powerful reserve was in the rear. The mist hung heavily; and the French masses, at one moment quite shrouded in vapour, at another dimly seen, or looming sadden and large and dark at different points, appeared like thunder-clouds gathering before the storm. At half past eight Soult pushed back the British pickets in the centre, the sun burst out at that moment, the sparkling fire of the light troops spread wide in the valley, and crept up the hills on either flank, while the bellowing of forty pieces of artillery shook the banks of the Nive and the Adour. Darrican, marching on the French right, was directed against general Pringle. D'Armagnac, moving on their left and taking Old Moggerre as the point of direction, was ordered to force Byng's right. Abbé assailed the centre at St. Pierre, where General Stewart commanded; for Sir Rowland Hill had taken his station on a commanding mount in the rear, from whence he could see the whole battle and direct the movements. Ashworth's Portuguese brigade bore the brunt of the opening attack; and although the 71st, with two guns, and afterwards the 50th, were sent to their support, the whole were driven back, and the rest of the position won. Under the brow of the height the 92nd were formed. Instantly General Barnes led them forward, scattered the light troops who would have checked him, and charged and repulsed the column. But the French guns opened—their horse artillery commenced a close fire—a second column came forward with imposing steadiness—and the 92nd fell back, and re-formed behind the high ground. Happily a thick hedge covered the front of the Portuguese, and the wood upon the right was occupied by some companies of their Cagadores with a wing of the 50th, who held it against every effort of the enemy. The French had already put their grand column in march; and, when the occurrence might have been fatal, two British colonels (Dunbury, of the 3rd (Buffs), and Peacock, of the 71st) compromised the safety of their posts, and withdrew their regiments out of fire! Hill observed that Foy's and Maransin's divisions, after clearing the deep roads which had impeded them, were about to come to the assistance of Abbé, and therefore the battle must be won or lost upon a cast. He quitted the height where he had been posted—halted the Buffs—sent them again into action—and led back the 71st himself. Promptly employing his reserve, he directed one brigade of Le Cor's against D'Armanac's, and led the other in person against Abbé. In the meantime the wood was bravely held, and the 92nd again formed behind the village of St. Pierre, and again came on to dare a combat with a column in numbers five times its superior. But, strange to say, the challenge was declined. A mounted officer, who headed the enemy, waved his sword, and turned the French about; there was no pursuit, and the column retired across the valley, and resumed the position from which it had originally advanced.—It was noon—the assault upon the allied position had failed on every point—Pringle had driven back Soult's right wing—the battle had repulsed the left; but still there were sufficient troops disposable to have enabled Soult to have massed them in a column sufficiently strong to force the allied centre. Hill, consequently, reinforced it with the 57th—the sixth division, which had been despatched by Lord Wellington to his assistance, now topped the height behind—the fourth division, with Lord Wellington in person, presently appeared—part of the third division succeeded, and the seventh were coming on in long march. But the crisis of the day had passed; and the fresh divisions arrived upon the ground only to witness the glory of their brave companions. Buchan was driving D'Armanac's division from the ridge which it had previously carried—Byng clearing another rising ground of the enemy—the high road was vigorously attacked by the centre—and the French were everywhere deforced, and two pieces of artillery captured. Immediately, Lord Wellington, after congratulating Sir Rowland upon his success, ordered a general advance; and, until night closed, the retiring columns were vigorously pursued and sustained a heavy loss. Darkness, and very difficult ground, lessened casualties which must have been otherwise enormous; and Soult, after taking Foy's division across the Adour, sent two to Marsac, and left Count Drouet's in front of Mousserolles.

The action of St. Pierre lasted but a few hours; and on a space not exceeding a square mile, five thousand men were lying killed and wounded. When Lord Wellington rode up, one rapid glance across the battle-ground told how furiously the attack had been made, and with what stern bravery it had been repelled on every point; and seizing his lieutenant's hand, he exclaimed, while his eye sparkled with delight, "My dear Hill, the day's your own!" Never was a compliment more happily paid to skill and courage. It was delivered upon a field heaped with the corpses of the beaten enemy—the columns of attack were seen receding from a last effort, as vainly made, and as bloodily repulsed, as those desperate trials with which Soult throughout the day had hoped to shake the enduring valour of the allies; and, prouder honour, it issued from the lips of him on whose breath the fate of battles hung, and whose footsteps victory had attended.



Referring to this occasion, another military authority, Napier, observes, "like a true soldier Hill was resolved to win the fight with his own troops, and he did so in a manner which in less eventful times would have rendered him the hero of a nation."—As the strife thickens we have a glimpse of his services at

ORTHEZ.

How rapidly the fortunes of a battle alter! Immediately after he had changed his dispositions for attack, Lord Wellington ordered Hill's corps to force the bridge of Orthes, an order that was promptly executed. Comprehending in a moment how matters went, Hill, when he crossed the Gave, pushed rapidly forward by a parallel ridge, to that by which Soult must retire his beaten army to the Sault de Navailles. The French retreat had already commenced, and nothing could be more soldierly than the steadiness with which it was conducted, as the whole corps-d'armée fell back by echelons of divisions, each covering the movements of the other, and holding by turns the different positions which the ground they crossed presented. In this manner the French yielded, step by step, and without confusion, the allies advancing with an incessant deafening musketry and cannonade, yet losing many men, especially on the right, where the 3rd division were very strongly opposed. However, as the danger of being cut off at Salespice by Hill became more imminent, the retrograde movements were more hurried and confused; Hill seeing this, quickened his pace, until at last both sides began to run violently, and so many men broke from the French ranks, making across the fields towards the fords, and such a rush was necessarily made by the rest to gain the bridge of Sault de Navailles, that the whole country was covered with scattered bands. Sir Stapleton Cotton then breaking through, with Lord Edward Somerset's hussars, a small covering body opposed to him by Harispe, sabred two or three hundred men; and the 7th Hussars cut off about two thousand, who threw down their arms in an enclosed field; yet some confusion or mismanagement occurring, the greatest part recovering their weapons escaped, and the pursuit ceased at the Luy of Bearn. Never did a beaten army escape the worst consequences of a déroute more narrowly. Had the British cavalry been enabled to get forward with more celerity, a large portion of the French infantry must have been unavoidably cut off.

And thus goes on the gallant soldier in his glorious career, partaking the dangers and sharing the renown of successive campaigns, until the final and conclusive victory at Waterloo placed the seal upon the fate of Napoleon and afforded the armies of Europe an opportunity for rest upon their laurels which might in vain be sought whilst the star of Bonaparte was in the ascendant.

Recent events at Barcelona have drawn attention to the general bolding command in that city upon the outbreak of the recent insurrection, and who upon being forced by the insurgents to evacuate the town, retired to Montjuich. These volumes, fruitful in interest as valuable for facts, give us a curious history which will just now be read with peculiar zest.

A SPANISH ADVENTURER.—VAN HALEN.

A Spanish adventurer, named Juan Van Halen, was attached to Suchet's staff. Possessing a handsome person, imposing address, a ready wit, and an extraordinary turn for intrigue, his life had been a continued scene of change and deceit. He passed from the Spanish navy to the engineers; joined Blake's corps, after the battle of Rio Seco; and afterwards swore allegiance to King Joseph, and held a commission in his guards. He had served in every part of Europe, and was now employed by Suchet as an aide-de-camp. Finding that the Imperial cause was failing, he determined, by becoming a double traitor, to conciliate the Spanish authorities, and thus purchase an immunity for past crimes. Overtures were accordingly made to Eroles; and, by the agency of a mistress who followed the fortunes of this adventurer, he transmitted to the Spanish general accurate returns of the strength of the French armies, and all other information he was enabled to officially obtain. At last he secretly unlocked Suchet's portfolio, copied the key of his cipher, and prepared to desert to the Spaniards. The difficulty for him to join the French generals in sending and receiving information, as well from the activity of the Partidas as from the duplicity of the emissaries they employed, had originated many curious devices to render their communications unintelligible should they fall into an enemy's hand, and also prove their authenticity when they fortunately reached their destination. Among many others "Suchet had recourse to the ingenious artifice of placing a very small piece of light-coloured hair in the ciphered paper; the latter was then enclosed in a small, sealed, and wrapped in lead. When received, the small parcel was carefully opened on a sheet of white paper, and, if the hair was discovered, the communication was good, if not, the treachery was apparent, because the hair would escape the vigilance of uninitiated persons, and be lost by any intermediate examination. Van Halen knew this secret also, and when his emissaries had returned, after delivering the preparatory communication, he proceeded in person with a forged convention." Van Halen's first attempt was made on the governor of Tortosa. It was boldly commenced, and might have probably obtained success, had not General Robert, the commandant of the garrison, received intelligence during the night which excited his suspicions, and Van Halen was very nearly taken by a counter snare. At Lerida, Mequinenza, and Monzon, his artifice and effrontery succeeded, and three fortresses, in a state of perfect defence, were obtained by the audacity of a cheat. Monzon was at this time stored for seven months, Mequinenza for eighteen, and Lerida for two years. By the recovery of these places 40,000 inhabitants were saved from the miseries of a siege, and 6000 Spanish troops were rendered disposable for other service. The navigation of the Ebro, the Cinca, and the Segre was restored; the most fertile part of Catalonia delivered; Aragon secured; and a direct communication opened with Lord Wellington's army. The garrisons had been put in march, as they supposed, to join Suchet at Barcelona; but, on reaching the defiles at Martrie.l, they were suddenly surrounded. On a preconcerted signal the heights around were instantly covered with armed men. "It was in vain to offer resistance; and two generals, having 2500 men, four guns, and a rich military chest, capitulated, but upon conditions, which were granted and immediately violated, with circumstances of great harshness and insult to the prisoners. The odium of this baseness, which was quite gratuitous, since the French, helpless in the defile, must have submitted to any terms, attaches entirely to the Spaniards. Chuton refused to meddle in any manner with the convention. He had not been a party to Van Halen's deceit; he appeared only to ensure the surrender of an armed force in the field, which the Spaniards could not have subdued without his aid; he refused even to be present at any consultation previous to the capitulation."

Speaking of this same adventurer, Southey remarks, "Van Halen afterwards got into the Inquisition as a Freemason and a liberal, got out of it, published his adventures in English, went to Brussels, headed the inhabitants in that insurrection, the success of which they have had so much reason to repent, was suspected of treachery by the party whom he had served, thrown into prison, and after a while released. And there the drama of his unquiet life breaks off."—Have not recent events again taken up the thread of his history?

THE COMIC ALBUM; A BOOK FOR EVERY TABLE. 4to London: Orr and Co.

We have here an elegant and seasonable novelty—a comic quarto—a choice table book, decorated in arabesque colours and gold. A comic album, it differs in toto from all books of similar pretensions. Printed upon papers tinted with all the hues of the rainbow, and contrasting with each other as the leaves are turned pleasantly and rapidly over in enjoyment of their contents, it strikes the eye with such an aspect of newness—of complete and distinct novelty, as compared with its predecessors—that a wide and speedy circulation of the fun-diffusing volume may be safely prophesied. The illustrations are chiefly engraved upon wood—albeit, we have here and there music and lithographs. The patterns for Berlin wool assuming the form of portraits are uncommonly good, and ludicrous in the extreme—the comic follos of the French burlesque school have been industriously ransacked for every available morsel of fun—and our English artists who possess laughter-provoking pencils have used them diligently in adding to the attractions of the volume. The cuts are as thick as sweetmeats in a Twelfth-night cake, and likely to add, equally with that time-honoured favourite, to the sum total of Christmas festivities. The Chinese war affords great scope for humorous illustration; and, since the Times indulged jocose speculations upon the probable appearance of a Chinese ambassador in the salons of London, a fancy portrait of a Celestial dignitary may, with some verses, form a fitting tail-piece to our notice:—

THE CHINESE AMBASSADOR.

Oh, how they'll invite him and fête him about!
He'll be of next season the lion no doubt.
He'll shine at their routs; of each fancy bazaar,
The envoy celestial must be the star.
'Tis said that already the publishers look
To the chance of the Chinaman writing a book,
And a bibliopole, who in spirit ne'er fails,
Has opened a treaty for some of his tales.
His portrait they'll draw with astonishing zeal
On brass and on copper, as well as on steel;
His features they'll put upon wood and on stone,
Till he fancies (poor fellow) his head's not his own;
They'll take him to arsenals, show him reviews,
And cause him to shake, if there's room, in his shoes
To Woolwich by railroad they'll probably run him,
And, when he gets there, with artillery stun him;
Thro' the Tunnel they'll drag him, and fill him with wonder
When he can't understand how the Thames he stands under;
And when he returns to his country again,
How much to his Emperor will he explain.
He'll say that the tea in Great Britain to grow,
At least on the hedges, is wond'rously slow;
That the English are such a barbarian race,
Their method of eating is quite a disgrace;
For instead of the chopsticks, they take not a meal
Without having recourse to sharp weapons of steel.
The envoy, of course, will correctly note down
What he sees, or is told, in the country or town;
And when he has filled his recorder diurnal,
Get Murray or Longman to publish his journal!

The literary portion of the volume appears to have been divided between several known comic writers. Here is one of the illustrations of the income-tax:—

which the politeness of the proprietors enables us to extract; and now, commending "The Comic Album" to all Christmas parties, we have only to promise a return to its merry letter-press and embellishments in a future number.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XXIII.

THE MARQUIS OF WESTMINSTER.

It was once laid down as a political axiom by the "Quarterly Review," that every man of five hundred a year was naturally and necessarily a Conservative. There can be no doubt that wealth disposes its possessors to lean to the side opposed to innovation. The "fear of change," which the poet describes as "perplexing monarchs," is no less effective in disturbing the repose of the millionaire; but that the maxim of the "Quarterly" fails in its application to many to whom the "five hundred" it takes as its standard is not a single day's income, is proved by several eminent instances furnished by the House of Peers. Among them may be quoted the name of the nobleman whose portrait is annexed to the present sketch, the Marquis of Westminster. He, like the Duke of Bedford and the Marquis of Lansdowne, is an instance that even Quarterly Reviewers are not infallible, and that their maxims may be contradicted by experience. He is a man of unbounded wealth, is a peer of parliament, is surrounded by all the influences that may be supposed to bias him in the way suggested, and yet he was a consistent supporter of the Government of Lord Melbourne. The title of Marquis of Westminster is by no means an old one, as it was created only in 1831; perhaps its holder is even now as well known by his second title, the Earl of Grosvenor, as by his first.]

If we were to trace the rise of many of the families of the aristocracy, we should find the causes of that rise intimately connected with the changes society has undergone in England. With the gradual increase of population the value of land has risen, and those who happened to purchase or become possessed of it when it was of small account have risen in importance with the increase of their property. This has been the case all over the kingdom; but in certain localities the change has been more marked, more rapid, and the results more extraordinary. The property of the Marquis of Westminster, like much of the property of the House of Bedford, has probably been more increased by the changes of society and by the progress of improvement than that of any other member of the British peerage. If Westminster had always remained Thorney Island, and St. Martin's had still been St. Martin's in the Fields; if the grassy sod had never changed to flagged stones or wooden paving, and if hedgerows had never been succeeded by rows of richly-stored shops and mansions of princely splendour, the rent-roll of the noble marquis would never have swelled to the number of thousands which its sum-total at present exhibits. But so it has been, and such is the result. "Times change," says the Roman proverb, and men and rent-rolls change therewith: of course there is a reverse to the medal; all change is not for the better. Years roll over the heads of men, and with them they may bring degradation; they pass over the parchments, and lo! for increase there is diminution. The machine of society is full of balances and compensating forces: as one part goes up another is on the descending plane; and, on the whole, the distribution, in the long run, is more equal than at first appears. There seems a law of nature that forbids immense masses of wealth to remain long together; and, though the custom of inheritance in England favours accumulation rather than dispersion, yet how constantly is the work of dispersion going on! How seldom is it that the "hammer" is idle which knocks down the feudal estate to the son of commerce! as George Robins can abundantly testify. Much, indeed all, depends on the personal disposition of the possessor. The one who gains is seldom the one who enjoys, or, it may be, abuses what he gains; the man whose nature is to heap up wealth could not dissipate it without pain; he leaves that to be done by his successor, who very generally accomplishes it with very great success. Father and son differ, as in the verse of Pope—

"This year a reservoir, to save and spare;
The next, a fountain, spouting through his heir;"

and so the process goes on, and will unto the end. Gold, though the heaviest, is the most volatile and capricious of metals; and your bank note is the true modern leaf of the sibyl, borne away on the wind. All that we include in the term wealth does verily "make unto itself wings, and flees away." When great possessions, then, are spoken of, they should only be regarded as a great fund which accident has thrown into the hands of one individual, but which will sooner or later undergo the process of dispersion. It is difficult for ordinary men to conceive any amount of extravagance that would reduce the inheritance of a Marquis of Westminster to nought. But human passions are strong, and the devil is fertile in resources, being especially ingenious in devising temptations for those who can gratify them. Rascality, too, is ingenious in its deed, and regards the wealth of the world as its prey. There is no conceivable amount of wealth for which there could not be devised means of squandering, as no iceberg is so massy but it may be melted by continued exposure to the reducing power. But the uncertainty of riches will never abate the desire of possessing them, nor have we any wish to retail any of the hackneyed commonplaces on the subject, long ago worn threadbare, which everybody repeats, and everybody disregards. We suspect all who assert their contempt of wealth are guilty of self-deception, if not of hypocrisy; the great source of earthly power, and the great instrument of earthly good, ought not to be despised. Its worth as a source of happiness may be overrated; the conditions on which it is held may be overlooked; and to correct the errors of the world in these respects should be the object of all who deal with public questions with a view to public improvement. We have, on this occasion, been led insensibly into these few general remarks, which are not altogether out of place. Many a man may, by his attributes or qualities, serve to "point a moral," though his actions cannot adorn a tale."

The career of the Marquis of Westminster has not, indeed, been fertile of public or political incident: he was born 1767, so that he is now an older man than our portrait expresses him to be; it is from a likeness of an earlier period. He has gone through the usual stages in the life of an English nobleman: he sat in the House of Commons till 1802, as Lord Belgrave, and was then removed to the Peers by his succession to the earldom of Grosvenor; he was created Marquis of Westminster in 1831, and, as we have before stated, supported the Whig Government throughout the term of its existence. He is Lord Lieutenant of the county of Flint, and the holder of considerable church patronage.

THE CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XIX

ST. ANDREW'S, HOLBORN.

The church of St. Andrew's, Holborn, has but small claims to beauty of appearance, although rebuilt from the designs of Sir Christopher Wren. The highest praise that may be accorded to it is that of being commodious. The old church escaped the Fire of London only to fall into decay, and in 1686 was, with the exception of the tower, taken down, and replaced by the present building. This tower is a somewhat incongruous affair—the small windows in the lower story contrast oddly with the large ugly ones above; and, with the corner buttresses, betray at once the greater antiquity of this part of the structure. The body of the building, as our sketch will show, is divided into two stories, and is ornamented with a cornice and balustrade. The interior, which is very commodious, has nave, aisles, and a handsome chancel. A gallery ranges on either side, supported by pillars; with a third and upper gallery at the west end of the church for the accommodation of the charity school children. The ceiling is panelled, of large span, and decorated with festoons of fruit and flowers. The chancel is adorned profusely, but the taste which guided the decorations is that of a day happily gone by. The walls are wainscoted, and grained to imitate Sienna marble; paintings and gilding add to the attempted effect. Above the altar is a large window of stained glass, with representations of the Ascension and the Last Supper. The organ is by Harris, and celebrated as the instrument employed in the contest between its celebrated maker and Schmydt, in the Temple Church, when the palm was awarded to the organ of the latter.

With St. Andrew's, Holborn, three names are connected which possess a sad and mournful interest. In this church was christened, by the name of Richard Savage, the unfortunate son of the inhuman Countess of Macclesfield, by the Earl Rivers. Of the many biographies which our literature has handed down to the present time, perhaps not one could be selected displaying a mother in such unnatural colours, or a son invested with brighter talents more perverted, than we find in Johnson's life of this unfortunate poet. Legally born to high honours and a good estate, his vicious parent, to gratify the basest passions, proclaimed her own shame and her child's dishonour; and not content with thus depriving him of those advantages which he had done nothing to forfeit, she carried hatred [illegible] child to [illegible] most fearful, unnatural, and inexplicable lengths. Hiding him in a mean and low position, she sought to shut out all knowledge of his real parents; and chance having frustrated this design, she declared him dead, to prevent a friend from bequeathing him what would have been a competence—robbing her own offspring, without even the pretended [illegible] of enriching herself! Not content with even this amount of bitter hatred and deadly injury, she—his mother—absolutely attempted to secure his condemnation and execution for a murder which occurred in a drunken brawl! But the great moralist who undertook the task of biographer of poor Savage, and placed the sad history in his "Lives of the English Poets," performed a triple duty. He vindicated the memory of his friend—he drew a fearful picture, at once a terror and a warning, to show the fearful shapes into which indulgence of illicit pleasures will warp even a mother's mind—and he wrought out his own [illegible] vocation by displaying with unanswerable force that the daily duties and proprieties of ordinary life cannot be neglected with impunity, and that the systematic neglect of them renders wit contemptible, genius incapable of good, and talent profitless to its possessor.

Another name attached to this spot is one which conjures up sad thoughts and recollections of genius, companioned with misery, neglect, insanity, and early suicide. Chatterton, "Bristol's boy poet," met his early fate in a wretched lodging in this parish, and the record of his death stands in the church register. With talents as surprising as precocious, his career was short as melancholy. The fabricator, when a mere boy, of "Rowley's Poems," he opened a fruitful field for learned disquisition, into which the chief scholars and antiquaries of the time did not hesitate to enter. Purporting to be productions of the fifteenth century, the imitation was so close, that long and learned controversies were requisite to determine their authenticity; and the fine perception, high poetic feeling, varied imagination, and great antiquarian knowledge they display, are the sure evidences of the bright destiny which might have been Chatterton's had more fortunate circumstances surrounded him. Seeking in London subsistence as an author, he soon felt the force of those bitter lessons which adversity stores up for those who, with minds capable of high literary exertion, are compelled, friendless and alone, to seek from the press their daily bread. Truly as poetically sings the more fortunate Tom Moore and so with poor Chatterton. His mind, keenly susceptible to all impressions, was not fitted to bear the rude rebuffs of trading bibliopoles; and, with philosophy too light and fragile to preserve the intellectual balance, reduced by poverty to the verge of starvation, and—unlike Savage—too proud to beg, he swallowed poison. The spot where he lies buried is now covered by the busy market, which occupies the site of the old grave yard in Shoe-lane; and the entry in the church register is the only real evidence of the death of a poet, who, had his life been longer, would doubtless have obtained one of the highest ranks in his country's literature.

> "The heart that is soonest awake to the flowers

The third of the literary trio was also unfortunate, and—a suicide—and the similarity of his fate links his memory, in connection with this church, to those whose lives we have just glanced over. Henry Neele, born in the Strand, in 1798, was in due time articled to an attorney. His taste for literature was, however, stronger than his liking for the law; and, in 1817, during his clerkship, he became an author. His chief works were the "Romance of English History," and "Lectures on English Poetry;" but he contributed largely to contemporary magazines; chiefly in the form of short poems and sketches of a romantic and fictitious character. These labours were continued till February 1828, when, in a fit of insanity, in his chambers in Inverness-terrace, he put a period to his existence. A stone against the west wall of the church-yard bears the record of his death; the same slab containing lines from his pen, referring to his father who is buried close by. The epitaph is perhaps worth preserving:

> "Good night, good night sweet spirit! thou hast cast
> Thy bonds of clay away from thee at last;
> Broke the vile earthly fetters which alone
> Held thee at distance from thy Maker's throne
> But oh! these fetters by immortal hand
> Were links of love to those thou'st left behind.
> For thee we mourn not: as th' apostle prest
> His dungeon, so thou hast gone glorified;
> Drew nigh, and when the light that round him shone,
> Beamed on the prisoner, his bands were gone.—
> So wert thou captive to disease and pain,
> Th' death, the brightest of th' angelic train.
> Pour'd heaven's own radiance, by divine decree,
> Around thy suffering soul—and it was free."

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

SURREY STAG HOUNDS

The hounds had last week two of the most splendid runs of the season. The first was on Tuesday, at Upcote Downs, when one of Sir Edward Deering's untried stags was turned out. The fog was very dense at the time, and after nearly an hour and a-half, but little better than half an hour, the pace at times being very severe, he was taken at Walton. The whole field then trotted back to Tattenham-corner, where the celebrated deer, the Pipemaker, was uncarted. While the mounted field of horsemen were laid on, and away they went at a rocking pace to Borough-heath, through Lord Harding's park to the fir-trees at Banstead, and near to the hundred-acres mill. The deer then turned to the right of the road, by the Park Downs, from thence to Copt-hill, and away over the six mile bottom to Ashtead-common, where a great part of the field were dead beat, and obliged to give in. The pack, with a few select riders, had swindon, however, merrily and flourishing, and straight taken, near South Maiden, after a run of an hour and twenty minutes. On Friday the pack met at the Half-Moon, Godstone-road, when another untried stag of Sir R. Fleming's was uncarted. He immediately went away through Burch Wood to the left of Tilling Down, and on to Masden park. The pace was very severe, and a short check was given to allow the field to come up. Away they then went to Barrow Green Oxted, and on to Limpsfield, [illegible] bob tants of the [illegible] being somewhat surprised at seeing the deer coming down [illegible] and the whose of the field close at his heels, and [illegible] nately taken in Staffhouse Wood, after a very fine run of [illegible] hour and a quarter.

There have been three meets of the royal stag-hounds during the past week.

The Kildare hunt met on Thursday week near Athy, and presented to view the largest field witnessed for several years. Among the visitors were—the Marquis of Waterford; John Power, jun., Esq., of Kilfane; John Power, Esq., of Gurteen; and almost every member of the Tullow hunt. They found near Bra-, and had a tremendous run, without a check, through a stiff country. It was altogether a fine day's sport, and was enjoyed by those who had the good fortune to keep a place with those who went a-head during the day. In the evening the Marquis of Waterford and a number of gentlemen were hospitably entertained at Cragrennan, by Horace Rochfort, Esq.

FIVE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—We have to report the arrival of a very moderate supply of English wheat fresh up to Mark-lane since our last, yet the demand for that article has ruled somewhat inactive. However, the finest parcels have sold at fully previous rates of currency, but the middling and inferior parcels have Lung on hand. In foreign wheats little has been doing, yet we can notice no alteration in figures. Malting barley has maintained its value, but grinding and distilling sorts have suffered an abatement of 1s per quarter. The malt trade has ruled dull at lower prices. Oats, beans, peas, and flour have remained about stationary.

ARRIVALS.—English: wheat, 2210; barley, 11,620; oats, 5,320; malt, 4740; quarters flour, 6520 sacks. Foreign: wheat, 2540 quarters. No arrivals from Ireland.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 46s to 55s; ditto white, 57s to 59s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 49s to 57s; do. white, 54s to 58; rye, 34s to 38s; grinding barley, 27s to 29s, malting, do., 30s to 32s; Chevalier, 32s to 34s. Suffolk and Norfolk malt, 56s to 62s; brown do., 50s to 54s; Kingston and Ware, 56s to 62s; Chevalier, 63s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 23s to 24s; potato do., 25s to 26s; Youghal and Cork, black, 17s to 18s; do. white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, new, 34s to 35s; do. old, 34s to 38s; grey peas, 36s to 38s; maple, 33s to 34s; white, 30s to 35s; boilers, 32s to 37s; per quarter. Town-made flour, 44s to 45s; Suffolk, 38s to 40s. Scotch and Yorkshire, 35s to 38s; per 280 lbs. Foreign.—Free wheat, 50s to 52s. In Bond.—Barley, 20s; oats, new, 15s to 17s; do. feed, 14s to 16s; beans, 32s to 36s; peas, 32s to 37s; per quarter. Flour, America, 22s to 24s; Baltic, 22s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—Canary seed has been sold at lower rates, but the value of most other kinds of seeds has been supported.

The following are the present rates: Linseed, English, sowing, 42s to 57s. Baltic, crushing, 42s to 45s, Mediterranean and Odessa, 45s to 46s; hempseed, 35s to 46s; per quarter; coriander, 10s to 18s per cwt.; brown mustard seed, 10s to 11s; white do., 10s to 10s 6d; tares, 5s 6d to 5s 9d per bushel; English rapeseed, new, 30l to 32l per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, 10l to 10l 10s; do. foreign, 7l to 7l 10s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, 5l 5s to 6l per ton.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 47s 3d; barley, 27s 1d; Oats, 17s 3d; rye, 29s 9d; beans, 30s 3d; peas, 32s 3d.

Imperial Averages of Six Weeks which govern Duty.—Wheat, 48s 8d; Barley, 27s 10d; Oats, 17s 7d; Rye, 30s 7d; Beans, 31s 3d; Peas, 33s 6d per quarter.

Duty on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s 6d; Barley, 9s 0d; Oats, 8s 0d; Rye, 10s 6d; Beans, 11s 6d; Peas, 9s 6d.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5½d to 6d for the 4lb loaf.

Hops.—This market is in a very dull state, and so limited are the sales that it is difficult to give accurate quotations. Public sales are declared.

Sugar.—We have had a very limited amount of business doing in sugar this week, and prices have given way 6d to 1s per cwt.

Coffee.—The coffee market is dull, yet the currencies remain about stationary.

Rice.—Some large public sales of this article have taken place, at about former rates

Cotton.—The market is very quiet, yet the late advance is maintained.

Rum.—Lower prices are taken. In 3d to 1s 3d is the value of Proof Leewards. Jamaica selling at 4s 4d to 4s 6d.

Saltpetre.—The public sales have gone off slowly, at an abatement of 1s per cwt.

Tallow.—This market is steady, at about 42s 3d on the spot, and 43s 6d for delivery in the next two months of the year.

Oils.—The value of most kinds of oils is over.

Wool.—By private contract we have a steady inquiry, but at unvaried currencies.

Hops.—For kent bags we have a free sale, at an advance of from 2s to 3s per cwt. In other kinds little is passing Potatoes.—Another large arrival of potatoes has taken place, which have moved off slowly, at late rates.

Coals.—Adairs, 15s 6d; Stewart's, 22s 3d; Lambton, 21s 9d; Holywell Main, 19s.

Smithfield.—We have had very large supplies of each kind of stock on offer here this week, yet the demand has ruled steady, at the following improved rates: Beef, from 3s 2d to 4s 8d; mutton, 3s 4d to 4s 6d; veal, 4s to 5s; and pork, 3s 8d to 4s 6d per 8lbs., to sink the offal.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—Owing to the large quantities of slaughtered meat brought forward, the general demand has ruled slow. Beef, from 3s to 3s 10d; mutton, 3s 2d to 4s; veal, 3s 8d to 4s 6d; and pork, 3s 10d to 4s 6d per 8lbs., by the carcase. ROBERT HERBERT.

COMMERCE AND MONEY

In the actual state of commerce and of manufactures it is the variation which occurred during this week. In the corn trade we have, unfortunately, to report that the [illegible] depression of the last month [illegible] the [illegible] of the harvest, and [illegible] the [illegible] for food [illegible] for [illegible] poverty. To the home-grown the average price to be obtained for wheat at the present moment is less by six or eight shillings per quarter than the same cost of six per cent. discount, and at the present value of foreign wheat, even of the best description, to effect sales a heavy loss must be submitted to. In Mincing-lane the transactions are next to none, whereas than they have been in Mark-lane during the same period. The consumption of sugar and of coffee is evidently the same, no larger now than usual have prices been more moderate prices. The change, however, of the allowance of foreign sugar at refineries is at present a very weighty [illegible] in the sugar market. In teas of all descriptions dealers are extremely cautious, for they evidently see making their calculations on a [illegible] in prices. Very few sales have [illegible] week, been effected in the course of this [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] have been [illegible] to [illegible] Canada, and [illegible] to [illegible] Australia, [illegible] to [illegible] and China, had already been sold, and orders [illegible] have been received for further quantities, as [illegible] that great activity prevailed, and several large theories, which during several [illegible] had been closed, [illegible] placed into full work, and are now working [illegible] a large consumption than at the [illegible] of the year [illegible] and numerous have been [illegible] not the case, at the [illegible] of the [illegible] equal to our future demand. The departments of trade, therefore, in a healthy position. Prices are gradually becoming [illegible] and [illegible] some [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

SCENE FROM THE "PATRICIAN'S DAUGHTER"—DRURY LANE.

Mr. Macready has produced a new tragedy, entitled the "Patrician's Daughter," from the pen of Mr. J. W. Marston, a fresh aspirant for dramatic honours, who has given sufficient evidences of the presence of genius, to lead us to look for far better things at his hands than the poetical drama in which he has made his début. The "Patrician's Daughter" is more poem than play; it wants action, incident, and imagination; and the story has certain incongruities about it, which remind us that the study of Nature is still the best and wisest for the pursuit of literary men. We say this critically, and we will state reasons for our opinion; but we by no means give general disparagement to the work; on the contrary, it has inclined us to think very highly of the natural powers of the writer. There is a vein of poetical feeling pervading the language, which is, when not overlaid with simile or forced with metaphor, eminently beautiful and true; and there is much power of thought in some of the diction, and occasionally a nervous and stirring eloquence that tells home to the heart. But a tragedy is no light task to undertake, and even genius may tread the verge of melodrama, if the high dignity of poetry be once merged into the mere externals of passion, without a grand impulse and a boundless depth. There is not sufficient motive to the incidents of much of the play of our young dramatist; and the distress and agony are too monotonous and drawn out. In acristic phraseology, the production wants light and shade.

The plot of the tragedy is told in few words—its moral is doubtful. The Patrician's Daughter is in love with a young ambitious spirit sprung from plebeian classes, who has carved out his fortunes and made his fame in the world. Her pride keeps him at a distance—her woman's affection shrines him in her heart. An aunt discovers her secret, and, with the lofty haughtiness of ancestral superstition—for to superstition the pride of birth will often amount—she determines that her family shall not be disgraced with less than noble alliance, and proceeds to thwart the lovers with tricks and stratagems of diabolical art. These have the effect of causing the aspiring and devoted hero to be repulsed and spurned by the lofty patrician and his child. His pride is in turn awakened, and he leaves his mistress and the earl her father, crushed with a sense of scorn and wrong, and goaded to seek in future eminence the means of vengeance from the world. Five years pass away, and he has mounted the ladder of renown. Fortune shines upon him and genius crowns him with her bays. He is a poet, an orator, a senator, and has earned the badge which is the outward symbol of nobility among men. His connexion with the proud family is renewed—the Patrician's Daughter is again wooed and won—there is no longer the old barrier of high birth to oppose the man who is now a star in the eyes of the million—the marriage is appointed, and at a large assemblage of guests and relations the preliminary settlements are brought in to be read. Then commences the real crisis of the play; then, before that eager, breathless, worldly party, the once spurned lover rises, with the bitterness of former degradation and the sweetness of present revenge burning together in his spirit, and, with the blended invective of passion and defiance, retorts back upon the daughter of the humbled patrician the insult of her rejection and her scorn. Loving her still, he leaves her bitterly and with a sort of triumphant misery which wins but little sympathy from those who see it work. After this the real story is at an end. The rest is gradual retribution upon all alike. The severed lovers mutually pine and rage until the Aunt, stung with remorse at seeing her poor proud niece grieving her way into the grave, divulges the crimes that she had committed to avert the disgrace of the young plebeian's alliance, and discloses the source of all the affliction she had called down. This is the point which our artist has selected for illustration. The Patrician's Daughter is then dying—the disconsolate Earl rushes with humiliation to beg her lover to save his child; and, when the truth of the past is flashed upon him, he too is torn with the agonies of repentance and regret. At this juncture the hapless young heroine comes to snatch her father from the degradation of succumbing to her lover; but, finding the latter heart-broken and penitent, instead of haughty and unrelenting, avows all her love for him, commends him to her father's affection, kisses him, blesses him, and expires in his arms.

Such is the story. There are many scenes in it effective for dialogue and personal action; but quite out of nature, and beyond the pale of life. The lover, in the third act, storms at the patrician's daughter in a burst of passion before her parent, which no father would sit still to allow. In the great revenge scene, the drawing-room declaration could never occur in any class of modern society; nor would a young lady bring any modern tragedy to a crisis, by rushing from London to Richmond in a light dress and without a bonnet, just at the moment when life had almost ceased to linger in her grief-worn frame. The venue from Middlesex to Surrey would be differently changed. There are many other minute points of discrepancy which we could easily point out, but we prefer dealing with generalities.

The real error of the tragedy is this, that its entire diction is cast in the highest order of poetry, fine swelling harmonious blank verse; and that the persons who speak are every day people, dressed in every day clothes. The language, therefore, is not natural to the circumstances; and the perpetual consciousness of this antagonism is almost painful to the ear, and quite detrimental to the entire spirit of the romance. The characters, too, want form and distinctness. The hero, when all is done, is nobody. He is thwarted by a proud mistress, and, in the moment of triumph, stoops to the littleness of revenge: he finds he has wronged her, and he sinks into the hopelessness of despair. He has neither the generosity nor the manhood which his declamations have implied. The "Patrician's Daughter" is no Shaksperian creation—she is made up of passion, pride, and grief; and displays no more of the fine web-work of woman's nature. The Old Earl is too gentle for his pride and too placid for his sorrows; and the Aunt seems to have no sufficient motive for the enormity of the crime which she commits.

The beauties of the tragedy are many. The language abounds in pure poetry, and has some well-timed and graceful similes. The versification is sonorous and good; and if the dialogue were only more compressed and less spun into tissue, it would be some of the best in our modern dramatic literature. We have pointed out his faults freely, but, we repeat, that we have formed a high opinion of the author.

Mr. Macready played the part of the lover with great force and spirit, only wanting a dash of the modulation of a youthful voice with the fire and animation of his more vigorous bursts of passion or of grief. Miss Faucit, as the Patrician's Daughter, was unequal, but in some episodes sweetly and beautifully effective. Mrs. Warner's acting did not please us, except in the passage of remorse, which was given with the genuine and abandoned agony of crime-born grief. Phelps was correct, quiet, and impressive as the Old Patrician.

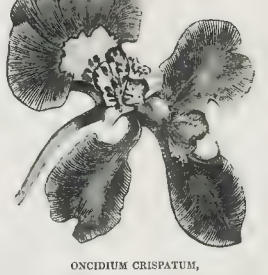
The tragedy was entirely successful; and the author, who made his bow from the stage, was cheered by the approbation of a crowded house. Miss Helen Faucit was called for; and Mr. Macready announced the play for repetition four times a week until further notice.

THE FASHIONS.

PARIS, RUE CHAUSSEE D'ANTIN, 13th December, 1842.

Mon cher Monsieur,—Since my last letter there has been no material change in our fashions, with the exception that the paletot is beginning to supersede the camails and bournous, which have hitherto borne the sway in our best circles. My own opinion is, that before the winter has passed away, we shall see no other covering than the paletot, which is really a very pretty thing when well cut, and in such a manner as to be worn over every description of toilette, without detracting from the apparent height of the wearer, or rendering her figure thick or dumpy. We have seen it in satin, velvet, or Cashmere, with the ends rounded or squared at bottom in front, and trimmed and lined with fur, and the effect was very successful. Lace still remains as much in favour as ever, more particularly the berthes and lace mantles, in the style of Louis XIV., to be worn with robes of velvet. Poiots d'Angleterre to be put upon rose satin or blue with white spots, or Alençon for trimming robes or wedding robes, entirely made of Brussels application, are still the height of fashion. I should remark, that the corset of white satin is becoming an indispensable article among such of our belles as wish to be considered as quite comme il faut; they certainly give to the bust an elasticity which agrees well with the present fashion of long waists slightly bent forward. Some of our artistes have found out the method of prolonging the waist to such a point, that it is said that an ancient English peer, who would appear, however, to be somewhat unacquainted with our fashions, upon seeing his daughter issue from the boudoir of a Madame J——, was so astonished at the prolongation of her figure as to imagine that some means or other had been adopted for elongating or stretching her muscles. I do not know that I can indicate to you any particular change, either in the texture or fashions of the articles mentioned in my last letter. I should, however, not forget to mention the gloves and trimmings now worn, and some of which are just being sent into Germany to a crowned head. These have a trimming of black lace lined with rose-colour, and relieved with rose-buds; others are trimmed with lace, with ribbons, and embroidered with bunches of fruit; others, again, are finished in white jais, with tassels of silver and falling tassels; or with garniture à la prêtesse, or garniture à la vielle, composed of blonde and ribbons. The Armenian turbans are still much in vogue. They are made of velvet of various shades, embroidered with gold, and adorned with magnificent tassels of the same, which are made to fall a little behind the neck. Nothing however, exceeds the elegance of the coiffure marquise, which is one of those things which combine the extreme of elegance and simplicity. Figure to yourself a capote of rose satin, lined with blue of rose-coloured gauze, of which the various prominences are formed of branches of fruit of acacia in rose velvet, and you will imagine one of the most charming negliges elegants in the world. I do not know that I can finish my letter to you better than by saying, that for fashionable flowers roses are still the predominating mode. We see them placed as garlands upon lace robes, or thrown as it were by chance among the hair, where they have an effect incomparably beautiful. HENRIETTA DE B.

FLORICULTURE.



ONCIDIUM CRISPATUM,

Another of those rare varieties of the Orchis family furnished by the teeming forests of Brazil. The prevailing colour of the present specimen is a beautiful light brown, relieved with yellow; it is represented about thrice the size of nature. The plant in our last, we need scarcely say, was not figured from the Orchis properly so called; it was intended to represent an Orchideen epiphyte, one of the Oncidia—the proper name, Oncidium excavatum, having been omitted by mistake. For these, as well as for many other varieties of these rare and beautiful plants, we are indebted to the virgin forests of South America. In a catalogue of 147 rare Orchidaceous Epiphytes, compiled by Mr. Bateman, the following curious statistical facts are furnished relative to the habitats of these plants and their importers:—Of the entire number, 99 came from the new world, and only 48 from the old! Of the orientals, China and the East India islands contributed 13; Central India and Ceylon, 31; and Africa and Madagascar, 5. Of the occidentals, Brazil sent us 23; Central America (including Panama, Honduras, Guatemala, and Mexico), 44; the West India isles, 15; Guiana (including Surinam and Demerara), 14; and Peru, 3. To many to the collections in which the species respectively appeared, Messrs. Loddiges will be found to have furnished by far the greatest number, viz., 31; from my own collection came 17; from Mr. Barker's, 10; from the Duke of Devonshire's, 7; from Mr. Harrison's, 7; from the Horticultural Society's, 5; from Glasgow Botanic Garden, 3; from Mr. Joseph Knight's, 3; from Lord Fitzwilliam's, 2; from Mr. Brocklehurst's, 2; from Messrs. Rollisson's, 2; from the Duke of Northumberland's, 1; from the Duke of Bedford's, 1; from Lady Amherst's, 1; from Sir C. Lemon's, 1; from Mr. Llewellyn's, 1; from Mr. Rucker's, 1; from Mr. Allcard's, 1; from Mr. Miers's, 1; from Mr. Taylenre's, 1; from Messrs. Young's, 1; from Mr. Low's, 1; from Messrs. Colville's, 1; and from the Royal Botanic Garden, Kew, 1. It may be well to observe that the preceding account refers only to the period subsequent to 1831.

No. 33] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1842. [SIXPENCE.

CHRISTMAS.

Health, happiness, and warm greeting to all our readers! We cannot allow this life-stirring season to overtake us without a cordial and happy welcome to its festive spirit, a word of brotherhood and fellowship to all around, a claim upon the young friendship of society, and a genial thankfulness of heart for our own thriving prosperity, now crowned by old Christmas with holly for the first time. This first winter of ours comes upon us with a propitious face of smiles and sunshine. We may well hope to weather all the storm it brings us, since it is only one of congratulation and renown. It may seem egotism to assert that, within a few short months of existence, the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS has become FAME, but it is truth also; and now that we are almost closing the year which gave it birth, we rush happily and enthusiastically into the greetings of the season, return gladly the smiles and compliments of our friends, and confess the pride with which their approval and confidence have elevated us,—and the bounding, stimulating activity of heart, that stirs our young blood into fresh exertion and enterprize on our darling public's behalf. And we even fancy that these fervent impulses are the life-springs of an old English feeling which never yet dishonoured human nature, but rather increased the goodness, while it declared the brightness of the heart! Joyously and exultingly, then, do we shake hands with the Christmas of 1842!

And, first, it is a source of unmixed pleasure for us to know that the ancient guest of winter has arrived amongst us without one spark of bitterness, or any other than a cheerful brow. The weather has all the serene mildness of that wise and merciful Beneficence by which it is dispensed from on high. The poor are not perishing by our highways nor shivering in our streets; and misery, in the gentle clemency of the season, has at least one relief from God. We are heartily rejoiced at this in the present condition of the country: not that we ever, as a question of climate, dreaded or disregarded a frost. It has a fine hoar comely beauty about it, putting the silver of age upon the year. It is crisp, healthful, seasonable—symbolical of genuine bracing, vigorous winter. It reddens the cheek, sparkles the eye, refreshes the constitution, makes the morning sun seem brighter, and the evening fire glow forth more comfort from the hearth! But when food and clothes are scant—when the human frame is crouched into a corner of poverty's cheerless dwelling—then the biting weather and the bitter season are pinching and terrible indeed. All hearts then should be glad that we have this mild weather for our poor, and that Christmas, as yet, threatens no extra wretchedness to pall the enjoyments of festivity or cloud the natural gaiety of the time. The prices of coals, food, and raiment diminish, and the sadness of pauperism is comforted by every frugal penny saved. One regret, nevertheless, still stares us in the face, in the existence of the union workhouses, the bastiles of England, the prisons rather than the shelter of the destitution of the land! The duty of charity, however, should, therefore, impress itself more forcibly upon those who have to spare. We must not conceal from ourselves, merely because the weather of the moment is mild and fair, that there is a terrible amount of want and affliction around us. The people are poor in multitudes, and it is only an alleviation, and reason for praise to Heaven, that the starvation of cold is not added to that of hunger. And, when to the knowledge of a certain amount of wretchedness we add the conviction that the profligate and cruel Poor-law of the country is quite inadequate to supply the place of charity by legislation, then the duties of benevolence and the active spirit of human brotherhood are called the more imperatively into play, and the individual citizens of society should seek by those personal virtues to atone for the wickedness of national severity and injustice. We earnestly hope that the clergy will enjoin this principle to the rich and well-doing of their congregations, so that the light of their own festive happiness may carry a smiling reflection back into the cottage, and bless, without spilling one drop of the poison of envy into their bosoms, the grateful spirits of the poor. And, by the way, we may here significantly ask of the bounty which the Queen appealed to the Church to raise for the starving—how has that been expended, and is there any to distribute now?

Having made the poor our first consideration, let us return to our starting-point of season-greeting, and give joy to the great community at large. The aspect of affairs is one to like, and social and political circles may alike, and, independent of party, feel gratified with the way in which our year is drawing to a close. Christmas has come—in a very large sense—hand in hand with Plenty and with Peace. The year has been a great year for agriculture; we have had fine flowing crops, and provisions have been cheapening upon us just at the period when they generally press hardest upon the people. Then the opening of our commerce with China, and the closing of another war, are,—no matter at whose gate lies the credit,—advantages that herald in our Christmas with sounding voices of pride and hope. We could now quite afford to be hospitable to the Celestial Emperor's emissary, and almost to pity Ahkbar Khan. As for his Chinese excellency, it is sad that he is not here, for our good jovial Christmas will hardly be happy without him. How soon he would entwine his crown and plait his tails with holly and the red berry of the west! How he would pour elder, and spiced ale, and flip and ginger to, he "hot i' the mouth," down his ambassadorial throat! How he would make plum-pudding the joss of his momentary veneration, and convince him of the improvement that is rendered unto mustard by beef! Yes, the representative of the brother of the sun and moon would be a great gun indeed in the old English arms of jolly Christmas.

In the meanwhile we wish our readers as much merriment as they may achieve without him, and we may perhaps venture to add a little to the general store of fun. We have made gallant provision for the pantomimes, prepared a rich galaxy of twelfth-night stars, and will promise as many plums in our pudding as dare any confectioner in the land.

And so be glad of heart, reader! and enjoy your feast, and God bless you. Bless your fresh season with gay, cordial, honest sociality—your country with prosperity—your poorer brethren with relief-ful content—bless your trade—your relaxation of holiday—your family—your affections, and your home. Bless your board with true friendship, your heart with true religion, your life with true happiness, and your young, laughing, chuckling, buoyant children with the beauty, lustre, and loveliness of sweet, unsullied health.

And now, if you are a good man, turn over our picture store of season tributes and sing our merry ballad of old Christmas over a stirring wassail bowl of your own.

THE WESTMINSTER PLAYS.

At the request of the ambitious young scholars of the classic and venerable foundation at Westminster, as well as of many respected correspondents among their friends and connections, we have been induced to prepare an engraved episode of one of their representations of the Latin drama. These exhibitions, which afford a sort of classic holiday to the high-spirited youths of the school, and gather into their arena a host of interested spectators, among whom are often ranked many of the noble, the learned, and the distinguished in the land, yearly attract more of the attention of the public, and excite fresh emulation and enterprise in the minds of the scholars themselves. The representations too are much improved, and the appointments have progressed from their old discrepancies to something like dignity, elegance, and simplicity. As the engraving describes, they have now a neat stage, proscenium, scenery, with classical appliances, and due propriety of costume. The play selected for the recent performances, which terminated on Monday, was the "Adelphi" of Terence, and the spirit, grace, and correctness, with which the alumni acquitted themselves in the parts allotted to them afforded general satisfaction and delight. We much doubt whether the comedies of Terence were ever spoken by the ancient Romans after the manner in which we are accustomed to revive them before the scholars of our own day, but once admitting the principle upon which they are now recited, we cannot conceive the recitation itself to be much more efficiently given than by the youths of the Westminster School. The episode of the "Adelphi" represented in our engraving is the scene between Micio, Demea, and Æschinus towards the termination of the fifth act.

The prologue and epilogue—usually we believe the compositions of the head-masters, were given with effect, but were not this year so racy as we have sometimes found them. They possess, however, both feeling and humour; and the regret, in the former of these exercises, at the absence of the "amissum patrem," who now lies within the adjacent cloisters, is simply and touchingly expressed Our recent victories in the east also are not less happily glanced at. In the epilogue, Dotheboy's Hall is touched off somewhat humorously, and some of the recent political measures are treated jocularly enough. The concluding appeal in favour of the ancient foundation which was the scene of the performance is clothed in elegant Latin, and was, as it could scarcely fail to be, received with the warmest enthusiasm on the part of an audience in which we remarked many persons eminent for their scholastic attainments and of high literary reputation. In conclusion, we can only repeat the extreme gratification these representations have afforded us, and allow the prologue (for the epilogue we have no room) to plead its cause with the public in propriis personis.

PROLOGUS 1842

Intermissa diu quum Saturnia rura
Festaque in antiquâ sint recolenda Domo;
Quid fecunt pueri, quos luctu affixa recenti
Scena chorum arcessum clamat abesse Patrem?
Dignum etenim effiemus cui nostra aulea premantur
Nunc iterum, et tacitus procubet umbra foris.
Ipse tamen, Roma Æmilium quum fleret, "Adelphos," Quas habuit tumulo prætulit Afer opes;
Nec puduit Natum feralem tibia cantus
Quam daret, adsuetis dedolusse jocis.
Una etiam assidue scripsit, nec dulcis Alumni
Dedecuit magnos scripta fovere Duces.
Tu quoque, care senex, tu, dum bibi vita manebat,
Tu, comes, ingenii tu quoque fautor eras!
"Virtus scipsiades et mitis sapientia Lælî"
Com cant in titulos nomen utrumque tuos.
Sic licet a nobis labor est, en gloria, Summis
Qui placeant populo posse placere Viris.
Quot sumus experti nuper discrimina rerum!
Futera que secum, quas tulit annus opes!
Bis mœsta facta parens, bis telo obnoxia Mater,
Ne careat probro secula nulla suo.
Jam Lovis Arsacii Facorus se jactat in Aulâ,
Strataque Barbarico protrerit ossa solo;
Jam furit, et fortibus vexilla affixa superbis
Tradidit Anglico derpenda duci.
Nunc inga detrectant animosa in littore Seres,
Adres victrecm nunc capit unda ratem.
Fr nera sunt ducenda tamen, Naturaque receptum
Cunposunt Lleude Mater Etona sinu.
Vivitur, ah! tanquam in scenâ, ad partesque vocandi
Quisque suas, ebru i fabula quanta sumus!
Stare loco nescit vita, et motoria semper
Cor-ulat, humanâ non retinenda manu.
Qui canat Æmilium cycneâ voce sepulcrum,
Exsequias vates præcinit ipse suas.
Vivite felices vestrum, spectate faventes
Plaudere quæ jubeant vota, valete jubent.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—The Paris papers of Saturday were chiefly occupied with dissertations on the subjoined official notification of the occupation of the archipelago of the Marquisas, in the Pacific: which we extract from the Moniteur Universel:—"On the 1st of May, 1842, rear-admiral Dupetit Thouars, commanding the naval station in the Pacific Ocean, took possession in the King's name of the archipelago of the Marquises. Rear-admiral Dupetit-Thouars gives an account of this seizure (prve de possession) in the following report, addressed to Admiral Duperre, Minister of Marine and of Colonies:—

"Bay of Taiohae, June 25, 1842.—Monsieur l'Amiral,—I have the honour to inform your excellency, that the taking possession, in the name of the King and of France, of two groups forming the archipelago of the Marquisas, was this day happily effected. The recognition of his Majesty Louis Philippe, first, has been obtained by means of conciliation and persuasion, in conformity with your orders, and has been confirmed by authentic acts drawn up for the triple expedition. I add to these official documents the circumstantial report of the cruise of the frigate la Reine Blanche, from her sailing from Vaparaiso, and that of all the events which took place for the acknowledgment of the King's sovereignty, and for the taking possession of the archipelago of the Marquisas -Accept, &c. A DUPETIT THOUARS."

A detailed report of this event has since appeared in the French journals, by which it appears that the rear-admiral who commanded the expedition occupied the island of Tahuata in the name of France, at the request of the native King or chief, in order to protect him from the consequences of an act of aggression against the Americans. What will the United States say to this excuse for the seizure? Taiohae was taken possession of on the 31st of May, when, in return for the bricoloured flag and other presents bestowed on the King thereof, his Polynesian Majesty made the Admiral a present of—pigs! "We have given the King," adds the Admiral, who is evidently a wag, "a red uniform, a pair of Colonel's epaulettes, a shirt, and a pair of trowsers. He wears them with ease, and appears much gratified." The Admiral urges the necessity of keeping up a naval station at these islands, for disputes had, in fact, broken out with the new subjects. The Admiral lays great stress, however, on the approach to civilization of King Temoan, who already condescended to wear shoes, and the Queen, who saw one of the sailors pass dressed up as a woman, in a tramatic performance, has asked for a similar dress: so the prospect was not quite so naked as might be imagined from this conquest. Nothing is stated in the official report of the intention of making the Marquesas a penal colony.

The following article in the correspondence of the Augsburgh Gazette refers to the above occupation:—"Fresh difficulties threaten to break out between our Government and the Cabinet of St. James. You have read in the journals that a French squadron had taken possession of the Marquisas Islands in the Pacific Ocean. A cabinet courier from London has brought to M. Guizot explanations as to the object of this occupation. The reply, it is stated, was, that the French Government was still without official reports, and that before it could speak it must wait for them; but, although the news had been received from a private source, the Cabinet did not doubt its accuracy. It is affirmed that M. Guizot wished to prepare an agreeable surprise for the Chamber. It is also added that these islands are to serve as a place for transportation."

Reports of a Molé Ministry very current. Marshall Valée, in this proposed combination, is to be Minister of War, and M. de Salvandy, Minister of the Interior. Confidence, however, still reigns in the ministerial circles that M. Guizot's bold challenge for a vote of confidence in the debates on the royal speech will be attended with a triumph to the Ministry. Many amendments have been held as to whether his Majesty should open the Chambers in person, with a speech from the throne. The question has been decided in the affirmative, and the discourse will explinitly lay down, it is reported, all the foreign and domestic policy of the Cabinet, so as to afford the Opposition the opportunity of proposing amendments. M. Guizot will die nobly in the breach, if he is to die at present, which is doubtful, for his ministerial chances are regarded in diplomatic circles with unabated confidence. M. Thiers changes his mind, as usual, every twenty-four hours. Now he talks of aiding Count Molé to upset the Cabinet, and of giving his future support to the former. It seems pretty certain that M. Odilon Barrot will not coalesce for the future with M. Thiers, whose fraction of the Left Centre must incline to the Right, or Conservative side. M. Thiers admits openly that he has no chance of arriving at power at present.

In the Paris papers of Sunday, Spanish affairs continued to be the leading topic of discussion, England being the staple commodity of abuse, and her "agent," as Espartero is called, coming in for no small share of vituperation from even the Liberal organs, of whom he was once the idol. The greatest inconsistency will be found to exist in the Parisian press, in their mode of treating the events at Barcelona. The journalists argue the affair of the insurrection and subsequent bombardment, in total forgetfulness of the part played by France in her two revolutions, and of her subsequent line of conduct for the effectual maintenance of order in the interior.

It is announced that the Duke Decazes, Grand Referendary of the Chamber of Peers, will bring an action against M. Cretineau Joly, for announcing the publication of eighty-three letters, alleged to have been addressed by the duke to an agent in Grenoble, to provoke the conspiracy of 1816.

A cabinet council was held on Saturday at Marshal Soult's hotel. The Duke of Nemours visited Count Molé and Marshal Valée; and on the same day Count Montalivet had a long audience of the King of the French, and M. Guizot had conferences with several political personages.

The French papers of Tuesday confirm the announcement of M. Casimer Perier's nomination as minister pleniputentiary to Hanover, in place of M. Martin, who has retired from public service.

The King and the Dukes of Nemours and Montpensier visited Vincennes on Monday, where his majesty mounted on horseback and reviewed the troops of the garrison, after which he inspected the works af the fort; from thence he went to Saint-Maur and the fort of Charenton, after which the royal party got into their carriages and returned to the Tuileries. The king, in addition to the royal dukes, was accompanied by Marshal Soult, Generals Dode, T. Sebastiani, Rumigny, and Vallaint, his aides-de-camp, Colonels Estisse, De Chabanne, and Dumas, and his orderly officers. His majesty was repeatedly greeted by cries of "Vive le roi!"

A letter from St. Denis (Isle of Bourbon), July 20, states, says the Constitutionnel, that two French corvettes had arrived there on their way to Madagascar, where they were going to join five other Government vessels, that had taken possession of the island of Nosse-Bé. It was said that an expedition against Madagascar was seriously spoken of. At present we have only succeeded in occupying some points on the sea-shore, and for a length of time we have been cooped up in the island of Sainte-Marie, which is moist and unwholesome. The Ovas, seconded by the English, who have neglected nothing to render abortive our attempts at colonisation, could not resist a vigorous and well-combined effort. The resources and advantages of all kinds which the island of Madagascar presents are immense. Its situation is excellent, and the soil fertile. It contains spacious and excellent harbours, where our navy would find a sure and easy shelter, whereas at Bourbon the harbours are half the year untenable.

The Moniteur Parisien contains a positive contradiction to one of the rumours that caused the decline in the funds, namely, that the Regent of Spain had demanded the recal of M. de Lesseps, the French Consul at Barcelona. From the tenor of the latest despatches from Madrid there is every reason to believe that the Spanish Government will not persevere in the accusations it so hastily published against M. de Lesseps. It is one thing to accuse, and another to prove. Senor Guttieres, the political agent at Barcelona, to say the least, has been highly imprudent, and he will probably be dismissed by the Regent when his Highness learns that Senor Guttierez has been unable to substantiate his hasty allegations against M. de Lesseps of fomenting the insurrection. On the other hand, it has been officially notified, that, whatever lengths journalism may go to in Spain, that the French Government will not tolerate any imputations on it from the head of the Spanish Executive, or from his official organs. M. Guizot has signified this fact to Senor Hernandez, the Spanish Chargé d'Affaires. Great excitement exists in Paris, and the war party seems to be in exhales at some alleged rupture between England and France. On Tuesday there was a remarkable Bourse. The Threes opened at 78f. 80c., and then fell rapidly to 78f. Rothschild's party then entered the lists to stop the panic, and by large purchases the Threes rallied to 78f. 40c., at which they closed, 45c. lower than Monday. The Fives opened at 119f. 25c., fell as low as 118f. 45c., and rallied to 118f. 80c., the last quotation. In the Coulisses the Threes are now at 78f. 45c.

There were warlike rumours of all kinds, but the most accredited reason given for the fall was that a Ministerial crisis will shortly take place.

By late advices from Barcelona we learn that Van Halen has ordered the contribution of £120,000 levied on Barcelona to be paid within three days.

M. Lesseps, the French consul, having had cognizance of the charges against him inserted in the Madrid Gazette, on the authority of Senor Guttierez, the political chief of Barcelona, had addressed a strong protest to the Captain-General, denying in toto the allegations of Senor Guttierez, and demanding satisfaction for the insult, by the dismissal of that functionary. If the political chief cannot substantiate his assertions, there can be no question that a signal reparation will be due to France.

SPAIN.—The Moniteur of Saturday publishes the following telegraphic despatch:—"Perpignan, Dec. 15.—Thirteen soldiers of the Corps Francos were shot on the esplanade at Barcelona on the 12th. No Spaniard was allowed to leave the town."

The Moniteur has also the annexed announcement:—"By ordonnance, dated the 16th, M. Ferdinand de Lesseps, French consul at Barcelona, has been promoted to the rank of officer in the royal order of the Legion of Honour."

Our private letters from Paris of Saturday afternoon state that the relations between the French and Spanish Governments had assumed a very threatening attitude, owing to the accusations of Senor Guttierez, the political chief of Barcelona, against M. Lesseps. "I have every reason to believe," adds our informant, "that a communication was made the day before yesterday, at the Foreign-office, to Senor Hernandez, the Spanish chargé d'affaires in Paris, that if the charges against the French consul were persisted in, and the language of the Spanish official journals respecting France were not changed, his passports would be delivered to him."

The following article in the Debats had created some sensation in Paris:—"The English press has not discovered any other means of justifying the pitiless neutrality of her Britannic Majesty's representative than in calumniating the conduct of the representative of France. A print, which has made itself the ready organ of the party rancour of the ex-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and which, besides, appears to be inspired on the present occasion from sources existing nearer to ourselves (the Chronicle), contains a most violent accusation against our consul at Barcelona. As we are as anxious as any person that the truth should come to light—as we are convinced that it is not the French Government that can lose in having the causes, whatever they may be, of the insurrection of Barcelona brought clearly to view—we shall give the article of the Chronicle, without even cutting away certain expressions which affect only those who have employed them. The English journal states gratuitous facts, but we do not think ourselves obliged to place faith in its assertions; and in considering from what source it has drawn its pretended information, we are exceedingly disposed to believe the contrary of what it affirms. A light will be thrown over these matters; but the ominous recriminations which the Spanish authorities already allow themselves cannot remain without reply. Explanations must be given, and it must be fairly known on which side have been intrigue, ingratitude, and on which a too-enduring patience—the patience of a neighbouring Government, having peculiar claims upon them. We are convinced that the falsehood of the facts asserted and commented on by the Chronicle will be easily demonstrated."

Our dates from Madrid are to the eve of the 11th. The official organ the Patriota formally contradicts the assertions of the Christina journals, that the English ships of war had assisted in the bombardment of Barcelona. "This news," it says, "is entirely false."

The Madrid Gazette publishes the following report from the political chief of Barcelona to the Minister of the Interior:—"After the favourable reaction, the result of which was the dissolution of the revolutionary junta, and the embarkation of its members, and after the rabble called the patules had been disarmed, there followed another reaction from the conduct of the French consul, who landed the revolutionary junta, and all the men who had promoted the rebellion. The revolutionists assembled anew in the course of yesterday, many of the National Guards quitted the town, leaving it at the mercy of banditti. These commenced by raising the standard of Christina, and ended by plundering the streets called Ancha and Las Pisteras. Finding the city in this deplorable condition, given up to Vandalism, fomented by the Moderados and the French consul, orders were given to open the bombardment," &c.

Two battalions of the National Guards of Seville, on the night of the 5th, got up an emeute to demand the withdrawal of the garrison, but the authorities proclaimed martial law, and the next day order was quite restored.

The Madrid mail of the 13th, and letters to the eve of the 14th, have arrived.

The Ministerial Patriota has the annexed article:—"A journal has announced, and others have copied, the statement that a cotton treaty was signed last week. This news is false. The Government, before taking any resolution on this question will consult the necessities of the nation. It has also been stated that ten British ships of the line stationed at Malta had received orders to sail to Barcelona, probably for its bombardment. This news is ridiculous. The ships of whatever nation that may have received orders to sail to Barcelona are there only for the protection of the subjects of the respective flags, and it only appertains to our Government to inquire into and appreciate the causes of foreign forces in one of our ports."

The Madrid Official Gazette comments on the importance of the address of congratulation to Espartero from the Saragossa Militia, after the surrender of Barcelona, as evincing the sense of the country in the approval of the Regent's conduct. "The address," adds the Gazette, "which emanates from pure and conservative liberalism, will find an echo throughout Spain, and is an answer to the outcries of the Opposition press, and their assertions as to the anarchy and grief which the bombardment, as they falsely assert, had caused."

The Fives on the Madrid Exchange on the 14th were done at 25 15-16 cash: 26¼ sixty days; and the Threes 22 sixty days. Exchange on London, ninety days, 37¾.

The Messager of Tuesday night has the annexed telegraphic despatch:—"Barcelona, Dec. 15.—Two thousand men, one half of whom are soldiers, are working at the reconstruction of the citadel. A war contribution of three millions of francs (£120,000) has been imposed on Barcelona, and must be paid within three days. The city will be bound to furnish its contingent for the recruitment for the years of 1840, 1841, and 1842. Espartero is still at Sarria. The thirteen soldiers shot on the esplanade of the citadel were drawn by lot from those who were arrested after the entrance of the Captain-General."

An important communication was received in town, on Wednesday evening, from Constantinople, announcing a serious misunderstanding between the court of St. Petersburg and the Sublime Porte, on the Servian question. The Emperor of Russia, in an autograph letter to the Sultan, had formally demanded the revocation of the decree in favour of the present ruler in Servia, and the re-establishment of the banished Prince Michael, in whose family, Russia contends, the sovereigty of Servia is invested for ever, by virtue of a firman of the late Sultan Mahmoud. The Porte, in its reply, has declared that no treaties had been infracted, and that the privileges of the Servians had been properly regarded in the course pursued by the Porte, which positively declined to revoke the hatti-sherif. The Russian Envoy, on the receipt of this note, replied that he regretted to have to announce to the Emperor the Porte's unfavourable answer, and that he still hoped it would be modified. To this it has been rejoined by the Ottoman minister that the Sultan was immutable. It was not believed in Constantinople that an appeal to arms would follow this state of affairs, as Russia hoped to obtain the support of the European powers in arbitrating between her and the Porte.

THE WEST INDIA MAILS.—The Royal Mail steamer Tweed, Franklin Crozier, Commander, arrived at Falmouth on Tuesday morning, with the West India and Mexican mails. Her dates of departure are as follows:—Jamaica, 18th of November, Cuba, 19th ditto. St. Thomas, 24 ditto, and Bermuda; 30 ditto. She experienced very boisterous weather on her passage, and in consequence of a heavy gale of wind was obliged to put into Halifax, Nova Scotia, for coals, and left the following vessels at St. Thomas's:—Royal Mail steamers Tay (with mails from England of the 3rd of November), Thames, Dee, and Trent; the Lilley schooner; her Majesty's ship Scylla, Captain Sharp, and the Montezuma war-steamer, destined for Mexican service. Her Majesty's ship Charybdis sailed from Port Royal, for England, on the 17th of November, with the crew of the Spitfire steamer (which had been wrecked), and a considerable freight of specie. Her Majesty's ships Imaum and Magnificent were at Port Royal. Her Majesty's ship Illustrious, Admiral Sir Charles Adam, from Halifax, in tow of the Carron steamer, was obliged to slip the warps, in consequence of strong head winds in the narrows off Lathbee's Point. The Tweed passing at the time, her services were put into requisition, and she took the ship in tow and brought her to Bermuda in safety. The following are the names of the passengers per Tweed:—Mrs. Davis, Mr. Nunez; Mr. Gladson, Mr. Dempster; Lieutenant Hannant, Mr. Gordon, Captain Cox, Mr. Page, Mr. Fullerton, Mr. Huggins, and Mr. Couldry.

COUNTRY NEWS.

APPREHENSION OF A GANG OF COINERS IN BRIGHTON.—Charles Dench, George Tugwell, Mary Moore, and Ellen Wynn, were brought before Major Allen and Sir G. Westphal, the sitting Magistrates at the Town-hall, charged with coining. From the evidence of Mr. Solomon, the chief officer, and Mr. Superintendent White, it appeared that they proceeded to the residence of the prisoners in Thomas-street, Brighton; Mr. White proceeded up stairs and broke the door open. Before doing so heard some person say, "Who is this coming up stairs?" The prisoners were in great confusion, and Tugwell was at the window. On the table was a quantity of wet sand used in burnishing, a small file, a spoon, some plaster of Paris, and metal, the whole of which were produced. Several witnesses were examined, who proved picking up eight counterfeit half-crowns and one shilling, which were thrown out of the window at the time the door was forced open. The female prisoners were also identified by several tradesmen as having passed bad money on them. During the examination the prisoners conducted themselves in the most outrageous manner, setting the magistrates at defiance, and declaring they would be the death of some of the witnesses. Dench and Tugwell are old offenders, and have only been out of gaol about ten days. Dench was tried at the last sessions for passing bad coin and acquitted, and Tugwell, who has been previously convicted, was admitted as Queen's evidence in a case of robbery in which his companions were sentenced to transportation. They were fully committed to take their trial.

LEICESTERSHIRE.—AFFRAY WITH POACHERS.—Between one and two o'clock on Sunday morning last, the 18th instant, a desperate gang of six or seven poachers, all armed with guns, attacked the preserve of Michael Gough, Esq., of North Kilworth House, Leicestershire. Mr. Gough having been called up by one of his keepers-out, shortly before one o'clock, and apprised of what was about to take place, immediately sallied forth with his servants and his youngest son in pursuit of the poachers, Mr. and Mr. Arthur Gough taking the upper, and the servants the lower end of a long plantation, where they had not long been stationed before the poachers approached in a regular line, entered the covert, and at the first shot brought down a brace of pheasants. The watchers immediately sprung up, rushed upon the poachers, one of whom, after a violent struggle, they succeeded in capturing, by disabling him in attempting to discharge his gun at them. Upon hearing the report of the guns, the shouts, and the scuffling, Mr. and Mr. A. Gough hastened to the assistance of the servants, but in their way came in contact with another of the poachers whom they instantly seized, but the man was so powerful and resolute, that they had the utmost difficulty in retaining him; he drew a double-barrelled gun from his pocket which, fortunately was in two parts; it was loaded, and had caps on; upon which Mr. Gough declared that the moment he attempted to use the gun he would plunge his sword (with which he was armed) through his body, and although the man swore that he would neither be taken nor part with his gun, except with the loss of his life, they ultimately succeeded in dragging him to the house, where he and his companion were kept in custody during the night, and on Monday morning were committed by J. A. Arnold, Esq., and the Rev. Thos. Belgrave, to Leicester gaol, for trial. The rest of the gang, it is expected, will be shortly apprehended.

LIVERPOOL.—COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.—A case came before the Liverpool Court of Bankruptcy last week involving some of the most peculiar circumstances that have ever been presented to the public, and which Mr. Commissioner Phillips, before whom the proceedings were instituted, described as one of the most extraordinary, as well as difficult, instances that ever came before that or any other court. The bankrupt, in this instance, is a person of the name of Hall, formerly a grocer, at Warrington, and a man reputed to have been well educated, and to have strong religious tendencies. It appears that, in the month of September, 1841, the bankrupt absconded from Warrington, and was subsequently discovered to have sailed for America, leaving his affairs perfectly unprotected, but without any effects available to his creditors, either from a secret disposition of them prior to leaving, or by some fraudulent negotiations with other parties, for the purpose of keeping the proceeds from his creditors. The bankrupt's father-in-law took possession of the books, and has retained them up to the present inquiry, and they are stated by the bankrupt himself to be so mutilated as to be of little or no service in making out his balance-sheet, or presenting even an ordinary statement of his assets and obligations. On the bankrupt's arrival in America, he solicited and obtained an appointment as clerk in a grocery store, where he evinced creditable talents, and both activity and vigilance for the period of a twelvemonth, as described by his master in his advertisement of the robbery in the different American journals. On the 19th of June, in the following year, he absconded from the house of his master at Brooklyn, in the state of New York, taking with him 4930 dollars, the money of his employer, in Texian treasury notes and specie of different denominations. It was supposed he had taken the route to Baltimore, and an active pursuit was commenced in that direction, but although every means was consulted that the best authorities and the most practised assistants could devise, the search proved fruitless, all trace of him being extinguished for a month or more. Shortly afterwards, the bankrupt appears to have had some connexion with a Mr. Thomas Montfort, in South Boston, from whom he also absconded, taking with him 1200 dollars current money of the state. Mr. Montfort immediately advertised the prisoner, offering a reward of 300 dollars for his apprehension, but without effect. The bankrupt contrived to elude the vigilance of the police in the United States, and nothing more was heard from him until information was received that he had been seen at his old haunts at Warrington, England. His accusers lost no time in memorialising the United States' Consulate of the felony, who, with the assistance of an intelligent police officer (Jones), took the prisoner into custody, seizing at the same time a large amount of notes of the Texian Bank, before any messenger from the Court of Bankruptcy was apprised of his return. The bankrupt was brought up before the magistrates at Warrington, to answer the charge of the felony preferred against him from his American prosecutors by attorney, but the case was so beset with difficulties, in consequence of the mercantile relations between the two countries, as to the question of arrest, that recourse was had by Colonel Aspinwal, the United States' Consulate, and also by Mr. Nicholson, clerk to the magistrates at Warrington, to Sir J. Graham for advice in prosecuting the examination, which proved ultimately an affair of so much difficulty as to cause a recommendation by Sir J. Graham of an abandonment of the case—a recommendation which was instantly followed by the release of the prisoner, but not of a restitution of the property, either to the prisoner himself, or to the parties deputed by the assignees under his estate for their joint behoof. The bankrupt has, however, now been brought into the New District Court for final hearing, and the bankrupt surrendered himself, the 42nd day having expired, which is the limit prescribed by the statute to prevent an outlawry. Some strong statements were made by Mr. Nicholson, who was present, affecting the truth of the bankrupt's statement of poverty; this gentleman asserting that he had good grounds for believing that he (the bankrupt) had some reserved funds, a statement which the earnest commissioner received with his usual caution, and with much good feeling, and in the best possible taste, recommended the bankrupt, if he were privy to any concealment, at once to disclose it, and save himself from the painful consequences prescribed for such offences. The question now before the Court is as to the disposition of the money in the possession of the officer, who has detained it hitherto upon the priority of a criminal over a civil process; there being put in before the court a certificated copy of theft. This case derives considerable interest, as being the latest evidence of the state of the international law between this country and America, and affords a tolerable presentiment that something is likely to arise out of these apparent hostile favours to the ends of both nations in the exercise of public justice, in a reciprocative determination that those who, by the violation of their obligations to society, have rendered themselves amenable to a criminal tribunal, shall not find a false, shadowy, and abstract right of mere citizenship be suffered to elude the consequences of their offences. The court was crowded with professional gentlemen, and the utmost interest was manifested as to the manner in which the examination would terminate. The money seized from the bankrupt by the police-officer still remains in his possession, no order having been given to the messenger to take it for the benefit of the bankrupt's creditors.

NORFOLK.—STRANGE STORY.—Messrs. Culley, of Cossey, have lately built a dulling boat and employed men to take the soil from the bottom of the river in front of their mills. A few days since these men found a human skeleton, and a coroner's inquest has since been held. It appears that about nine years ago a Jew, whose name was said to be Abrams, visited Taversham in the course of his trade, sold some small articles, for which he gave credit to the purchasers, and left the public house there in the evening, on his way to the the Lyon, at Drayton (the next village), which, as he never returned, a sum of £90 in his possession. At Drayton he disappeared, nor did he ever again come to claim the amount due to him at Taversham. Some time afterwards a man named Page was apprehended for sheep-stealing, tried and sentenced to transportation for life. During his imprisonment he told divers stories of robberies and crimes, most of which turned out to be false. But, amongst other things, he wrote a letter, promising that if he were released from gaol and brought to Cossey, "he would show them that from under the willow-tree, which would make every hair in their heads rise up." The man was not released, but the river was drawn, and some sheep's skins and sheep's heads were found, which were considered to be the objects Page alluded to. From under the willow-tree, however, the skeleton has been fished up by the dulcers, and it said there is proof that the corpse was fixed down by a muck crome. The common belief in the neighbouring villages is, that these are the bones of the missing Jew, and that Page knew of the murder, if he were not an accomplice. The magistrates, we understand, believe that they have obtained a clue to the murderers, and have been and still are earnestly engaged in pursuing the discovery.

SURREY.—SUPPOSED INCENDIARISM.—On Tuesday evening between five and six o'clock great excitement was created in the village of Lower Morden, in the county of Surrey, in consequence of a fire of a very extensive nature breaking out on the premises belonging to William York, farmer, &c., situate at the above village, and known as Peacock Farm. The premises in question were of immense magnitude, and occupied an area of ground of several acres. A great portion of the ground was set apart as rick-yards, and when the fire was discovered it was raging in two stacks of wheat which stood in the centre of the ground, amongst a great number of other ricks. The firemen, finding that all efforts to save the two ricks were useless, directed their exertions towards saving the adjoining ones, when were several times in imminent danger. About four hours after the outbreak the two ricks with their valuable contents were entirely consumed, and considerable damage done to the adjoining ones by the fire and smoke. The total loss it is expected will exceed £2000.

IRELAND.

DUBLIN, Dec. 19.—A horrible murder was yesterday discovered to have been committed in the vicinity of Dublin, and much interest is excited by the circumstance of its having occurred in nearly the same spot where Garibardo, the Italian boy, was murdered. The victim of this shocking outrage was a young man, apparently about twenty-five, whose name is unknown. The body was found between six and seven in the morning, at the Pig-sties at Classon's bridge, Miltown; the throat was cut from ear to ear, and the body other wise mutilated; the feet were burned, and had other marks of violence.

AWFULLY SUDDEN DEATH.—Another to the many instances on record of the uncertainty of life occurred at Magherafelt on Tuesday night last. The subject of this sudden change from time to eternity was the Rev. Thomas Burgoyne, an exemplary and respected clergyman of the Established Church, and son of the late Sir John Jas. Burgoyne, of Strabane. On the evening of the day in question he and his lady arrived at Mr. M'Paul's hotel, in Magherafelt, where they intended stopping for the night. It appears that he had been complaining for some time previously of what he conceived to be a cold, but on that evening he felt tolerably well, and was quite cheerful in his manner, and retired to rest without manifesting any symptoms of indisposition. About twelve o'clock at night, however, he was taken dangerously ill, and two of the resident doctors were immediately called in, who used every exertion to repel the attack, but in vain—he expired about three o'clock, A.M. His demise has created a deep and melancholy sensation throughout Magherafelt, and as far as the mournful intelligence was heard. He was a young man, not having, it is supposed, completed his 30th year; and shortly before the event seemed, to human appearance, destined for a long career in the ministry.

DEATH OF VICE-ADMIRAL EVANS.—The Cork papers announce the death of Mr. Henry Evans, Vice-Admiral of the Red, who expired at his residence at Oldtown, in the county of Cork, on the 13th inst., after a long and painful illness.

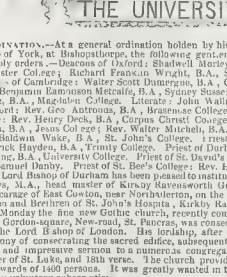
DEANERY OF ST. PATRICK'S.—The Dublin Evening Mail states, "on competent authority," that the Hon. and Rev. Dr. Pakenham, Archdeacon of Emly, and brother-in-law of his Grace the Duke of Wellington, has accepted the deanery of St. Patrick's, in succession to Dr. Daly, now Bishop of Cashel.

RAILROAD COMMUNICATION, THROUGH NORTH WALES, BETWEEN LONDON AND DUBLIN.—On Saturday a deputation, consisting of the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, Sir Edward Borough, Bart. (high sheriff), Sir John Burke, Bart., Sir J. Kingston Jones, Bart., Frederick Ponsonby, Esq., Edward Grogan, Esq., M.P., and Messrs. Pim, Perry, Halliday, M. Mullen, &c., waited upon his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, for the purpose of conveying to him the resolutions adopted at a public meeting of the citizens of Dublin, which was held a short time since, for the purpose of his excellency's attention to the vast importance in all points of view of this great national object, and upon the consideration of which a select committee of the House of Commons had been for some months engaged during the course of the session. His excellency received the deputation in the most affable and gracious manner, entered into the merits of the proposed communication with great and lively interest, and expressed his readiness at all times, and be all the means in his power, to forward so important and truly national an object.

EXTRAORDINARY AND FATAL ACCIDENT.—On Tuesday week, Dr. M'Cullagh, late of the 84th regiment, came by his death at Maghera, county Derry, in the following extraordinary manner:—He and Dr. Barr were about to drink off two bottles of soda water, and as Dr. Barr was in the act of uncorking one, the cork flew out and struck Dr. M'Cullagh on the jugular vein, who fell down and instantly expired.

SCOTLAND.

GLASGOW.—We are pained to state that murder (the murder of a wife by her own husband) was perpetrated at Glasgow on Saturday afternoon, under the following circumstances:—Between one and two o'clock a man named Charles M'Kay, who was in the employment of a ham-curer in the city, and resided in the house of a Mrs. Tinney, or M'Kenzie, in the old Wynd, disagreed with his wife, and while she was standing at the window he seized a ham-knife and stabbed her in the left leg, nearly at the groin. The wounded woman immediately fell on the floor, and never spoke afterwards. M'Kay is in custody.



ORDINATION.—At a general ordination holden by his Grace the Archbishop of York, at Bishopsthorpe, the following gentlemen were admitted into holy orders.—Deacons of Oxford: Shadwell Mosley Clerke, B.A., Worcester College; Richard Franklin Wright, B.A., St. John's College. Deacons of Cambridge: Walter Scott Dumergue, B.A., Corpus Christi College; Benjamin Emmanuel Metcalfe, B.A., Sydney Sussex College; William Twine, B.A., Magdalen College. Literate: John Wallis Hesp. Priests of Oxford: Rev. Geo Antrobus, B.A., Brasenose College. Priests of Cambridge: Rev. Henry Deck, B.A., Corpus Christi College; Rev. Julian Robinson, B.A., Jesus College; Rev. Walter Mitchell, B.A., Queen's College; Rev. Baldwin Wake, B.A., St. John's College. Priests of Dublin: Rev. Frederick Hayden, B.A., Trinity College. Priest of Durham: Rev. William Sweeting, B.A., University College. Priest of St. David's College, Lampeter: Rev. Samuel Danby. Priest of St. Bee's College: Rev. Henry Reed, Hegill.

The Lord Bishop of Durham has been pleased to institute the Rev. Thomas Holmes, M.A., head master of Kirkby Ravensworth Grammar School, to the Vicarage of East Cowton, near Northallerton, on the presentation of the Warden and Brethren of St. John's Hospital, Kirkby Ravensworth.

On Monday the fine new Gothic church, recently completed in Gordon-street, Gordon-square, New-road, St. Pancras, was consecrated by the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of London. His lordship, after going through the ceremony of consecrating the sacred edifice, subsequently preached an eloquent and impressive sermon to a numerous congregation from the 10th chapter of St. Luke, and 16th verse. The church provides accommodation for upwards of 1400 persons. It was greatly wanted in the parish, and was built by voluntary subscription.

At a general ordination held by the Lord Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol the following gentlemen were admitted into holy orders, viz.:—Deacons—E. H. Balard, B.A., Wadham, Oxon; L. Carden, B.A., University, Oxon; C. Cripps, B.A., Magdalen Hall, Oxon; E. J. C. Hasted, B.A., Pembroke, Oxon; H. C. Key, B.A., Christ Church, Oxon; R. C. Patteson, B.C.L., St. Mary Hall, Oxon; A. C. Rowley, B.A., Wadham, Oxon; H. Webb, B.A., Trinity, Cambridge; J. G. Young, B.A., Trinity, Cambridge; R. D. Browne, Literate (by letters dimissory from the Bishop of Llandaff); E. East, B.A., Magdalen Hall, Oxon; J. H. Griffin, B.A., New Inn Hall, Oxon; D. Morgan, scholar of St. David's, Lampeter; and T. Corbett, B.A., Emmanuel College, Cambridge (by letters dimissory from the Bishop of Bath and Wells). Priests—A. C. S. Addison, M.A., Magdalen Hall, Oxon; H. J. Bolland, M.A., Trinity, Cambridge; R. Champernowne, M.A., Christ Church, Oxon; I. Debay, B.A., Lincoln, Oxon; R. M. Hutchins, B.A., Trinity, Cambridge; R. Inchbald, B.A., St. John's, Cambridge; W. Joy, M.A., Trinity, Cambridge; T. P. Little, B.A., Trinity, Oxon; J. S. Money, B.A., Emanuel, Cambridge; F. Palmer, M.A., Trinity, Cambridge; C. Phillips, B.A., Trinity, Cambridge; W. T. Preedy, B.A., St. John's, Cambridge; R. A. Pritchard, S.C.L., Magdalen Hall, Oxon; W. H. Roach, B.A., Pembroke, Cambridge; W. Stephens, a literate person; J. C. Turnbull, B.A., Trinity, Cambridge; E. M. Macfarlane, B.A., Lincoln, Oxon; E. Machen, B.A., Exeter, Oxon, H. J. Marshall, B.A., Corpus Christi, Oxon; G. L. Mosse, B.A., University, Oxon; C. W. A. Napier, B.A., Christ Church, Oxon; W. F. Neville, B.A., Magdalen, Cambridge; J. C. Smith, B.A., Trinity, Dublin; and H. P. Wright, B.A., St. Peter's, Cambridge (by letters dimissory from the Bishop of Bath and Wells).

CORONERS' INQUESTS.

On Tuesday afternoon an inquest was held, at the Crown and Sceptre, Britannia-street, City-road, on the body of Mrs Charlotte Burkett, 31 years of age. It appeared by the evidence that on Saturday evening the deceased was speaking to a friend at her dwelling-house, 107, Britannia-street, when she suddenly exclaimed, "Oh, my head!" and sank down on the floor, and expired. Mr. Hills, a surgeon, was sent for, but in vain. Verdict "Died by the visitation of God."

A DRUNKARD'S FATE.—A coroner's inquest was held at the Compter, Giltspur-street, on the body of Richard Bailey, aged 31, lately a porter in the service of Mr. Hart, wine-merchant, of Pentlands-street. It appeared that the deceased had an uncontrol able propensity for ardent spirits, which, in the end, rendered him dishonest. On Saturday week he lost his situation, and being suspected of having robbed his late master, the latter received information of the suspicion. In consequence they watched him, and on Wednesday se nught one of their body met him in the city, carrying a two-gallon stone bottle, which he dropped as soon as the constable accosted him. The contents consisted of whisky, which he said he was taking, by his "master's" orders, to a person in Broad street. This statement proved untrue, and the deceased was lodged in the station, where, during the night, he was much excited, and otherwise indisposed. The next day he was taken before the Lord Mayor, and remanded to the Compter until Monday. The moment he entered the prison his indisposition was perceived, and he was placed in the infirmary, and attended to by the medical officer, but he died on Friday week. Mr. M'Murdo, the prison surgeon, and Mr. Read examined the body internally, and found disease of the stomach and liver, the result of hard drinking. Deceased had confessed his propensity for ardent spirits, and said that shortly before his apprehension he had swallowed a large quantity. Death was to be attributed to great excitement, the consequence of recent common lerate drinking of raw spirits. Verdict "Died from excessive drinking."

SUICIDE THROUGH FILIAL SORROW.—Mr. Payne held an inquest on Saturday at the Queen's Head, Cree-church lane, Leadenhall-street, on the body of Elias Jacobs, aged 40, a coffee house keeper, of No. 2, Bury street, St. Mary Axe, and of the Hebrew persuasion. John Humes, servant to deceased, stated that, seeing on that morning he did not come down at his accustomed hour, she suspected, from previous circumstances, that he had destroyed himself in his bed-room. Fearing to go and ascertain the fact by herself, she sent for a policeman, who forced the bed-room door, and found the deceased suspended by the neck from the bed rail, by means of a cord. He had been dead, a surgeon who had been called in said, many hours. Ever since his father's death, which took place eleven months ago, his sorrow was so great that it frequently amounted to insanity, and latterly he was attended by a keeper from a lunatic asylum, who more than once prevented him from dashing out his brains by cutting his head against the wall. The passing of the Income-tax Act had added to his insanity, and his constant incoherent ravings about the ultimate injury he fancied it would do him so much annoyed his customers that they abandoned his shop one after the other. Though, besides his business, he inherited a fair portion of freehold property, he dreaded so much the effect of the income-tax, that no argument could persuade him that it would not be his ruin. Verdict, "Insanity."

EXTRAORDINARY SUICIDE.—On Tuesday evening Mr. Baker held an inquest at the Edinburgh Castle, Bridgewell, Limehouse, on view of the body of Edward Mullins, 66 years of age. Mr. John Mullins, brother of the deceased, deposed that, on Monday morning, he called at his house, and not finding him within, he made search for him, and found his hat lying on the banks of the Regent's Canal, which runs at the bottom of the deceased's garden. Fearing some accident had happened to him, he procured the drags, and in a short time the body of the deceased was got out. He was quite dead. He had fastened a bucket round his neck, which he had tied tight with his handkerchief. The father of the deceased had been drowned about fifteen, forty-three years ago, and the deceased, at this time of the year, was always very dejected and low spirited. At the fall moon he was generally very flighty and wild. There were two incised wounds on the throat, and one in the region of the heart, apparently made by a penknife, but neither of them were held sufficient to have caused death. There being no evidence to show how the deceased came into the water, the jury returned a verdict "Found drowned in the Regent's Canal."

On Thursday se'nnight, as Lieutenant Anthony Hunt, R.N., of Maidstone, who had been attending divine worship at the little chapel at Coxheath, was returning towards Maidstone, on arriving at Shernold-pond, he suddenly leaned against the friend with whom he was walking, and falling to the ground, became instantly a corpse.

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

The Cheltenham stag-hounds, on Tuesday week, had a narrow escape of adding another item to the long catalogue of dreadful railway accidents. They were out when the train came down, and the hounds having crossed over a smart run thence in a circuit round the town, crossed the railroad near Badgeworth, just as one of the Gloucester trains came up. The foremost dog was instantly crushed beneath the carriages, and had the train run on a few seconds later, the whole of the pack must have shared the same fate, as the hounds were at the moment coming full speed down the bank; but the engine-man at full speed also, the train had passed before they crossed in pursuit, followed by such of the field as were up at the time. The stag was captured all safe at Badgeworth.

BUCKHOUNDS.—DAY WERE THE QUEEN'S HOUNDS.—On Monday the beautiful pack had one of the best days for the season. The meet was at Benfield, about nine miles from Windsor, a sufficient distance from town to render the field free from a London importation. There were but few, and those the regular men, headed by the noble Master, Lord Rosslyn, who showed on the occasion. The whole muster was not more than sixty. The stag was let out about eleven, near the Hound's Inn, at Benfield, but it was more than half an hour before the hounds were put on the scent. The stag law given, behind the judgment of Cut as Davis, was on good legs starting. "Hot pack will have the fox or die" was the cry. The line taken by the stag was from Benfield to Hurst, direct for Riscombiake, across the Western Railroad towards Twyford, by Wargrave on towards Henley, when he was taken, after a splendid run of one hour and ten minutes over a stiff and heavy fencing country. The distance could not be less than fourteen miles, and when the state of the ground is considered, it needs not further particulars to prove the severity of the run. It would be almost invidious to mention names, for many went like thorough sportsmen.

ST. GEORGE'S CATHOLIC CHURCH.

The revival of our ancient parochial church architecture is a subject which occupies much attention at the present time; and after three centuries of demolition and neglect, the solemn structures raised by our Catholic ancestors are being gradually restored to somewhat of their original appearance. The most recent, and one of the most complete, of these restorations is that of the Temple Church, which we noticed some time ago. It is pleasing to observe that such buildings, which, a few years since, were considered unsightly and barbarous erections, are now become the theme for admiration, and even recommended as models for imitation to our modern ecclesiastical architects; for glorious, magnificent, and edifying as were the great cathedral and abbatical churches—wonderful monuments of piety and zeal—we cannot turn to them in present circumstances as objects of imitation. To rival them is totally out of the question; to produce a meagre and reduced copy would be little better than caricaturing past glories. There is a peculiar interest pertaining to those old Catholic parish churches of England—each is, so to speak, the history of the adjacent county; the family chantrey, with its baronial monuments and heraldic bearings, the churchman's brass, the crusader's tomb, the peasant's cross, the storied windows, are all evidences of a long series of men and events, and valuable indeed are the national records furnished by many of even the humblest churches of our land, and even now, despoiled as they are, still is there a traditionary reverence for these monuments of ancient piety left among the people. To the poet the village spires, the church bells, the old porches, the venerable yew trees, the old grey towers, have all their "sweet uses;" while to the less highly gifted—to those engaged in the strife and turmoil of this busy world—those sights and sounds are rife with pleasant recollections.

...ORGE'S CATHOLIC CHURCH.

inferences which may be deemed deducible rom its erection at the present period—whether it be viewed as a focal point of Catholicism in the metropolis, or as a mere ordinary resource to meet the requirements of an existent body of religionists.

In London it has been long a matter of reproach to the Catholic body, that even what are termed the fashionable chapels are less imposing and more inconvenient than many Protestant chapels of ease; so ill constructed as to arrangement, as to expose the sacred mysteries to unnecessary interruptions and publicity; so confined in their dimensions, that not a tenth part of the people can squeeze themselves in. The Catholics ... to procure a better order of things. ... worthy of all praise. The idea of the present structure we believe originated with the Rev. Mr. Doyle, in consequence of the expiration of the lease of the Belgian chapel in the London-road. The execution of it was entrusted to Welby Pugin, Esq., a gentleman who, both by precept and example, has done much to vindicate the high principles of art.

The new Catholic Cathedral stands at St. George's-cross, being the intersection of St. George's-road and the Lambeth-road. It was commenced on the feast of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin, 1840, and is now well advanced, though the works have not been progressing with the required rapidity for some months past owing to the state of the weather and to a deficiency of funds. The style of the building is decorated of the period of Edward the Third, perhaps the palmiest period of our architectural history, and to which are referable many of those sumptuous abbeys and magnificent cathedrals which still remain the pride of our land—when, as some compensation to our humiliated neighbours, then smarting under the disasters of Cressy, we could afford to give them those enduring memorials of our genius which have since conferred a world-renowned celebrity on Abbeville, Amiens, and Rouen. Its total length is 240 feet; width, 70 feet; south aisle, 19 feet 6 inches; north, ditto ditto; chancel, 31 feet. The height from the nave floor to the apex of the roof is 57 feet 3 inches. The ground on which the tower stands occupies a space of 32 feet square, and the buttresses extend 4 feet 6 inches beyond. The tower is surmounted by a spire of peculiar lightness and beauty, which, when completed, will measure 317 feet. A crest of very elegant form overtops the ridge of the roof throughout the whole length of the building. The material used is generally Caen banks, of a yellow colour, of great hardness, made at Ware, in Herefordshire; the windows, doorways, &c., being of Combe Down stone. In the interior there will be a great quantity of carved-work, principally of stone; among which, a Gothic baptismal font of great beauty will be conspicuous. There will be some oak carvings about the chancel, which will be divided from the nave by a richly carved oak screen, and will be ascended from the outside by two spiral staircases, terminating in high turrets, containing bells. In the manner of the Continental churches, there will be no pews, but two-thirds of the floor will be fitted with open benches, and the floors of both chapels and chancels will be laid with encrusted tiles of various patterns. There is no ornamental plaster work whatever in this building, all the ornaments being carved either in stone or oak, without repetition of design; and the whole of the roofs and walls are intended to be enriched with painting and gilding. Immediately over the great window of the tower, blocks of stone are built in the wall, for the purpose of carving, at some future period, the Last Judgment, as it may be seen in most old churches. By the munificence of the Earl of Shrewsbury, the great window of the chancel will be fitted with stained glass, representing the genealogy of our Lord. We understand that a convent for the Sisters of Mercy is to be added, together with spacious sacristies, houses for the clergy, and parochial schools for both sexes.

The report that the Pope of Rome has largely contributed to the erection of this edifice is, we hear, totally without foundation. The church has been built in reality by the pence of the poor.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XXIV.

CHARLES BULLER, M.P.

The subject of our present sketch was one of the politicians born of the struggle that preceded the carrying of the Reform Bill. Very few whose political existence dates from that stormy and excited period have attained so eminent a position, particularly when it is considered that it has been gained exclusively in the House of Commons, an arena where the judges of ability are many of them also competitors for the same prize or prizes—power, for the sake of power only, or place, for the sake of profit, as the case may be—and not likely to apply an ordinary standard to the "rising young men" who occasionally make their way into the assembly of the collective wisdom. It is no trifling acknowledgment of Mr. Buller's powers as a debater, when we find all parties alike confessing ... though a very large section is politically bound to deplore the application he makes of them. He came into Parliament an unknown man; the mere fact of his being a barrister not being sufficient to insure him much consideration. At the bar, he was without a name—by the public he had never been heard of—in the House of Commons he was untried. This was in 1830; and now, after a lapse of twelve years, the bar derives lustre from the association of his name, the public recognise in him an able and upright politician, and the members of "the house" listen to his speeches as to those of a man from whom something may always be gained, either of amusement or information. His style of speaking is rather the conversational than that elevated manner which has become associated with our ideas of oratory. He stands at the table of the house, and addresses the ministerial benches as if the occupiers were his very dear and familiar friends, to whom he was telling some very good story, in which they themselves figure as the principal personages—not always with the best possible result to their own characters as lawmakers. There he stands, turning their fallacies inside out, and piercing a solemn pomposity with a keen, sharp rally, which not only throws the opposition into a united and corporate fit of laughter, but, mirabile dictu, not seldom makes the victims of his playful satire join in the laugh against themselves. This could not be done by an ill-natured man, or if the things themselves were said in an ill-natured manner, for no one laughs at the exhibition of malice, however it is disguised. Notwithstanding the severe hits he deals out on the conservative members in general, and the county members in particular—whom he doth especially take a pride to gird at—we feel confident there is not a man in the house who would not bear testimony, if required, to the member for Liskeard being a real good fellow; and though he has in him a wicked turn for the satiric, and, at times, is rather sharp on the country gentlemen, yet the wounds of his wit never rankle; his weapon sparkles brightly enough, and he can use it in a rapid and touch-and-go style, but it carries no poison on its edge. If pinked to-day, there are no after heart-burnings on either side, and there is no objection to meet on the same terms to-morrow; in fact, the process is rather agreeable than otherwise. Of solid, stolid declamation, of portentous prosing, and of deep searchings into the storehouse of facts, with which statistics and political economy have afflicted the world, there is at all times more than enough; dull excessively are the many dealers in such matters who bestow their tediousness on the House with a most unsparing liberality. There is, then, something to be greeted and welcomed in one who can, as Charles Buller does, breathe something like life into the dry bones of facts, by eliciting principles from them of general application—who can place his opinions in striking lights, embellish them with always apt and often happy illustration, and who can clothe all things, whether opinion, principle, fact, or illustration, in graceful and fluent language, though it may be occasionally wanting in force and emphasis. It is delightful to see such a speaker overturning a ponderous absurdity with a rapid backstroke of wit, or transfixing a fallacy with the point of an epigram, putting his opponent into a parenthesis, which exposes him to the laughter of all men, sometimes, as we before stated, even to his own. There is another quality which may occasionally be detected in Charles Buller; he has in his composition a latent love of mischief—that is, he has no sort of objection to seeing a quarrel going on between two of his opponents; and if ever such an affair is in progress—if it is "a very pretty quarrel as it stands"—it is ten to one that it draws no nearer a settlement by his interference. He continues in the most accidental and delightfully careless manner possible to say something on both sides which widens the breach; or if the flames seem cooling down, a judicious stir of the embers at the right moment sets all in a blaze again, till one, or what is still better, both the parties have made themselves ridiculous, to the great outward chuckling and inward satisfaction of the lookers on. But, notwithstanding this very praiseworthy disposition for fun, Charles Buller must not be mistaken for the mere witling or sayer of smart things: he is a man of high principle and honourable conduct. As he entered Parliament, so he remains. When Lord Durham was sent to Canada, Mr. Buller accompanied him, and, as his secretary, assisted in drawing up the celebrated "Report" on the state of affairs in that colony. He was afterwards made Secretary of the Board of Control, the only strictly Government office he ever held. Mr. Buller is very tall, slight, and by no means compactly put together: he has also a slight halt in his gait. In describing his features, regular would be the last adjective applied to them; but there is a cheerful, good-tempered, and winning expression in his face which speaks much for his disposition. He is a member of the Cornish family of the Bullers, different branches of which inherit large properties in that county. A near relative of the honourable gentleman has a seat in the neighbourhood of Liskeard, and on his influence he first entered Parliament for that borough. His own qualities, however, keep him in his seat, for he is much and most deservedly admired by his constituents, who by their choice merit their place among the most intelligent political bodies in the kingdom. The influence of the Kekewich family has frequently been used against him at elections, but always in vain. He is very strong on the hustings, where he "comes out" with great effect, being less under restraint than in the House: some of his speeches on these occasions are rich in the extreme; there is a sort of chivalrous personal attachment to him among the electors, and the enthusiasm with which they support him is unbounded. He is said to be an occasional writer in the Globe newspaper, and there is no doubt, from other evidence, that he can use his pen with ability and effect. His practice at the bar is limited, but his name may occasionally be seen in connection with causes. He was engaged a very short time ago in an appeal case from the native courts of India to the House of Lords.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

NEWSTEAD ABBEY.

What spot in all broad England richer in associations than Sherwood—"merrie, right merrie, Sherwood!" It is one of the very birth-places of English lyric lore and ballad historic, and the utterance of the word conjures up a thousand memories of old rhymes, which linger still a lasting recollection,—and snatches of quaint ditties, which earliest learned are latest forgotten, spring to the lips. Not a boy in all England "but he of Robin Hood hath heard," the "English ballad-singer's joy,"—the joyous, roystering, generous, manly, open-hearted, sturdy, "bold Robin Hood." He who outwitted all the shrieves, and fought foot to foot, with stout quarter-staff, all the renowned rural heroes which midland England could produce—who robbed the rich but gave to the poor—who, with the bluffest and jolliest of all friars, Friar Tuck, the fairest, blithest, bonniest, truest, of all maidens, Maid Marian, the tallest and boldest of all foresters, Little John, and the choicest and bravest of all free companions, Will Scatlock, George-a-Green, Much, the miller's son, and Will Stutely—not to forget the sorrowful Allan-a-Dale—held a foresters' court, as a tree forester's should, under the broad shadow of old Sherwood's bravest oak. And in good sooth and sober philosophy there was but small difference in those days, when

> The only rule and simple plan
> Was, he may take who has the power,
> And he may keep who can.

between Robin Hood and his brother freebooters, the feudal barons, save in this fact, that they held their bands within the stone walls of some moated keep, and Robin held his in the open forest—the green, springy turf for his audience-floor, and the blue sky for his canopy.

Sherwood Forest! At bare mention of the words, all the bold band live again. Robin "yclad in Lincoln-green" with maid Marian, and Friar Tuck—the priest gaily descanting on the virtues of venison pasty—and Little John just placing a cloth yard shaft, and Will Scatlocke sportively measuring his quarter-staff with Allan-a-Dale, and a knot of the "merrie men" breaking one of the King's deer, and others plying bill-hook and whittle upon dead branches and dry whins to enkindle the ready flame and dress their venison. And afar off is heard the distant chime of a bell;—it swings in the tower of a goodly abbey, which a contrite king had raised in hope that Heaven would thereby forgive a heavy murder he had caused to be done. And the bell calls the black Canons of Augustine to prayer, to pray for the sins of the king—of the second Henry—at the shrine of the canonized

VIEW OF NEWSTEAD ABBEY.

Thomas-à-Becket, whose murder that king had brought about. And thus the friars did, day by day in their stately abbey, which was placed—as abbeys always were—in the richest and fattest valley which Sherwood could afford. And on a quiet lake, the abbey swans "float double, swan and shadow," and the placid waters reflect the blue sky and passing clouds, and lend another charm to the fair landscape, which then as now surrounded Newstead.

But Time strides onward in his stealthy course, sparing nor hero, nor forester, nor monk. All that lives of Robin Hood is the memory of his deeds handed from sire to son, from old crooning nurses to their young changelings, in the rude, quaint ballad histories of those early days. And Time wrought changes in Sherwood also. Its leafy honours under his spell were passing away. The busy axe of the woodman fell mercilessly among the oaks, and the old friars too had long since given place to the descendants of a long line of noble laymen. Of this old family one had fought with Edward the First, and been knighted at the memorable siege of Calais; another strove gallantly at Bosworth, and in reward was made Steward and Warden of Sherwood; another stood forward valiantly for his monarch when the great rebellion broke out, which ended by bringing a king to the block. This last, at Edge-hill and Newbury, gave soldierly token of his gallant loyalty, and thereafter was made a baron—Lord Byron—as his recompence. And all these gallant men and goodly deeds helped to keep Sherwood and Newstead enshrined in some portion of their old renown. But yet the lords were waning as the monks had done before, when in the fading fortunes of their house, the last and noblest of its owners arose to shed a halo around it a glory not quickly to depart; and Sherwood, which the ballad stories of five centuries had rendered a legendary ground, gained another poet, who will aid in handing down its memory to all time.

The cloud of poetical associations which hovers, as it were, above and about Newstead, has drawn, and will hereafter draw, many to visit a scene fraught with so many and such varied memories. A short ride from the busy town of Nottingham, stands The Hut—a roadside hostelry facing the gate of the abbey domain. Passing this, and wending down the somewhat bare-looking way—plantations of young firs shutting in the view on either side—the abbey, awhile concealed, bursts all at once upon the expectant sight; just as the last, the laureled, of its owners spoke of it:—

> An old, old monastery once, and now
> [illegible] mansion of a rich and rare
> [illegible]

On the right is a baronial tower, conjoined with the body of the building, and speaking "more of the baron than the monk." On the left the great west window of the old abbey church, all twined with ivy, and venerable in its decay:—

> A mighty window, hollow in the centre,
> Shorn of its glass of thousand colourings,
> Through which the deepening glories once could enter,
> Streaming from off the sun like seraphs' wings,
> Now an [illegible]

But though the "great oriel" be "all desolate," still is it beautiful in ruin.

THE COLOSSEUM PRINT.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS AND NEWS-AGENTS.

The unparalleled success of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS (which has far exceeded the most sanguine expectations of the Proprietors) renders it necessary for them (in order to avoid anything like confusion or disappointment, and to give completeness and perfection to their scheme, by bringing the volume to the end of the year, which it would have been otherwise impossible for them to do) to postpone the issue of the Colosseum Print until Saturday, the 7th of January, when it shall appear, with a well-arranged Index and Title Page, thereby affording time to the trade, who have fully represented their difficulties to us, to ensure the most extensive and impartial distribution. The following directions will be found to facilitate materially the wishes of our subscribers to obtain the print, and we beg that they may be in all cases observed:—

Subscribers should write to the person to whom the subscription has been paid, directing him in what manner to forward the print, so that it may sustain the least amount of injury in its transit; for, although it will bear a stamp, and may be forwarded postage free (for the additional cost of the stamp), yet it is obvious that such a method is most objectionable; and as in all large towns there are a great number of subscribers, it would be preferable that some arrangement might be made by which they might be sent by parcel, and thus escape the damage which they must inevitably sustain by being sent by post. Booksellers and News-vendors in the country are therefore requested to give their orders to their town-agents in this way.

On the 7th of January, will also be issued a supplement or extra number, price sixpence, which will contain

A Preface, with illustrations by Kenny Meadows.

Two Keys to the Colosseum print.

Ten views of Old London, contrasting it with one large new view.

"London the City of the World," a song, the words by Bayley, the music by Loder, with a beautiful allegorical device.

A Set of Twelfth-night characters by Crowquill.

An elaborately engraved title page, from a beautiful and original design by Gilbert, and an Index with illustrations by an eminent artist.

This extra number (it is hoped) will add considerably to the beauty and value of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS as an historical record for families of all the stirring events of our time, and, although regularly stamped, will be sold with the current number and not separately.

At the opening of Parliament the Subscribers of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS will be presented with an attractive supplement gratis.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1842.

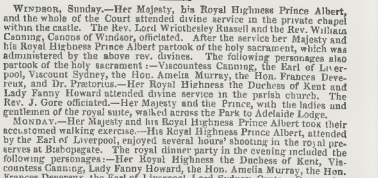
The French are very selfish, very savage in their selfishness, and very easily provoked. It perhaps too redounds nothing to their credit that they are either most annoyed at the fair prosperity of another, or most pleased at some unfair adversity which they themselves, as a nation, have perhaps chiefly fostered to consummation. When Great Britain closed her hostilities with China by a triumph more commercial than warlike, Parisian pique and venom were spat forth under pitiful disguises of opinion and language, which were too transparent to conceal the spite by which they were engendered. But when the re-acting philosophy of the French modern school of thought shamed public men and writers into a sense of the undignified position in which they stood, it became beautifully ludicrous to watch their altered tone and the bright, smiling, disinterested complacency with which they suddenly recognised and acknowledged the commercial achievement of England, on account of the benefit which the opening of the Chinese trade would at once confer upon Europe at large. England was not to be selfish enough to work for herself, but France was at once ready and certain to participate in the advantage of all that she had done! This was your pure French philosophy. Now the antagonistic principle of combined rage and wrong is exhibited in the whole conduct of the French nation in reference to the Barcelona revolt in Spain. The French rejoicing in what we have called "the unfair adversity of another which they themselves chiefly fostered to consummation" applies clearly to the insurgent party on the Spanish side of the Pyrenees—cuts in favour of Christina against Espartero—and strikes a sort of bastard blow of policy against the present position of the regency in Spain. The French howl against England as the real fomentor of the Barcelona insurrection, and, in the same breath, they accuse Espartero, its bitterest enemy and the man who put it down, of having a leaning to Great Britain. Here the inconsistency rebuts the assertion, and we can well afford to rest at ease under the accusation. But, on the other hand, it is clear that the conduct of the French consul identified him, all but officially, with the rebels. He sheltered the flying cowards who headed the revolt, and made his position so clearly obnoxious to the legitimate authorities that it is now positively stated that Espartero has demanded his recal. In the meanwhile France so approves of the actions of her Consul that she loads him with favour—awards him, with a characteristic national vanity, the decoration of the Legion of Honour—and, before the Regent's demand can have reached Paris, the congratulations of French policy are ringing in the delighted ears of Monsieur Lesseps. So that this very Espartero, who is accused of leaning to England at the very moment when the same England is accused of fomenting the rebellion against the same Espartero, has the French bravado in his teeth before he can make a proper and rational appeal for French justice, which, after all, would, we fear, be nearly as nasty a physic as French bravado. Selfishness, inconsistency, tyranny, caprice, and insolence characterise the whole bearing of France in this transaction. Meanwhile Europe is half-earnestly, half-foolishly, alarmed lest the impertinence of Parisian intrigue and diplomacy should disturb the peace of the world. The effect has been a fluctuation of the funds of the Paris Bourse and of our own Exchange. The lesson read to Europe is that of French vain and obstinate injustice and instability. The truth of all the questions involved is, with their consequences, only to be solved and disclosed by time and circumstances; and in the meanwhile we have the half consolation, half disgust of knowing that France arrogates to herself, whenever selfishness dictates, the false pride and the bad principle of being always in the wrong!

We cannot conclude these comments without a word upon the bombardment of Barcelona, and the subsequent punishment which has been inflicted upon the misguided insurgents who surrendered within its walls. The bombardment was, we both fear and hope, justifiable—the punishment has been horrible in the extreme. The old Roman cruelty of decimation was resorted to, and one man out of ten has been shot. Civil war will not vindicate this, and humanity shudders at the wild injustice of such a revenge. Espartero has sadly and shamefully sullied his laurels, and all our indignation at French want of principle will never win British approval upon an act of barbarity which no true soldier of Old England would ever have the wanton ferocity to commit. When will holy peace civilize these bloodthirsty savages of Spain?

Several letters which have recently appeared in this journal, bearing date from Paris, and headed "From our own Correspondent," will have indicated to our readers that we have the advantage of a manifestly an fait, intelligent, and well-informed collaborateur in the French metropolis, upon whose quickness, ability, and industry we can entirely depend. The gentleman in question has undertaken the somewhat arduous task of throwing the news of Paris into this paper, with illustration, and of sending us over also occasional sketches of interest from "the City of the Seine." The Bourse appears in our present number—the Palais Royal will succeed it—and the Opening of the French Chambers will form an early and animated news embellishment of the commencement of the ensuing year.

In a recent number of this journal we committed a very clear but very involuntary error, which we hasten at once to correct, not more in justice to the party whom it might probably have aggrieved, than to the reputation for fairness and honesty of principle, which we are more desirous to keep established than even the high and gratifying popularity which we at present enjoy. The case to which we have to allude was that of "Smith versus Bond," a trial involving a narration of sad and demoralizing gambling transactions. The verdict in this case was registered for a large amount in favour of the plaintiff Smith; and on the principle of strong opposition to every kind of gaming, but, above all, in public bells, we declared our opinion of the propriety of the result. We, however—writing from memory of the report of the case, without the actual document before us—confounded the not very uncommon names of Thompson and Smith, and, under the belief that the plaintiff had been the servant of the defendant, and had availed himself of a knowledge of the guilt in which he had participated to complete his case against his former master, we indignantly reprobated the treachery which had produced the result we approved. We refused to lend ourselves to the principle that a good end justified bad means. We did this honestly, and are happy to know that our readers rejoiced in the tone which we had the courage to assume. With equal honesty we now maintain the truth of our doctrine, and explain the error of its application. Mr. Smith was not the servant of Mr. Bond, but, it is now stated, was a total stranger to him and his establishment.

Our remarks, therefore, cease to apply to him entirely as he was not a prosecutor in the position attacked, and they are, of course, fully and honourably retracted by us as far as he is personally concerned. We do not even impugn his witness Thompson, for, as a witness subpœnaed and upon oath, he was bound to state all he knew, and a charge of malice or treachery could only apply to the fact of a man's availing himself of a guilty knowledge of crime to procure its punishment by prosecution. Thus it will be seen that our positions hold in their morality, although they were in error in their application, and we have, therefore, as much pleasure in now exonerating Mr. Smith, as we have, for the sake of society, of sustaining the doctrines which led us into a misconception of his position in relation to the justly punished Mr. Bond.



THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, Sunday.—Her Majesty, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and the whole of the Court attended divine service in the private chapel within the castle. The Rev. Lord Wriothesley Russell and the Rev. William Canning, Canons of Windsor, officiated. After the service her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert partook of the holy sacrament, which was administered by the above rev. divines. The following personages also partook of the holy sacrament:—Viscountess Canning, the Earl of Liverpool, Viscount Sydney, the Hon. Amelia Murray, the Hon. Frances Devereux, and Dr. Pretorius.—Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent and Lady Fanny Howard attended divine service in the parish church. The Rev. J. Gore officiated.—Her Majesty and the Prince, with the ladies and gentlemen of the royal suite, walked across the Park to Adelaide Lodge.

MONDAY.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert took their accustomed walking exercise.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by the Earl of Liverpool, enjoyed several hours' shooting in the royal preserves at Bishopsgate. The royal dinner party in the evening included the following personages:—Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Viscountess Canning, Lady Fanny Howard, the Hon. Amelia Murray, the Hon. Frances Devereux, the Earl of Liverpool, Lord Sydney, Captain Dimcombe, Sir Edward Bowater, Sir Henry Wheatley, Colonel Grey, and Dr. Pretorius.

TUESDAY.—Her Majesty did not take her usual morning walk: but in the afternoon her Majesty walked on the terrace and grand parterre with his Royal Highness Prince Albert. His Royal Highness Prince Albert drove to Frogmore Lodge in a pony phaeton in the afternoon, and returned to the castle with her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent remained at the castle for some time, and lunched with her Majesty.—The Duke of Wellington arrived at the castle on a visit to her Majesty.—Sir Henry Wheatley left for town in the forenoon. The royal dinner party in the evening included the following personages:—His Grace the Duke of Wellington, Viscountess Canning, the Hon. Amelia Murray, the Hon. Frances Devereux, the Marquis of Ormonde, Lord and Lady Haddo, the Earl of Liverpool, Capt. Meynell, Sir E. Bowater, Colonel Grey, and Dr. Pretorius. The band of the Grenadier Guards was in attendance.

WEDNESDAY.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert took their usual walking exercise. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by the Duke of Wellington, and attended by Sir E. Bowater, enjoyed several hours shooting in the royal preserves at Sandpit Gate, where they had some excellent sport. Her Majesty walked out with the Prince in the royal pleasure grounds in the afternoon. Her Royal Highness the Princess Royal was taken out in the royal pleasure grounds. The royal dinner party included the following personages:—Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the Duke of Wellington, Viscountess Canning, Lady Fanny Howard, the Hon Misses Devereux and Murray, the Earl of Liverpool, the Marquis of Ormonde, Lady Montague and the Hon. Miss Montagu, Sir E. Bowater, Captain Meynell, Colonel Grey, and Dr. Pretorius.

The Marquis of Ormonde has succeeded Lord Sydney as the Lord in Waiting, and Capt. Meynell has succeeded Captain Dimcombe as the Groom in Waiting on her Majesty.

Her Majesty the Queen Dowager visited the quiet town of Poole on Saturday last, and created quite a sensation amongst the inhabitants by her unexpected condescension. Her Majesty drove round the principal streets, and appeared in excellent health.

CANFORD HOUSE.—The Queen Dowager and the limited members of her court, were deeply affected on receiving the melancholy news of the sudden death of the Countess of Dunrgh. The deceased countess was eldest daughter of the late Earl of Ducie, and sister of the present earl, and Lady Julia Langston, and Lady Charlotte Berkeley. Her ladyship was born the 14th of Dec., 1798, and married the 8th of May, 1823, to the Earl of Desbigh, by whom her ladyship leaves a family of nine children. Her Majesty is now enjoying an excellent state of health, having completely recovered from the effects of her recent cold, which, by the way, was greatly exaggerated. Sir

David Davis, physician in ordinary to her Majesty, has been making several professional visits: but now, in consequence of her Majesty's convalescence, he has left for town. Earl Howe is with his family at Gopsall Hall, Leicestershire, but is expected shortly. Viscount and Viscountess Barrington are on a visit, her ladyship being in waiting on the Dowager Queen. Lady Gore and the Hon. Miss Gore are also visiting her Majesty. His Imperial Highness the Archduke Frederick of Austria is expected to pay his respects to her Majesty, before finally departing for the Mediterranean.

LADY GRANARD.—We are happy in being able to state that Lady Graham is convalescent. The Right Hon. Home Secretary, his lady and family, we understand, intend spending the Christmas holidays at Brighton, if her ladyship should recover sufficient strength to undertake the journey.

FESTIVITIES AT HIMLEY HALL.—Lord Ward gave a splendid fête on Tuesday night at Himley Hall, in celebration of the birthday of his only brother the Hon. Rumble Ward, who attained his majority on that day.

DEATH OF SIR THOMAS HAGGERSTON, BART.—We understand accounts have been received of the death of the above baronet, from Brussels. He was born in 1785, and succeeded to the baronetcy on the demise of his uncle in 1831. Mr. Edward Haggerston, brother of the deceased, succeeds to the family honours and estates.

Letters report that Mr Charles Bagot's illness had assumed the most serious character. His complaint is said to be an affection of the lungs, produced by excited action of the heart, and causing great difficulty of breathing, with an almost total want of natural sleep. It was supposed that he had tendered his resignation by the last mail, and believed that he would not live to receive Lord Stanley's answer.

BOCKET HALL.—Viscount Melbourne continues to improve in health, and is daily to be seen either walking or taking carriage drives in the Park. The Dowager Lady Ilo land, who had been visiting the noble viscount for some days, left on Saturday last for town. Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston departed the same day also for the metropolis. Lord and Lady Beauvale, Mr. George Lamb, and Mr. Milbank are still staying with his lordship. The Hon. Mr. Cowper, who has been making visits in Rutlandshire and Norfolk, was expected to arrive shortly.

ACCIDENT TO LORD WORSLEY, M.P.—We understand that the above noble lord is suffering from injuries he received last week by being thrown from his horse when out hunting. It appears his lordship's horse fell upon him, by which he received some contusions, which happily are not so serious as was at first anticipated.

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—It is understood that the Earl of Northesk will shortly be united to Miss Elliot, eldest daughter of the Hon. Rear-Admiral Elliot, and niece to the Earl of Minto.

The Grand Duke of Hesse Darmstadt has conferred the Grand Cross of the order of Philip the Generous on Baron C. M. de Rothschild, son of Baron Charles de Rothschild.

Lord Ranelagh and Mr. B. Cochrane, M.P., have returned from their visit to Bourges, where they were extremely were received by the royal prisoners. These gentlemen, it is said, give a very enthusiastic account of the eldest son of the Prince of Asturias, who is represented to be a young man of great spirit and acquirements, and only requiring a field in which to distinguish himself.

The property of the late Lord Hill has, it is stated, been distributed among his relatives very judiciously. Annuities of £100 a year each are left to the children of his late brother, Colonel Hill. A sum of £2000 is given to the eldest son of Sir Francis Hill; and to his other numerous nephews and nieces he has left £1300 each. He has left £2000 to his aide-de-camp, Col. Egerton; and the estate and mansion of Hardwick to his nephew, now Viscount Hill.

THE APPROACHING LONDON SEASON.—As regards the fate of the approaching season the deepest anxiety has long prevailed amongst the numerous branches of trade in this great metropolis, part cularly amongst those engaged in the manufacturing and vending of articles of luxury for the higher classes. In this feeling we have deeply sympathised, knowing not only how ingeniously, but also with what labour, are produced those articles destined to figure in the world of pleasure—and what deep distress prevails, even when the London season is but curtailed of a month of its usual duration. We need scarcely remind our readers that the interesting event which will so happily add to the hopes of the nation and to the objects of her Majesty's domestic affections, is only expected towards the month of May. Until then, and for at least a month after, the court of her Majesty will be obliged to restrict the circle of royal hospitality, and society will be deprived of that impulse which our Sovereign has habitually given to pleasure, no less with the view to the social benefit of the industrious classes than to the more ephemeral recreation of their superiors. Under these circumstances we are happy to be able to give currency to the rumour prevailing in the highest regions of society, that it is her Majesty's intention to hold the drawing-rooms during the season—seconded by the ever-ready efforts of the most amiable Prince, the royal consort. As regards soon a plan being adopted we entertain little doubt, being fortified in that belief by Majesty, who has so often and so generously proved her deep interest in the welfare of the trade of the metropolis, will not forget their interests under circumstances so threatening to their best hopes. As to the limitation as lady we alluded to we consider her being chosen to represent her Majesty to be the most likely an occasion of the recent and auspicious removal from the court of a certain well-known lady whose assiduity in the levee of his recovery, in tends to send him to Botalem Hospital.

Morning Post.

Her Majesty's royal bounties were distributed on Monday and Tuesday to upwards of 800 poor, old, and distressed persons, residing in and about London, who had been previously recommended by the clergy, nobility and gentry, residing in the various parishes. The bounty is limited to persons who are above the age of 60 years, and the exception to the rule is made in favour of the blind, and those who are afflicted with severe bodily infirmity. The royal bounties, or persons, each receiving thirteen shillings, were also distributed. These bounties were distributed by Joseph Hanly, Esq., secretary and yeoman of her Majesty's armonry, under the immediate orders of his Grace, the Lord Archbishop of York, lord high almoner.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

LORD STANLEY, AND THE LEADERSHIP IN THE LORDS.—On the retirement of Lord Hill from the House Guards, and the appointment of the Duke of Wellington as his successor, we stated, on the credit of an authority worthy of regard, that the Duke would not, as he ought not, retain the post of government leader in the Lords with that of head of the army as commander-in-Chief. We also stated it was contemplated by Sir Robert Peel, that the leadership in the Lords should be offered to Lord Stanley; who was to be created a peer, in order to give him a seat in that assembly. The propriety of such arrangement being adopted we shewed from a variety of circumstances, tending to make it desirable to the Premier, who would thus relieve himself in debate from the incumbrance of Lord Stanley's not unobtrusive "very Eyebalt," who had felt himself neglected, and even snubbed, by Sir Robert Peel in the House of Commons. Some of our contemporaries affected to despise, and others openly contradicted, the intention of such a move, and the affair slept. It is, however, now openly talked of in every club-house, and in all other circles in which politics are discussed, with the addition, that there exists a division in the Cabinet on the proposed move; Lord Aberdeen's pretensions to the post being supported by one section, and Lord Stanley's by another; and that the latter's party is the strongest. [We give the above as a mere rumour which we extract from the Globe.]

EXTRAORDINARY CASE OF POISONING OF SEVEN CHILDREN.—The following extraordinary case of poisoning of seven children, belonging to St. Saviour's Charity School, in the Borough, occurred on Tuesday morning, which in one instance has already terminated fatally, and the lives of six others have been put in great jeopardy. It appears that a boy named William Chambers, belonging to the school, who lives with his parents in Castle-street, in the Borough, was going thither, and on his way he picked up a small packet in the street, which contained a considerable quantity of powder of a yellowish cast. He took it with him to the school, and partook of some of it himself, and finding it to be sweet, he gave a portion of it to six others, named Westwood, Lester, Clark, Field, Wood, and Tallby, who also partook of it. On their leaving school, at 12 o'clock, the boys were severally taken ill with sickness and vomiting, and acute pains in the bowels. Alarm was excited, and they were questioned, when they acknowledged what they had been taking. Mr. Wood, surgeon, of Worcester-street, was immediately sent for, and a portion of the powder shown to him, which he pronounced to be arsenic. Prompt measures were adopted, and the usual antidotes administered, but Westwood having taken a greater quantity than the others, sunk under it, and expired in the latter part of the day. Chambers, the boy who found the powder, and another, named Lester, lie in a very dangerous condition. The four other boys, who had partaken more sparingly of it, are in a very exhausted state, although strong hopes are entertained that they will recover.

FIRES IN THE METROPOLIS.—On Tuesday evening, a few minutes before eight o'clock, an alarming fire broke out at No. 41, Doddington-grove, near the entrance of the Surrey Zoological Gardens, Kennington, the residence of Mr. E. F. Saville, the well-known comedian. The back-parlour, in which the fire originated, together with the whole of the furniture, was completely destroyed; the flames had also burnt through the ceiling to the room above, which was much damaged. Mr. Saville and family were from home at the time. An infant son of Mr. Saville narrowly escaped death by suffocation. The damage on the present occasion is estimated at £200.—George Austins, who resided at Ford's-folly, Battersea, expired on Tuesday morning in St. George's Hospital, through his clothes catching fire on Sunday last, whilst standing before the fire at his house at Battersea. Before the flames could be extinguished he was burnt in a shocking manner in some parts of the body, almost as black as a coal. Everything was resorted to that the nature of his case admitted of, but he never rallied.

FIRE IN ALBEMARLE-STREET.—Considerable alarm was occasioned in the neighbourhood of Piccadilly by the outbreak of a fire, which at first threatened most serious consequences, on the premises of Mr. Robert Keate, surgeon, No. 15, Albemarle-street, opposite the St. George's Hotel, which was destroyed by fire some time since. The fire was first discovered by some of the domestics, who being alarmed by crackling noise in the rooms on the fourth story, went up to ascertain the cause, and on opening the door of the back room, found it to be in flames. The engines having promptly arrived, the damage was confined to the apartments in which it commenced.

COURT OF ALDERMEN.—A court of aldermen was held on Tuesday for the discharge of important public business previous to the Christmas recess. The companies of patten-makers, cutlers, and merchant tailors attended the court, when, by consent of all parties, Frss. Fuller, Esq., and H. F. Gadsden, Esq., were translated from the two former to the latter company. The police committee presented a report recommending the appointment of two proper persons as inspectors of weights and measures, in co-operation and assistance with the wardmote inquests, which was agreed to, and the committee instructed to prepare a statement of duties, and to consider of the salary to be allowed. The court, on a report from the same committee, agreed unanimously to admit Mr. T. Brewer to the freedom of the city, as the gift of the court, in approbation of his services connected with the corporation in situations filled by him. They also agreed to allow Mr. Robert Jackson £25, in consideration of the accident he sustained in the procession on Lord Mayor's day. Mr. F. A. Meyar on his petition, and a report from a committee in his favour, was agreed to be admitted one of the twelve alien brokers. Mr. Buchanan was admitted an attorney of the sheriff's court. Wm. Pritchard, Esq., lately elected bailiff of Southwark, attending, made the usual declaration, and was sworn and admitted into that office. The inquests of Farringdon-within, St. Andrew, Holborn, and St. Bride, presented non-freemen, disorderly houses, and other nuisances, on which the court directed proper measures to be taken, under the directions of the aldermen of the wards and the chamberlain, to remedy the same.

FREAKS OF A MANIAC.—On Monday forenoon, an Italian of the name of Scala Della Dominica, recently an officer in the army of Mehemet Ali, made a most singular attempt to disable himself by cutting off his toes, to overcome, he said, "the charms of the priests, who wanted to get rid of him." He had lately been lodging in Newland-place, Pimlico, and though considered to be of weak intellect, was known to be able to take care of himself and his property until the event above alluded to occurred. At two o'clock, Mr. Turner, surgeon, of Coventry-street, called upon him according to appointment, to transact some business in which they were mutually concerned, and was surprised at seeing as he entered the room a pool of blood upon the floor. The lunatic (for he is now called one) was sitting on the carpet grasping a razor, round the handle of which he had bound a towel, and again covered it with string, saying, as he pointed to his feet, "You see what I have done." His friend remarked that he had severed one of the toes, and that blood was flowing copiously from the wound. He then said that he would cut off the other, but before he had time to carry his threat into effect, the razor was taken from him, and he was prevented from doing himself further injury. He gave as a reason for his strange conduct, that he knew if he had been his little toes it would put an end to the charms of the priests, who wanted to get rid of him. The blood having been stanched, he was taken to St. George's Hospital, but it is feared that lock-jaw will come on. Mr. Pollock, the house surgeon, under whose care the man now remains, has no doubt of his recovery, and of the event of his recovery, intends to send him to Betslem Hospital.

On Wednesday night, a fatal accident occured at Fresh Wharf, London-bridge, to James Anderson, aged 45, mate of the schooner Celerity. He had been spending the evening with some friends, and on his return on board was proceeding, in footing, and fell into the river. Drags were immediately procured, and in a few minutes succeeded in finding his body, which was conveyed to a public-house adjoining. A surgeon promptly attended, who used every exertion to restore animation for upwards of three hours without effect. There was a severe cut on the forehead, which it is supposed he had received in falling.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

A commission of lunacy was held at the Green Man Hotel, Blackheath, on Monday last, to inquire into the state of mind of Mrs. Ann Sturrock, wife of Captain Starrock, R.N. After hearing the evidence the jury found that the unfortunate lady had been incapable of managing her own affairs since the 18th of November.——Robert Orm, a private in the 80th regiment, who was found guilty some time ago, at Chatham, of having attempted to murder a non-commissioned officer in the same corps, has been removed on board the hulks previous to his undergoing his sentence of transportation for life.——Robert Moir, formerly a merchant, who was convicted before the High Court of Justiciary at Edinburgh, last week, for fraudulent bankruptcy, and sentenced to transportation, has since died from the effects of an illness under which he had been labouring for some time before his trial.——A respectable female, named Mary Baker, committed suicide by drowning at Uxbridge a few days ago.——It is thought that a clue has at length been found to the sacrilegious miscreants who robbed Chertsey Church some time ago. One man was apprehended near Staines, endeavouring to dispose of a sacramental cup in a disfigured condition.——Mr. John Edwards, a butcher, of Little Surrey-street, Blackfriars-road, fell down in a fit on Monday last and suddenly expired. ——A few days ago a cellarman named Dunn, in the employment of a wine-merchant in Panton-street, Haymarket, missed his footing whilst cleaning some windows, and, although the fall to the ground was very slight, he was killed on the spot.——Sergeant Allen of the S division whilst on duty in Wilham-street, was suddenly seized with a spitting of blood, and one of his men coming up at the time, called for assistance and ran for a surgeon. The poor fellow was removed to his residence in Little Charles-street, but died almost immediately. ——A stout elderly gentleman, apparently about 50 years of age, was observed to stagger as if intoxicated, and to reel against the iron railings just opposite the Post-office in St. Martin's-le-Grand. The unfortunate man appearing to rally a little, he was put into a cab, and the driver was directed to get as fast as possible to the address found upon him, 5, Gravercstreet, Kennington-cross, but on his arrival there he was insensible, and died before the cab had been discharged from the door.——The rate-payers of the parish of St. George the Martyr, Southwark, on Wednesday to elect a Vestry-clerk, when four candidates were put in nomination. The show of hands was in favour of Mr. Day, an active and intelligent parishioner; but a poll was demanded on behalf of the others, who are, we believe, lawyers. We heartily wish Mr. Day success.——The Board of Admiralty have sent £100 to the widow of a fisherman at Hastings, who was run down in his trawl-boat by her Majesty's steamer Rhadamanthus.——James Bevenham, a stable-man, in the employment of a livery-stable-keeper, residing in Russell-mews, Russell-square, died a few days ago in consequence of having received a splinter in his thumb, which brought on lock-jaw.——On Wednesday night, between nine and ten, an explosion of gas took place on the premises of the Norwood Cemetery Company, No. 70, King William-street, City, which was nearly attended with loss of life, one man who had the care of the premises having been dreadfully injured. Upwards of fifty panes of glass were also broken by the concussion.——The supply of delicacies in the metropolis for the Christmas festival is greater than on any previous occasion, and Covent-garden market has more the appearance of Spring than of December. The mildness of the weather, however, will prove a most serious detriment to the butchers and poulterers.——Her Majesty the Queen has sent £20 to the Venerable Archdeacon Thorp, in furtherance of the project for erecting a monument to the memory of Grace Darling.——The hamlet of Novette, in Savoy, has been almost entirely reduced to ashes, upwards of sixty houses, including the parsonage, having been burnt down, leaving 100 families without shelter or bread, as the whole of their harvest, which was in the barns, has also been consumed. The church is much damaged, and narrowly escaped total destruction.——A twopenny-post-boy, named Neale, was thrown from his horse in the Walworth-road, and died soon after, in consequence of the injuries he received.——The "giant fight," so much talked of in the lower circles, came off on Tuesday last near Gravesend, when, after thirty-eight rounds, the American mammoth was declared the victor.——A poor man, named Coldwell, attended prayers at the Catholic chapel at Cheltenham, and was found in a kneeling posture, immediately after the service, a corpse. A coroner's inquest was held next day, when the jury found that the deceased had "Died from want of the common necessaries of life."

An extraordinary fire occurred on the road near Gloucester last week, when a waggon, laden with hops, grocery, and drapery, was totally consumed. The affrighted horses galloped along the road for several miles, to the great dismay of the beholders.——The Admiralty Court have awarded £1200 and costs to the crews of three fishing-smacks, for saving the Louisa, a French vessel, which was found abandoned in the North Sea, with a cargo and property to the amount of £4000.——A meeting of the members of the Living Model Academy took place on Monday evening, among whom were W. Collett, M.P., W. Etty, R.A., &c. The report of the state of the society's funds was highly favourable, and votes were passed to employ a sum of money towards making a variety of improvements for the future comfort of the models.——A meeting was held at Glasgow on Wednesday, for the purpose of taking steps towards the erection of a marble statue to the memory of the late Mr. Kirkman Finlay. A committee was formed for furtherance of the object.——Accounts from all parts of the country state that the crops of wheat promise to be much earlier than usual next year, and productive of a very plentiful harvest.——Several cases of suicide occurred during the week, which it is lamentable to state have been entirely attributable to the want of the common necessaries of existence. A poor old woman named Foskett, upwards of 70 years of age, cut her throat last Tuesday rather than apply for parish relief.——The new Royal Exchange stands in three parishes, and the Queen's Head in five, St. Michael's and St. Bartholomew's included. The Bank, in the most handsome manner, gives one hundred pounds to the parish officers of each of those five parishes, to be distributed on Christmas-eve among the poor.

POSTSCRIPT.

Friday Night.

WINDSOR, Thursday.—Her Majesty and H.R.H. Prince Albert took their usual walking exercise. The prince hunted with his harriers, attended by Major General Wemyss, Sir E. Bowater, and Mr. Anson. They met at Shakerswell, had a capital run, and killed, after forty minutes' good pace. In addition to the royal suite, the field consisted only of the neighbouring yeomen and farmers. The Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal have been taken out in the pleasure grounds. The Duke of Well. ington took his departure for Strathfieldsaye. Her Majesty has commanded that a baron of beef, according to "the good old English custom in baronial halls and country seats," shall be the chief dish at the royal banquet at the castle on Christmas-day. A splendid baron, weighing nearly two hundred and fifty pounds, has been selected for the occasion from Mr. Adams, one of the purveyors of meat to her Majesty's household. The baron will be conveyed to the cuisine in matters of "good and substantial eating." The baron is nearly four feet in length, and upwards of two feet wide—"a manly dish," in short, worthy to "set before the Queen." This enormous joint is to be roasted to-morrow, and placed upon the banquet table cold.

ADMIRAL SIR JOHN LINDFORD, K.C.B. This much-respected brave old officer breathed his last on the 22d instant, after a few days' illness, at the age of about 86 years, 65 of which he had been a commissioned officer in the navy, and served as first-lieutenant of the Nymrod, of 98 guns, in the battle of the 12th of April, 1782, that ship being Lord Rodney's second astern on that day.

The Bishop of Winchester has prohibited the performance of sacred music in churches within his diocese for other than devotional purposes.

The Lord Chancellor leaves town to morrow for his seat, Turville, near Maidenhead, where the noble and learned lord, we understand, intends to pass the Christmas recess.

DEATH OF THE DOWAGER LADY CARYSFOR.—We have to announce the death of this venerable lady, at an advanced age—her 86th year. She was the Lord Chancellor's daughter of the Right Hon. George Grenville, and grandaunt of the Duke of Buckingham. She was the second wife of the first Earl of Carysfort, whom she married in 1787, and by whom she had several children—three daughters, and a son, who died in his first year.

The Hon. Mr. Butler was held to bail, at the Marylebone police-office on Thursday for having charged an attorney's clerk, who went to serve him with a writ, with a gun and bayonet. The unfortunate prosecutor, who has been more dead than alive ever since, swore that the accused threatened to shoot him, by which he was dreadfully frightened, and he thereupon ran away as hard as he could.

The Antigua papers last received report the existence in that island of "a great deal of fever, some instances of which have been fatal in their results." Forty-seven of the officers and crew of her Majesty's ship Tweed had been attacked by it, and one officer and a man had died. The weather was very sultry.

On Saturday morning Mr. Waite, a gentleman of property, residing in Mount-street, Mile-end road, waited on the Income-tax commissioners to appeal against his assessment, and on his return home he took suddenly ill and died almost instantaneously.

FOREIGN GEESE AND TURKEYS.—Large quantities of these have, for the Christmas season, been introduced the last few days into Leadenhall and Newgate markets, but, which, from the close manner in which they have been packed, by which they have become bruised, and, in fact, of the weather, have turned out quite green and unfit for food. Great numbers have been removed at night, and thrown away as offal, as the stench has proved quite offensive to the salesman and purchasers. Geese and turkeys of a superior quality may be obtained at a very cheap price, whilst those of good quality are proportionably dear.

SAVINGS BANK CHARITY.—Mr. Hardwick, on taking his seat at the Marlborough-street Police-court yesterday (Thursday), said it gave him the highest gratification to announce the receipt of a letter from the Russian Ambassador, Baron Brunnow, enclosing the munificent donation of £25, to be distributed amongst the poor of that district in order to enable them to have a merry Christmas.

The body of the man supposed to have been murdered at Clesson's Bridge, Dublin, was, on Wednesday, identified by his brother. His name was Theodore Lynch, a clerk in the Ordnance office in the PHŒNIX Park. His brother, on opening the box mentioned in the article, as he brought away his razors from his home early on the morning of his death. The people about the neighbourhood are not disposed to credit this opinion, as they have long considered themselves to think that the fated young man deliberately took off his coat, waistcoat, hat, and neckcloth, and, after concealing them, lay down on a burning limekiln and cut his throat. It is, however, a gratification to have a cause for hoping that a murder of so sanguinary a character as this appeared to be has not been committed in a neighbourhood in which the Italian was murdered in February 1841.

ALMOST DESTRUCTIVE FIRE IN LIVERPOOL.—On Thursday morning a most alarming and disastrous fire broke out in the extensive tar and turpentine distillery of Messrs. Platt, Son, and Casson, situate in Greenhanway-street, and running back nearly to Parliament-street, in the south end of Liverpool. The premises contained a great deal of ground; and large yards adjoining the building were filled with empty and full barrels of tar, turpentine, rosin, oils, and other high y inflammable materials. Two large warehouses stood contiguous to the distillery, to where the fire soon communicated itself; and they, together with some buildings of minor importance, soon got a prey, with their valuable contents, to the fierceness of the flames, and so rapid was their progress, that there was no time to save anything beyond the books and papers belonging to the firm. In addition to the offices used by Messrs. Platt and Co. in their business, the adjoining warehouses contained large quantities of cotton and hemp; and large yards adjoining the building were filled with empty and full barrels of tar, turpentine, rosin, oils, and other high y inflammable materials. The fire is stated to be owing to one of the workmen taking a lighted stick to see if one of the tanks of turpentine was full, which, accidentally falling out of his hand into the liquor, of course set the whole of the building in a flame instantly. The loss to the Messrs. Platt and Co., who are the oldest and most respectable firm in Liverpool in their line of business, that of tar and turpentine distillers, though insured for a large amount, will be very considerable; persons well informed on the subject have estimated the value of buildings, goods, machinery, &c. destroyed at from £60,000 to £70,000. The wind was blowing fresh from the south-west at the time of the outbreak, and carried the black smoke that arose from the ruins quite across the town, at times producing almost total darkness.

The packet ship Europe arrived at Liverpool yesterday, but her dates from New York are the same as we received by the Acadia steamer, which were to the evening of the last instant.

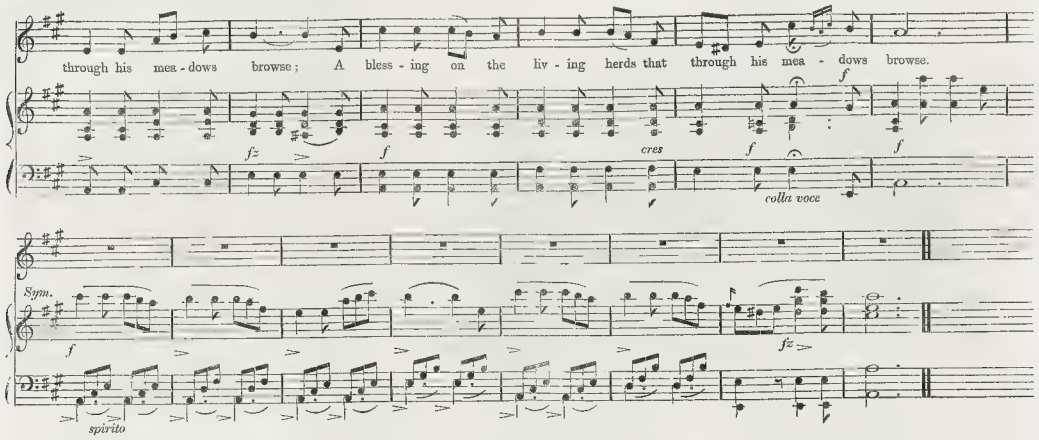
HALL STREET



A blessing on the peasant's home, the cottage of the poor,
The housewife by its churning-mill, the urchins at its door;
On the little idle glowing group that by the roadside lurk,
On the weary father whistling home his happy way from work!

A blessing on the squire's house, the ancient home of pride,
That hath wassail in its cheerful hall, and charity beside;
From one who, greeting rich and poor with free ungrudging hand,
Still keeps a glowing English heart, the boast of English land!

A blessing on the lord's domain, the spacious, fair, and free,
The deer that skim the waving park, the steeds that prance the lea;
But most on him, whose tenants round but prove the happy strife,
Of how much human love a lord may kindle into life!

ANNUALS.

FRIENDSHIP'S OFFERING.

"I give you all—I can no more,
Though poor the 'Offering' be."—
Yet 'tis worth millions, if you judge
By what it has cost me!

My wife—ah yes—I part with her
As friendship's sweet reward,
I've got her in a line to go
Upon her own ac-cord!—

And that half-crown you're pulling out
Still leaves me, Bill, no pull—
I'm letting a whole tigress go
For only half-a-bull!

Farewell, and of your bargain, boy,
Long live you to be proud,
You've only given half-a-bull
To have your spirit cowed!

FRIENDSHIP'S OFFERING.

THE BOOK OF BEAUTY.

"My pretty blue belle"—I am going to tell
Of the beautiful book which you edit so well,
With your own sweet face as the frontispiece dear,
And your pen in your mouth, love, instead of your ear!

Who would not be a goose now—to have such a quill
For your red lips to hold so remarkably still;
With ink like your spirit—uncommonly blue,
And a feather to fly with—though not, love, from you!

Your eyes shed such light on your beautiful phiz,
That at last your wise owl has a twinkle in his!
You're a Queen—fair advised by the sagest of sages,
With a book in whose prison you shut up your pages!

Most sublime are your looks—lady editor—when You are having resort like a sheep—to your pen
And your book may be grand—but in you I behold
The true Book of Beauty that I long to fold!

FORGET-ME-NOT.

FORGET-ME-NOT.

Forget me not! Don't leave me here,
Imprisoned for Love's gentle thievings,
I thought I was too TAKING far
Ever to be among your leavings.

Forget me not—this is indeed
An awkward hole for lover's dodging,
I've oft admired the chimney board
But can't endure the chimney lodging!

Forget me not—ambition's voice
Aided by love's may spur my fate,
But still I've no desire to claim
Such close alliance with the great!

Forget me not—I'm like one pledged
To you—alas and by you too;
But, dearest, though you've popped me here,
Pray do not keep me up the flue!

THE KEEPSAKE.

Yes, I've found it—it's true like a ship in a squall,
And far less addicted to bat than to bawl,
But you know what to darling humanity's due
So I've brought the sweet babby uncradled to you!

'Tis a Keepsake—you know sir—and year upon year
You will find it, I promise, becoming more dear.
Never let it catch cold—though mamma may have smiled
When she ask'd you one day for a draft upon Childe.

No no—keep this keepsake as sweetest of sweets,
He's a dear little annual—though not stitched in sheets,
And you can if he wants a profession you know
Bring him up to the long robe—he came to you so!

Educate him so neatly—that he must be one
Of a million who takes the shine out of your son!
Then when you've done all that a father can do,
Let him spend your fortune and he'll do for you!

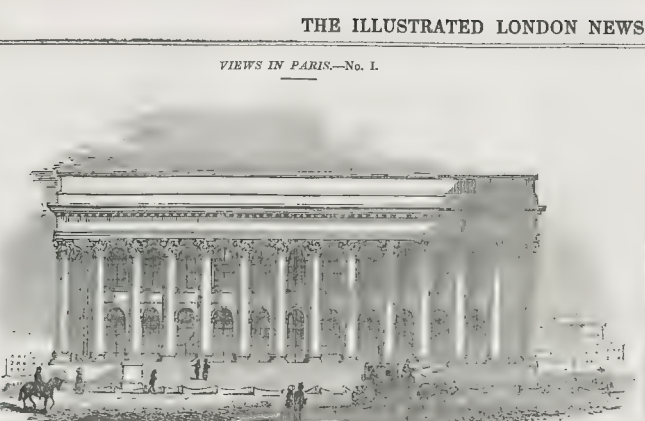
VIEWS IN PARIS.—No. I.



VIEW OF THE PARIS EXCHANGE AND TRIBUNAL OF COMMERCE.

THE PARIS EXCHANGE AND TRIBUNAL OF COMMERCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The artist of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS gives an accurate notion of the ensemble of this magnificent structure, which includes both the exchange for commercial and financial affairs and the court which has to do with the actions arising out of disputes of trade and unpaid bills. The Parisian merchants and traders formerly assembled in a saloon appertaining to the ancient treasury, then in one of the wings of the Palais Royal, and subsequently in a provisional room in the Rue Feydeau. The present edifice is due to Napoleon, and the first stone was laid 24th March, 1808, on the site of the old convent of the Filles St. Thomas. Brongniart was the first architect, and Labarre completed it. Our view is taken from the angle of the square on the side of the Rue Vivienne, and develops the façade and the perspective of one of the sides. It is certainly one of the first buildings in Paris. It presents a parallelogram 212 feet long and 126 broad, and the four fronts comprise sixty-four columns of the Corinthian order, reaching the second story. This forms an imposing colonnade on each side of perfect proportions. A peristyle of fourteen columns in the principal front, with an ascent of sixteen steps, occupies the entire breadth of the façade. The Bourse or Exchange itself is thus raised on a sub-basement overlooking the adjacent houses. Follow your correspondent into the interior:—Leave your cane, umbrella, or arms, if you have any, with the concierge or porter, and being without a casquet or blouse, caps and smock-frocks being prohibited in the Bourse costume regulations, you will perceive before you a grand staircase, with a wrought bronze balustrade, leading to the Tribunal of Commerce, which we will visit presently; but first let us enter the spacious hall, 116 feet long and 75 broad, capable of holding 2300 persons—this Ralto where "merchants most do congregate"—these gambling arenæ—this tripot worse than the defunct Frascati's or Palais Royal gaming-houses. It is two o'clock—the hour of business is commencing. There is at the extremity of the hall, which, by the way, is covered in with an iron roof, with windows in the upper compartment, lighting the interior of the establishment, a raised wooden platform, with a railing. This is called the Parquet. Within this magic circle is an internal ring, round which are seen a number of men, with pencil and pocketbook, gesticulating and shouting with great energy. These are agens de change, or stockbrokers, who pay a large sum to be privileged to act in that capacity, the number being limited. They are buying and selling stock, and the crier is shouting out the prices as the bargains are concluded. Presently you will perceive one of these brokers approach the outer railing and retire mysteriously to some individual whose anxious look betrays him as the speculating client of the broker. Stand for a moment amidst the outside group. What is you hear? "Louis Philippe is dying. Prince Metternich is dead. War between England and France. Pigeon expresses from London with great fall of the English funds. The Duke of Bordeaux is about to marry the Czar's daughter, and Russia is to invade France for a third restoration. The Ministry is going out. The English ran the Formidable on shore off Barcelona, on purpose to aid Espartero against the insurgents, and the cunning British commander selected the softest bed of sand to lump upon. The Viceroy of Egypt is again to invade his liege lord, and the Isthmus of Suez is to be cut off for the English, as a channel of communication for the overland India mail. Perfide Albion! Canaille des Anglais!" &c. Well, you now hear the exclamations, and you rub your eyes, and ask if you are awake, or what the world has come to? You are between agio-monkeys and high speculators, the jobbers and the public. The varying prices of the securities, foreign and colonial, regulate the mystery. Do you remark that short, thin-set man, with quick rolling grey eyes; he is an agent à coulisse, a spy of the Minister of the Interior, who writes a daily report of what he can fish up at the Bourse, till the half-past three o'clock bell announces that the parquet business is over. Now you will remark that a dense mass of persons crowd into a corner of the hall, and you hear the cry of "Je vends 3000 à 79f. 15c.," and you see his neighbour give an acquiescent or negative nod: these are the small dabblers in the funds for the account of the cafés Contiguous. These individuals formerly assembled at Tortoni's, then emigrated to the Café de Paris, then crossed the Boulevards to the Café Anglais, were turned out of there by the Minister of the Interior as not being a licensed club, and now they take refuge in the avenue of trees in the square of the Bourse till the parquet opens, and at the close of the latter resume their imaginary buyings of stock until four o'clock and sometimes après. If there be an evening in the ministerial evening papers, you will find them at the corner of the Rue Laffitout, exercising their exciting vocation with all the intensity of a Baden-Baden or Wiesbaden player. Do you see in another corner of the hall some muscular-looking men with tanned visages, walking with their limbs strangely wide apart: these are the celebrated Courriers de Commerce, the hardest-riding men in the world—men who will come to Paris in five days, without cessation, on horseback; men who will ride from Marseilles to Boulogne in sixty-five to sixty-eight hours; the carriers, in short, of commercial and banking firms, and of the London newspapers. Under the last column, as you promenade in the hall, you may hear a different language. Look up and you will see inscribed the name of the country which each column congregates. In grand round hand your eye to the roof. What are those magnificent basso-reliefs? They represent the four quarters of the globe; but go into the galleries, and you will, by close inspection, find that the apparently bas-reliefs are nothing but the images on the ceiling, a flat surface. The illusion is immense, and many a wager has been won, such is the perfect illusion of these admirable paintings. Whilst you are in the gallery look at the magnificent clock, raised on plate glass, which shows the time to the interior as well as the exterior of the Bourse; and if you remain after half-past three, you will see some fair ladies of the creation adorning the Exchange, for they are admitted in business hours, in consequence of the frightful gambling which they indulged in when admitted to the body of the hall. May I mention, par parenthèse, that the greatest gamblers in the stocks are the Parisians? You may see in this immense ring, looking all the world like a Jew vender of oranges? Do you perceive how he is bowed to on all sides? That is James Rothschild, the brother of the late Baronchild, and now the greatest financier in the world. If you can spare an hour, drop into the Tribunal of Commerce, composed of merchants and traders as judges, with a lawyer as a president. Listen to the pleadings of the counsel, or avrées, as they are called. The causes comprise everything relating to trade and commerce, bankruptcies, &c. If you have the good fortune to obtain an introduction to the commissary of the Bourse, M. Beaucesse de Richebourg, you will recognize a polite and intelligent gentleman of the ancien régime. He is charged with the safety and good conduct of the Bourse, and he writes a daily report to the various journals of the events and transactions of the day. Round his office you will find an assembly of antique looking gentlemen. These are rentiers or fund-holders, who amuse themselves during the hours of business by narrating the anecdota of the day. After all, the Bourse affairs are but chandler's-shop trade compared with the enormous business of the London Exchange. Everybody in France who buys and sells is a marchand, and the négociant is but a grade higher; but it is to be hoped that the new London Exchange will rival the architectural beauties of the Parisian Bourse. In my next I propose to take a peep at the Palais Royal; but permit me a passing reflection on the Bourse, for the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS is of no party; it recognizes the good, and it stigmatizes the bad, without reference to political colour—is it not deplorable, in a country like France, where so many generous qualities, although interspersed with so much frivolity, exist in the national character, to witness the strong increase of corruption and speculation in the higher and middle classes. The Bourse is now resorted to by Peers and Deputies, as well as bankers and merchants. Ministers are not exempt from the charge of working the telegraph for such jobbing purposes. Ambassadors have been proved, in the court of justice, to have participated in the money making principle of the day; and as for the employés of the Government, with their limited salaries they have no other resource but to play in the funds, in default of gaming-houses, now prohibited by the law, but which was the Parisian's resource in former days. The Bourse is now, in short, the centralized "hell" of all the abolished "hells!"

FOREIGN POLITICS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Dec. 21.

The political and diplomatic circles are agitated by two topics—the state of the Ministry, and the Spanish question. In respect to the former, there has been no change since my last letter. The Cabinet is still confident that it will weather the session. It has decided that there shall be a royal speech, embracing the home and foreign policy of the Ministry, so as to provoke a full discussion on the address, when the Opposition may try its hand, if it dares, at an amendment. This bold stand of M. Guizot will either secure him a vote of confidence or a glorious fall; but he expects, say his friends, the former. Count Molé is most active in his intrigues, but has met with but a sorry reception as yet. Marshall Valée, who commanded in Africa, is a candidate for ministerial honours, and hopes to be Minister of War under a Molé administration. The Dufaure-Passy party, or Left Centre, or, as we should call it, Moderate Liberal, fraction is now Molé's sheet anchor. We shall have plenty of manœuvres before the opening of the legislature.

The affair of M. Lesseps, as I have before informed you, has been very threatening, and may yet be productive of serious results. The Regent having accused the French Consul of participation in the insurrection, the Cabinet here has replied by giving the latter the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour, boldly denying the truth of the allegations brought against its diplomatic agent at Barcelona. Senor Hernandez, the Spanish Chargé d'Affaires, was summoned the other day to the Foreign Office, when M. Guizot spoke to the following effect:—"I am quite indifferent as to the attacks of the Spanish journals on the French Government; I care as little for them as I do for the gossip of the Puerta del Sal, but I cannot permit your chief to libel France." M. Guizot then quoted some words ascribed to Espartero, as having charged France with being an accomplice in the late insurrection in Barcelona, and concluded by formally demanding of Senor Hernandez that this language shall be disavowed by the Regent. This is as nearly as possible what has passed. It is quite false that the Regent has demanded the recal of M. Lesseps, and the latest despatches from Madrid announce that the Spanish Cabinet, having examined closely into his conduct at Barcelona, now disapprove of the hasty accusations of Senor Guttierez, the political chief of Barcelona, who accused the French consul of having fomented the insurrection and aided the insurgents. If Senor Guttierez cannot prove his case, he must be dismissed, and France will be justly entitled to some reparation from the Spanish Cabinet. The Lesseps affair is, however, not so much the peril. It is the state of the relations between England and France, which may be seriously compromised by the incessant bowls of the war party, with which, unfortunately, is now associated the one calling itself Conservative. It is certainly a circumstance of the present times that, go where you will in Paris, whether at the Bourse, in the foyers of the theatres, or the salons of society, nothing is talked of but a war between France and England. To be sure we are just on the eve of the session, when Louis Philippe likes to assume a belligerent attitude, to prove to his subjects that he is not the slave of Continetal Courts. In the Eastern question similar tactics were resorted to, and the war fever was kept up most by the Court organs; but, with a sensible nation like the French, this is dangerous policy, and a fearful result might follow the pandering to the worst passions of the populace. Another great danger to France is the system of double policy. There is the open announced one of the Cabinet, and there is the underhand one of the Court. This plan of action causes mistrust and suspicion and, if evil arises out of the Barcelona events, it will be attributable to the under-current in French intrigue which I alluded to in my last communication. I trust the present storm, like that of 1840, may blow over; but the Peninsula is much more perilous ground to debate upon, than the question of making the Mediterranean a French lake, as the French hoped to do, by giving supreme power to the Egyptian Viceroy.

Things theatrical and musical are lively. We have had a début at the Académie, in the person of Mademoiselle Fiesand, who won the first prize at the conservatoire for singing. Like the many candidates to replace Falcon, it was a failure, although her style was good, and she could boast of a certain intonation and brilliant execution. But the Falcon had dramatic power, and a register which comprehended the contralto as well as the soprano. Ragueneau made an indifferent Robert, for that was the opera in which Mdlle Flamand appeared; but Denis Gras and Levassar were both superb. In Halevy's "Charles the Sixth," now in rehearsal, there are two parts for Stoltz and Denis Gras. Duprez will play the King. Meyscher is making some changes in the "Prophet," to have the advantage of Baroilhet's talents in that new opera. Berlioz's "Bleeding Nun," the "Africaine," and the "Duc d'Albe," are accepted rivals for the French opera. Pontuer, the cooper and sweetest of tenors, has appeared after a triumphant tour. The negotiations for Fanny Elssler's return are talked of; but we shall soon have the ballet of the "Peri," with Burgauller's music. Auber's and Scribe's "Fainelli" will be out in a few days at the Opera Comique.

At the Odeon, Max, the ex Sub-prefect, has appeared in Racine's "Orestes," the great part of Talma. M. Max gains ground, as does Madame Duval, in classic tragedy, after being so long the melodramatic heroine. Rachel having ceased to draw, as the theatrical term is, at the Français, is studying Phèdre. Her Tredegonde, in Lonerner's stupid tragedy, was a passe. The Phèdre will be a grand test for Rachel, but her friends are confident. Her marriage with Count Walenski, M. Thiers's friend, is strongly rumoured. Count Walenski was to have been united to Mademoiselle Done, M. Thiers's sister-in-law, with a fortune of £16,000; but his liaison with Rachel has broken off the contract. At the Italiens we shall have Lablache in a new part, called Don Pasquale, a buffo opera, written expressly for him by Donizetti. Grisi, Mario, and Tamburini have characters in this new opera.

Jenny Lind, freed from the fatigue of a long opera, has been producing a great sensation by her singing of a bravura composed by Balfe for Malibran, as the finale of "The Maid of Artois." The intricacies mastered by Madame Viardot in this scena are marvellous. Ninths, elevenths, and all kinds of vocal jumps succeed each other in rapid succession with electrical effect. She gave this composition at Balfe's soirée and Mrs. Hampson's soirée, both charming concerts. Mrs. Hampson is an unrivalled warbler of Irish melodies: her pathos finds a way to the most stony-hearted Gallic heart, whilst it causes tears to flow from those who understand the words. Osry the violinist, Osborne the pianist, and Menbach the violoncellist, have been the delight of numerous musical reunions. The Count de Castellana will continue his amateur representations at the theatre in his hotel, assisted by the highest fashionables of the capital.

The Cirque Olympique has given us a new spectacle, "Prince Eugene and the Empress Josephine," the action of which passes between 1804 and 1814. We have the passage of Mount St. Bernard, the singing of "The Marseillaise" (in which the audience joins), the campaign in Italy, and the retreat from Moscow—we have Josephine in her little house in the Rue Chanteraine, then at the Tuileries, and, finally, at Malmaison, now inhabited by Christina. There is the revolt at Rome and the murder of the French ambassador, a glorious fight with brigands near Milan, and the battle of Smolensk. We have no less than three apotheoses—one realizing the fantastic review of the Champs Elysées, after Burger's ballad. We have the Queen Hortense and the mise en scène quite splendid. The costumes are accurate, many being original dresses of Napoleon's days. Lots of firing and charges of cavalry, and, after the fashion at poor Ducrow's, the horses are all writhing, the most intelligent performers.

EAST INDIA HOUSE.

On Wednesday a Quarterly General Court of Proprietors of India Stock was held at their house in Leadenhall-street, pursuant to the terms of the charter. The chair was taken at twelve o'clock, by Sir James Law Lushington, and the minutes of the last Court having been read,

Mr. David Salomons having been called upon, the Hon. Proprietor rose to bring forward the following motion, of which he had on previous Courts given notice:—"That there be laid before the Court of Proprietors an estimate of the expense incurred by the war in Affghanistan to the 31st of December, 1841. That there be laid before the Court of Propietors a statement of the amount of any loan or loans raised in India, with the rates of interest at which such loan or loans may have been raised since the commencement of the Affghan war. That the protest of Mr. Tucker, or of any other individual Director or Directors, against the Affghan war be laid before the Court of Proprietors. The Honourable Proprietor then passed a high eulogium on the conduct of the troops under the command of Generals Nott and Pollock, and more particularly the glorious defence of Jellalabad by Sir Robert Sale, to the conduct of whose heroic lady a greater part of our successes might be attributed. He next congratulated the court and the country on the change of policy which had taken place. The policy of Lord Auckland was a great blunder, and it was to the honour of the present Government that they had changed it. He knew that political questions ought not lightly to be entertained by that court; but in a question of this nature it was the duty of the Court of Proprietors to interfere, as that court was better fitted for the discussion of such questions than Parliament, and, notwithstanding that the war was at an end, the policy on which it had been unertaken ought to be discussed, for if it had been undertaken for European objects, the whole expense of it ought not to be thrown upon India alone. It was their duty to watch over the finances of India. In two years the revenue of India had been deficient five millions, and, knowing from what took place at the close of the Burmese war, there would be every probability of that deficit increasing. He concluded by moving the resolutions he had proposed be adopted. Mr. Lewis seconded the proposition.

Mr. Thomason said he would not enter into the question of the policy of the Affghan war. This subject had been discussed at great length in June last. As to the accounts moved for, the Court of Directors had them in an imperfect shape at present. As those accounts would be called for by Parliament, they would be made out completely, and then laid before the proprietors. As to the next question of the hon. proprietor, he (the chairman) could state that but one loan had been raised. To this five per cent. loan the subscriptions amounted to £3,800,000, and it was considered that it had already been sufficiently productive. With respect to the production of any protest against the Affghan war, made by any of the Court of Directors, that could not (as we understood the chairman to say) be produced. The motion of Mr. Salomons was then put and negatived.

Some conversation then took place about the Rajah of Sattara, whose case has been so often before the public, but the chairman deemed it irregular and the discussion was postponed until the 8th of February.

HILL COOLIES.—Mr. Jones inquired whether there was any truth in a statement which had been lately published in the Times newspaper, and extracted from the Bengal Hurkaru, relative to the condition of certain hill coolies who had returned to their native country? The chairman said there was no truth whatever in the statement, and that those hill coolies who had so returned were possessed of sums of money, which to persons in their circumstances amounted to a little fortune.

STATUE OF THE MARQUIS WELLESLEY.—Mr. Weeding inquired when the statue of the late Marquis of Wellesley would be placed in one of the niches of the court? The chairman, in reply, said that the work was progressing now satisfactorily, and he hoped it would be finished in a very short time.

THE RAJAH OF SATTARA.—Mr. Lewis inquired when the papers relative to this case would be printed? The chairman said they would be laid on the proprietors' table on the 8th of February. The court then adjourned.

His Majesty the King of Hanover and his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge have contributed to the fund raising to purchase an annuity for the centogenarian Louis Pouchée.

Wednesday last being St. Thomas's Day wardmotes were held throughout the city for the election of Common Councilmen; and in many of the wards the greatest excitement and anxiety prevailed amongst the rival parties to carry the election of their respective candidates.

ST. PAUL'S SCHOOL.—The distribution of the prizes took place on Tuesday. That for Latin lyrics was gained by Mr. Brien, and that for the best Latin prose translation, the subject being Lord Strafford's defence, from Hume, was claimed equally by Messrs. Vincent and Clay. After the prizes had been awarded the usual winter speeches were delivered, and most of the young gentlemen distinguished themselves in a manner that was highly creditable both to themselves and their tutors.

CHRISTMAS.

Of all the festivals which crowd the Christ an calendar, there is none that exercises an influence so strong and universal as that of Christmas; and those quaint customs and joyous observances which once abounded throughout the rural districts of England are at this period of the year so thickly congregated, or so strongly marked, as at this season of unrestrained festivity. The extended space of time over which this festival is spread the protracted holiday it creates—pointing it out for the gathering together of distant friends, whom the passing nature of an occasional and single celebration would fail to collect. The festival, although anciently celebrated by different churches in the respective months of April, May, and December, is now universally kept by every Christian denomination at this season. It is observed as a general holiday throughout England. As early as the twelfth century we have accounts of the spectacles and pageants by which Christmas was welcomed at the court of the then monarch, Henry II.; and from this period the wardrobe, rolls, and other household books of the English kings furnish continual evidences of the costly preparations made for this festival. The sanguinary wars between the rival houses of York and Lancaster distributed throughout a long period the mirthful celebration and the lavish profusion expended upon it. There is, however, a beautiful example of the sacred influence of this high festival recorded by Turner, in his "History of England." During the siege of Orleans, in 1428, he says, "The solemnities and festivities of Christmas gave a short interval of repose. The English lords requested of the French commanders that they might have a night of minstrelsy, with trumpets and clarions. This was granted, and the horrors of war were suspended by melodies that were felt to be delightful." The reign of Henry VIII. was one of jousts and pageants till it became a reign of blood, and accordingly the Christmas pageantries were then distinguished by increased pomp. The court celebrations of Christmas were observed in the reign of the first James, and Prince Charles himself was an occasional performer in the pageantries prepared for the occasion. In the early years of Charles's reign, the court pageants of this season were got up with extraordinary brilliancy — the king, with the lords of his court, and the queen, with her ladies, frequently taking parts therein. During the whole of this time the forms of court ceremonial were aped, and the royal establishments imitated as far as possible by the more powerful nobles, and the masques and pageantries exhibited for the royal amusement were accordingly reproduced at their princely mansions in the country. The sports and festivities of the season were everywhere taken under the protection of the lord of the soil; and all classes of his dependents had a customary claim upon the hospitalities which he prepared for the occasion.

THE THEATRES.

PRINCESS'S THEATRE.

While on the one hand there is a general outcry that the drama is in a hopeless decline, on the other new theatres on every side arise, giving the flat denial to such opinions. The fairy temple in Oxford-street has been lighted up, in order to afford the artists and a few friends of those connected with the establishment an opportunity of ascertaining the effect of the new curtain and act-drop (the former painted by Cuthbert, the latter by Tolbin), as well as the coup d'œil of the ensemble. To enter into a detail of the gorgeous beauty of decoration so profusely spread over this magic hall would at once fatigue our reader's patience, and render him suspicious of our veracity; let him, therefore, recal to his recollection the most brilliant and glowing description he may have read of that "House of Beauty," par excellence, "Al Hanbra," and he will then have some notion of the oriental beauty and grandeur of the Princess's Theatre. The house will open on the 26th inst., with the opera of "La Sonnambula," which will be followed by several new productions, chiefly operatic.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT-CHAT.

ROSSINI.—It is with considerable regret that we learn this great and original genius is in a most dangerous state of health. We trust that the splendid 'Stabat Mater' may not prove to be the exit song of the swan of Pesaro.

LA GIOVANNINA AUSTIN.—Another fair flower has been proudly added to the wreath of English minstrelsy abroad. The Italian journals speak in the most rapturous terms of this young vocalist's performances at the San Carlo of Naples, prognosticating that, at no very distant period, she will be the most brilliant cantatrice in Europe. Her voice is an extended and pure soprano of the most touching quality and of the very highest cultivation. Her face and figure are eminently suited to the stage, of which she is already a perfect mistress in the opinion of the severest dilettanti.

VESTRIS.—This veteran of the ballet died last week in Paris at a very advanced age. It seemed that his profession was predestined, for he was actually born behind the scenes on the 27th of March, 1760.

ANECDOTE OF LISZT.—During this great musician's visit to Dublin being at a recent morceau at the residence of the well-known harmonist Logier, and the conversation turning upon the difficulty experienced by most performers of accurately executing a compo ition at sight, the company were not a little astonished to hear Liszt underrate the extolled faculty, and declare that "what he could ever play he could play at once." Upon which Logier laughing replied, "Here is a composition of mine which I have just finished; it is à quatre mains for the piano-forte, but the prima and secondo are on different pages." "N'importe," said Liszt, "ce m'est égal;" and seating himself at an instrument played the duet, as the composer himself solemnly declared, without a single error, and in a far superior style of effect than he had imagined it capable of by two of the best performers after study.

COVENT GARDEN.—The Christmas piece at this theatre (the joint production of Messrs. Jerrold, Lemon, Mayhew, and a-Beckett) is to be named "Punch's Pantomime, or Harlequin King John." The witty contributors to the merry "Punch," provided they make their jokes practical (an essential in pantomime), will no doubt be as humorous on the stage as they invariably are on paper; but it is to be regretted that many a clever Christmas piece has failed for the want of this sine quâ "nihil."

M. BALFE.—The new opera by this adopted composer of the French is now in rehearsal at the Opera Comique, and will be produced about the middle of February.

CONFUCIUS.—Amongst the novelties set forth in M. Jullien's Chinese Quadrilles is an air composed of two notes by this celebrated philosopher. Little did the disciple of the great Fum-ho think that his "celestial" music should ever be desecrated by the performance of "barbarians" who pretend to a delicacy of muscular appreciation beyond gong-dinning noise and pig-tail monotony. Has M. Jullien any of the compositions of Mencius or any other lunatic melodist related to the sun and moon?

NEW VOCAL MUSIC.

BYGONE DAYS. A Ballad. The Poetry by a Young Lady. The Music by F. W. MEYMOTT, Esq. Mori and Lavenu.

This ballad (?) does great credit to the composer's musical skill and taste; the melody is pure, and the accompaniment correct and classical, with the exception of bar first, at the bottom of page 2, where the G sharp should be A flat. This, however, is an error which offends the eye more than the ear.

THE NIGHTINGALE TO THE ROSE, Nocturne. The Poetry by a Young Lady. The Music by F. W. MEYMOTT, Esq. Mori and Lavenu.

A graceful and flowing melody; with an accompaniment of more learning than is often to be met with in amateurs' composition.

MY ARAB MAID. Ballad. Written by Mrs. CRAWFORD. Composed by C. E. HORN. D'Almaine and Co.

This ballad in construction somewhat resembles the popular "Moorish Maid," by the same composer. The melody is graceful, and the accompaniment that of a master. Why do we not hear oftener of Horn? There are few writers of any country who could do better things in either instrumental or vocal composition. The words are pretty, but we object to such epithets as "My star-eyed fair"—"My Guisben rose!"

HIGHLAND NORA. A Ballad. The Poetry by Mrs. CRAWFORD. The Music by C. E. HORN. D'Almaine and Co.

This is a plaintive ballad, slightly and properly tinged with national character, but partaking more of the Irish than Scotch: probably the composer was influenced by the name of Nora, which is common amongst the fair Emeralders.

FELICE DONZELLA. Romance pour le Pianoforte. Par SIGISMOND THALBERG. D'Almaine and Co.

A delicious morceau, full of the great Pianist's peculiarities. The "Canto Marcato" is in the true romance style, and must be executed as played by his directions. The legato passage which immediately follows it is full of grace and feeling, and the resumption of the canto, as an inner part, with a staccato accompaniment, in the happiest vein of the author. The fanciful flittings which subsequently hover about it, like so many brilliant but evanescent corruscations of melodious light (we must go a little out of the way in metaphor to describe them), are beautiful attendants upon the tema, and are imagined in the highest inspiration of musical poetry. We recommend this Romance as one of the most charming of the author's productions.

RULE BRITANNIA. Arranged as a Rondo for the Pianoforte, and dedicated to the British Navy. By CHARLES CZERNY. D'Almaine and Co.

Although this majestic national air is somewhat stripped of its dignity by being treated with the familiarity of the Rondeau style, still it is done with so much grace, and so artfully interwoven with two other airs ("See the Conquering Hero" and "The British Grenadiers"), whose names do not appear on the titlepage, that it cannot but become a favourite morceau with all lovers of that elegant and artistical writing which characterises the works of Czerny. We strongly recommend it as being at once very brilliant without being over-difficult.

THE REAL SCOTCH QUADRILLE. Composed at Edinburgh expressly to commemorate the visit of her most gracious Majesty Queen Victoria to Scotland, 1842. By JULLIEN. D'Almaine and Co.

By Jullien! On ne dit pas Monsieur Ciceron—but no matter—these Quadrilles are admirably selected and arranged, and reflect great credit on M. Jullien's judgment and tact, particularly in the variations to the airs, some of which are excellent. They will, no doubt, be the rage in the ensuing season. By the way, did M. Jullien intend a pun by "The Real (reel!) Scotch Quadrilles"?

OUR DEAR FIRESIDE. Words by J. CLIFTON, Esq. Music by JOHN PARK. Park.

An air of little pretension for originality, particularly in its chorus, which is common-place, but likely to awaken pleasant associations in its performance. The accompaniment is here and there faulty, and deficient in the preservation of figure.

DREAM NOT OF ME. Ballad. Composed by CHARLES E. HORN D'Almaine and Co.

This is a truly elegant Ballad, or rather Canzonet; it is full of expressive melody, which is beautifully sustained and strengthened by a flowing and characteristic accompaniment.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

PRIZE MONEY.

HER MAJESTY'S SLOOP WANDERER.—The officers and crew of this vessel, when under the command of the Hon. Captain Denman, and engaged in the capture of the slave schooners Josephine and Pombaba, in May and July, 1840, will be paid the proceeds arising from a moiety of the hull and cargoes, and tonnage bounties, of these vessels, on the 29th instant, in the following proportions: Each only for the Josephine, £26 18s.; Commander, £12 9s. 8d.; first class, £34 4s.; second class, £20 10s. 6d.; third class, £11 9s.; fourth class, £6 16s. 6d.; fifth class, £3 8s. 6d.; sixth class, £2 5s. 6d.; seventh class, £1 2s. 9d.

HER MAJESTY'S SLOOP COLUMBINE.—A distribution of a moiety of the proceeds arising from the sale of the hulls and cargoes, &c. of the Portuguese brigs Dois Irmaos, Vigilante, and Bom Fim, is announced to be made on the 29th inst., in the annexed proportions, to the officers and crew of the Columbine, 16, being captures made by this vessel under Commander George Elliot, in November and December, 1839: Flag £180 8s.; commander, £339; first class, £109 1s. 5d.; second class, £65 8s. 9d.; third class, £33 14s. 6d.; fourth class, £21 16s. 3d.; fifth class, £10 8s.; sixth class, £7 5s. 6d.; seventh class, £3 13s. 6d.

HER MAJESTY'S BRIGANTINE LYNX.—The officers and company of this vessel who, under the orders of Commander Broadhead, captured in April, 1840, the Portuguese slave-schooner Olympia, are to be paid on the 29th inst. the following proportionate sums, being a portion of the proceeds of the hull and cargo of the vessel, and the bounty granted for slaves captured in their rich prize: Flag, £108 19s. 8d.; commander, £204 7s.; second class, £106 16s. 8d.; third class, £53 8s. 4d.; fourth class, £35 [illegible]. 11s. 1d.; fifth class, £17 16s.; sixth class, £11 17s. 6d.; seventh class, £5 5s. 0d.

HER MAJESTY'S BRIG, BUZZARD.—Another lot of prize-money is advertised to be distributed to the officers and company of this vessel, being the proceeds of the hull, cargo, and tonnage bounty of the Portuguese slave-schooner Adelaide, captured by the Buzzard, in April 1840, while under the command of their Acting Lieutenant, Walter J. Pollard. The proportions are—Flag, £19 7s. 5d.; commander, £36 6s. 9d.; second class, £18 3s.; third class, £9 1s. 7d.; fourth class, £6 1s.; fifth class, £3 0s. 6d.; sixth class, £2 0s. 4d.; seventh class, £1 0s. 9d.

The Marquis of Anglesea is to succeed the late Lord Hill in the colonelcy of the Blues: and Sir Edward Kerrison, from the 14th Light Dragoons, will succeed the noble marquis in the command of the 7th Hussars.

The 26th, 41st, and 49th Regiments have been placed under orders to return home. They are to leave India for this country about the beginning of February next. The 26th and 49th have proceeded from China to Bengal.

DEATH OF GENERAL SIR FREDERICK WETHERALL.—We are sorry to have to record the death of this gallant officer, which took place at Ealing, on Sunday last, in his 86th year. He entered the service in 1775, as an ensign of the 17th Foot, the colonelcy of which he held from 1830 up to his death, and has consequently been in the army upwards of 66 years.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

AN EMEUTE AT NORFOLK ISLAND.—A plan was laid by the boat's crew employed in unloading the Governor Phillip to take the schooner Coquette, but this was detected, and the parties were imprisoned on board. On the morning of the 21st June, at seven o'clock, the boat's crew were let out of the prison for the purpose of stowing the cargo of the launch, which was hanging to the stern of the brig. On reaching the deck, and seeing only two soldiers and the sergeant there, the crew took advantage of the absence of the other ten, of which the guard consists, and rushed on the other two sentries and threw them overboard; the sergeant immediately shot one of them, named Kelly, when he was knocked down by the others and severely wounded with a bayonet. One of the soldiers was drowned, and the other saved by a prisoner named Wolfe. The seamen were then ordered into the launch, except two, who were told to remain on deck, and one of them was placed at the wheel, with a prisoner, of the name of Moss, to assume the command. The captain with his officers happened to be below, but before they could proceed on deck the companion hatch was put on, the fore and main hatches were also battened down on the rest of the guard and crew, and the mutineers were thus in complete possession of the vessel, but without any arms, except the pistols and cutlasses taken from the two sentries. Shortly after they had taken the vessel, one of the party proposed to Captain Boyle to furnish them with provisions, water, arms, &c., on obtaining which they would give up the vessel to him and proceed to sea in the "island" launch; but he refused to comply with their proposals, as he knew that the vessel must ultimately fall into his hands again, the prisoners being without provisions and water, to obtain which they must necessarily expose themselves to the fire of the crew and military, who were well armed, and only waited for an opportunity to get on deck. Captain Boyle then broke the cabin scuttle, and watched for an opportunity of shooting the man at the wheel; and, by a well-directed shot, he at length succeeded, and killed him on the spot. On the fall of the two master spirits, the others told the seamen who were on deck that the ship was theirs again. The launch was taken off, and the ship's crew and the military rushed on deck; the latter fired on the surviving mutineers, killed three and wounded two mortally. The sergeant of the guard shot the corporal in the scuffle, mistaking him for one of the prisoners. The bodies of the killed presented a dreadful spectacle: one man's head was covered with blood and brains, and, but for the interposition of Captain Boyle, the whole of the prisoners would have been killed. The guard and crew consisted of twenty eight men, exclusive of officers; and it certainly says little for their vigilance or prowess that such an attempt could have been made with any chance of success by a handful of unarmed men. The total number of killed and wounded are—[illegible] men, one drowned and two wounded; seamen, one wounded; prisoners, five killed and two severely wounded. The seven remaining mutineers were fully committed to take their trial for murder and piracy. From the Hobart Town Paper.

The two great present five vessels in the East India, West India, Levant, and Mediterranean trades, for the island of Heligoland have been ordered to be fitted out expeditiously as Mail ships. Two of these have already received their orders to be ready to receive the mails and passengers from India and China here on the 25th of the month, and thence forward as at present. Captain Lowe, R.N., is to be appointed to the command of the Oriental, one of the two ships which will leave Southampton on the 25th of January next. The Oriental is a fine vessel of 1,800 tons burthen, and is now lying in the East India Docks. She is expected at Suez, from Calcutta, &c., on February 10.

THE HINDOSTAN STEAM SHIP. Letters from the commander and some of the passengers of this steamer have been received in town, dated October 23, off the Island of Ascension, advising their arrival there all well. The Hindostan, after replenishing her stock of fuel there, by taking on board a quantity of patent fuel from the Government store, would proceed to her next stage, the Cape of Good Hope, and thence to the Mauritius, Ceylon, Madras, and Calcutta, steaming the whole distance from England to India. She is expected at Suez, from Calcutta, &c., on February 10.

Tell me the hour—
The sweet sad hour,
When thou art resign'd
To mem'ry's pow'r—
When thy lip is not wreath'd
With affected mirth,
And thy words are not breath'd
For the dull cold earth!
When thy heart-drops are wept,
And thy fancies receive,
Fresh sweetness of thought
From the tears that they leave!
Tell me that hour,
That lonely hour—
I'll then be pilgrim,
Sweet saint, to thy bow'r!

II.

Tell me the hour
The sweet, sad hour—
When thou art all rapt
In music's pow'r!
When thy lute is not strung
For the cold or gay—
And thy spirit hath flung
Its light mirth away!
When thy soul is subdued
Into twilight repose,
And ray soft voice is heard
Like the sigh of a rose!
Tell me the hour
That lonely hour—
I'll then be a pilgrim,
Sweet saint, to thy bow'r!—W.

TO THE SAME.

You know the legends of that sweet lake,*
Where a Prince forsook the world to dwell
In those wat'ry bow'rs that the Naïads make Deep, far away from the surface-swell!

I dreamt we were there, and your sad pale smile
Was upward turned to a lonely isle,
That gleam'd in the morning sunshine fair,
And you wept as you fix'd your dark eye there!

And you murmur'd a word:—it was "Happiness"—
'Tis always methinks a mournful sound,—
But sigh'd in your languid loveliness,
A sweeter sorrow could not be found!

I watch'd the word as it upward flew
On the wings of your breath to the outside-wave,
And saw it expire:—on the misty blue
Of the fair Loch Lena it found its grave!

Alas! and can the world's distress
Blight e'en the name of happiness?—W.

CEREMONY OF THE BOAR'S HEAD AT CHRISTMAS.

The boar's head, sound, was anciently the first dish on Christmas-day, and was carried up to the principal table in the hall with great state and solemnity. Hollinshed says, "That in the year 1170, upon the day of the young prince's coronation, King Henry I. served his sonne at table as sewer, bringing up the boar's head with trumpets before it, according to the manner."

CHRISTMAS IN SWEDEN.

The period of the festivities of Christmas, which continues in Sweden till the 6th of January, is dedicated to universal rejoicings. Presents are made, the receivers of which are required to guess the givers. The people have also a custom of knocking at each other's doors at this season. On the 24th of December a crier solemnly proclaims the peace of Christmas—(Jul-fred). In virtue of this, the punishment of all offences against social order is double that incurred at any other period of the year. The proclamation of the peace of Christmas is a custom of great antiquity, and extends over the whole kingdom, and nothing is suffered to disturb the tranquillity of the season. Symbols of this rite are to be discovered on all the Runic stones.

A curious experiment is now being made at the head of the chain-pier, Brighton that of raising fresh water from below the ocean by means of an Artesian well. It is intended to bore to the extent of 70 feet, at which depth the chalk formation will, it is expected, be penetrated, and fresh water obtained, which will be applied to the formation of a jet d'eau. The attempt, if successful, will be a most interesting work of art and science, as well as a great acquisition to the pier.

SPLENDID SIGHT.

Two hours after the Oriental left Malta, on the 28th of November, about half-past five o'clock, when getting dusk, the passengers and crew most clearly saw Mount Etna in eruption, the Oriental at the time bearing N.E. 105 miles. The beautiful sight was visible for five hours. The captain states such an occurrence has not been witnessed for twenty years.

THE GERMAN RHINE.

They shall not—shall not have it,
Our free-spring German Rhine,
Though, bourse as famish'd rivers,
They vomit it crash and shine.
So long its winding current
Shall wear its dark-green vest—
So long as sparkles on its water
Shall cleave its rippling crest.

They shall not—shall not have it,
Our free-spring German Rhine,
So long as hearts are gladden'd by
Its spirit stirring wine,
So long, beneath its eddies,
As rocks shall firmly stand—
So long as lofty battlements
Shade mirror'd 'neath its strand.

They shall not—shall not have it,
Our free-sprung German Rhine,
Till amorous youths and maidens
Forsake the marriage shrine
Long as its depths can shelter
A fish among their sands;
So long as songs shall echo
From minstrels' lips and hands;

They shall not—shall not have it,
Our free-sprung German Rhine,
Till, buried 'neath its surges,
Our last man's bones decline.

ANSWER TO AVICH.

Sir, your riddle's quite plain;
'Tis a thing that they stick
On the back of a letter—
Some call it "A Yer."

ENIGMA.

Near Paul's our dwelling long hath been;
We are an aged pair.
Though, oft in spectacles we're seen,
No spectacles we wear.

Plantagenet and Tudor both
With us have sat at meat:
Guelph, Stuart, Nassau, nothing loth,
Have low'd them at our feet.

Sir Matthew (heir to Jemmy's goods),
He is our cousin fair;
We're all descended from the Woods
Now tell us who we are.

NEWSPAPER REPORTERS.

What most extraordinary men are these reporters of the English newspapers! Surely, if there be any class of individuals who are entitled to the appellation of cosmopolites, it is these; who pursue their invocation in all countries indifferently, and accommodate themselves at will to the manners of all classes of society; their fluency of style as writers is only surpassed by their facility of language in conversation, and their attainments in classical and polite literature only by their profound knowledge of the world, acquired by an early introduction into its leading scenes. The activity, energy, and courage which they occasionally display in the pursuit of information are truly remarkable. I saw them, during the three days at Paris, mingled with cannalle and gamins behind the barriers, while the mitraille was flying in all directions, and the desperate cuirassiers were dashing their fierce horses against those seemingly feeble bulwarks. There stood they, plotting down their observations in reform pocket-books as unconcernedly as if reporting the proceedings of a reform meeting in Finsbury square; whilst in Spain, several of them accompanied the Carlist and Christino guerillas in some of their most desperate raids, exposing themselves to the danger of hostile bullets, the inclemency of winter, and the fierce heat of the summer sun. Borrow's Bible in Spain.

BACHELORS HELD IN DISHONOUR.

Lycurgus, as we are told by Plutarch, thought that it would be an effectual mode of encouraging matrimony to deprive, as he did by a special law, bachelors of that honour and respect which he commanded the young to pay to the old. Hence, he says, nobody expressed any displeasure at the conduct of a young man to Dercyllidas, an eminent commander; he happened to appear one day in a company, when a young man not only refused to rise and yield his seat to him, but made this severe observation—"You have no child to yield a seat to me when I am old."

BEHOLD, in anticipation of Christmas jollities, a pantomimic scene—Harlequin and Columbine lightly footing to some graceful measure—the lean Pantaloon skipping in long-sleeved wonder and admiration of the prominent gentleman who dances upon three legs—the lover leading aside his mistress to whisper soft nothings aloof from the throng of cynic-looking soldiers, bearded priests, mailed knights, and half-Othello dominoes here introduced from the comic quarto noticed in our last week's paper.* And fairly does this volume claim precedence of all more serious matters at this merry time. We have in it a new version of the life and adventures of our old friend Robinson Crusoe, "done into verse by a second Daniel," wherein all his mishaps, scenes, voyages, and adventures give scope for successive pages of Ingoldsby rhymes, illustrated in this style:—

HOW DOES IT LOOK?

"Having worn out the clothes that he brought from the ship,
He sees that he wants much the aid of a snip;
So resolves in the best way himself to equip,—
And builds him a garment,
Excessively 'varmint,'
Which, though not a Nugee,
Yet fits free and easy;
And though D'Orsay might fancy it not quite the thing,
Mr. Crusoe considers it fit for a king."

Laman Blanchard says "something about the reader," hitting off in his own happy style the quiet peculiarities of those who read. One face has been omitted, and a good-humoured sketch it would have been—the reader of "The Comic Album." Hippodrollery—the oddities of horsemanship, a cockney demonstration of the principles and practices of elegant equitation—is rich in fun. The income-tax is made (most mighty of achievements!) pleasantly interesting—whilst the new tariff affords us a cut:—

TAKING A CHOP WITH A FRIEND.

The Portraits are sketchily and cleverly pencilled in, and tell of the "advantages that living artists still have over the sun: for the sun never flatters." "Behind the Scenes" initiates the reader into some secrets of the corps dramatique, which we are almost tempted to extract with their real-life illustrations, but must hasten on, not staying even for the Ballet—the poetry of motion—to take just one

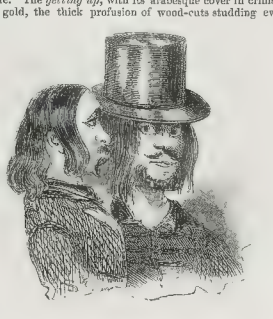
TAKING A CHOP WITH A FRIEND.

Touch from the Toilet, a wittily-illustrated disquisition upon the hair and beard:—

A GOOD HEAD OF HAIR.

From the final chapter of this book of fun, we make space for a story, but cannot refrain from again expressing a favourable opinion of the volume, and a hearty hope that it will speedily fulfil the indication of its title-page by becoming the book for every table. The getting up, with its arabesque cover in crimson, blue and gold, the thick profusion of wood-cuts studding every page and brought up in the best style of art, reminds us forcibly of the only parallel piece of printing—"Lockhart's Spanish Ballads." Both are from the press of Messrs. Vizetelly, and do great credit to their correct taste and pains-taking execution. With this good word for the printer we turn again to our extract.



A FUNNY STORY.

"I say, Mr. Fogue," bawls Master Tom, "please tell us a funny story."—"Funny story, my young calmance? Come, then—Did you ever hear of the Marsh Mohawk, the big snake of North America, that eats a couple of five oxen and half a dozen little boys every morning for breakfast, and thinks nothing of it?"—"No; do tell us about him."—"Well, then, let me see—no, I'll tell you about him some other time. I know something you'd like; you shall hear all about the sexton of Saragossa." "Please, sir, whereabouts is Saragossa?" "In Ballinamara Boo, my little dear. Well, this sexton went into the churchyard one day to dig a grave for an old miser, that had starved himself to death in a coal-cellar." Here Mr. Fogue groaned shudderingly, and the flesh of his young audience crept.—"Oh, go on, sir, please go on."—"Well, then, the sexton began digging the grave, and he dug, and dug, and dug; and first he threw up a thighbone, and then a skull, and then he came to an old coffin. So he began scraping away the dirt to see whose it was, and while he was doing that something inside bumped against the lid, and he heard a voice say" "Oh gracious!" interrupted the children. "'Rubaboo diddledy doo, whiskey giddledy wobbledy baw'—that's Latin, my little dears. 'Hallo!' says he, 'who's there?' 'Put in your pickaxe, and you'll see,' cries the voice inside. So he just put in the end of his pickaxe—something gave it a tug—and when he pulled it out"—(the funny gentleman paused for a moment, with a look most supernaturally owlish, which was reflected by the sympathetic little ones)—"the end of it—an inch and a half was gone: it had been bitten off like a carrot."

AMERICAN TRAGEDY IN REAL LIFE.—Some months ago, a Dr. Peake, formerly of Prince William county, Virginia, and lately of Palmyra, Mississippi, arrived at Columbia, with a lady and child, supposed to be his wife and daughter, and took lodgings at the hotel. He had during that time acquired the respect of the community and much professional reputation. A few days since a gentleman (whose name is not now recollected, but who is also a resident of Palmyra) landed at Columbia and presented a letter of introduction to a gentleman of the neighbourhood, whom he informed that Dr. Peake had been his friend and family physician at Palmyra, where he had long enjoyed a lucrative practice. That about six months ago his wife had expressed an earnest desire to visit a relative in one of the northern counties of Mississippi, to which, unsuspicious of wrong, he had yielded his consent, and she accordingly left Palmyra, taking with her their daughter, about six years old; that immediately afterwards Dr. Peake left Palmyra, without making known to any one his object or destination. A few weeks after Dr. Peake's departure, the unsuspecting husband received a letter from his Mississippi friends, stating that his wife had eloped with a stranger who had appeared in the neighbourhood soon after his wife's arrival there, carrying with her the child, but that no clue to their hiding-place had been discovered by her friends. The husband made diligent search and inquiry for the fugitives, but without success, till about a fortnight ago, when he was informed by a steamboat captain that he had seen Dr. Peake at Columbia. To this spot the husband immediately repaired, carrying credentials of his own standing, and a letter of introduction to the gentleman to whom on landing at Columbia he related the story of his wrongs. He then informed this gentleman that he only desired to recover his child, and would only use force in case of resistance. Accompanied by the gentleman (who at once espoused his cause), he went to the boarding-house, and without ceremony entered the room occupied by Dr. Peake and his adulterous wife. On entering he immediately secured his child, and on an attempt of Dr. P. to interpose he drew a pistol, and, directing it towards Dr. Peake, threatened him with instant death if he advanced. The doctor's interference being thus arrested, the unhappy man bore his child off without further hindrance. A few minutes afterwards he received a message from his wife praying an interview, which he granted on condition that it should take place in the presence of witnesses. Accordingly he repaired with several of the citizens of the town to her apartment, where he was speedily interrupted by the approach of Dr. Peake, armed with a pistol. He immediately stepped to the door, and drawing his pistol fired and wounded Dr. P., who, however, continued to advance upon him with angry and menacing gestures. The husband, who throughout the whole affair acted with extraordinary coolness, then drew a bowie-knife, and rushing upon Dr. P., before the latter could fire his pistol, plunged it into his heart. The doctor fell and immediately expired, his adversary exclaiming, "There dies a villain, once my dearest friend, who first destroyed my happiness, and deserved death, but who has rushed on his own destruction." We understand that the miserable wife has been provided for by her husband, but remains at Columbia, abandoned by him and her daughter, and a wretched outcast from all virtuous society.

THE PRINCESS OF COBURG.—We learn from Coburg, Dec. 13th, that the hereditary Princess has been attacked by scarlet fever, but that hopes were entertained of a prompt cure.

Rifaat Pacha, the Turkish Ambassador at the Court of Austria, arrived at Vienna on the 11th inst., and had a conference with Prince Metternich on the following day.

DEATH OF MISS MURRAY.—This well known actress died on Monday morning, at ten o'clock, from an attack of the English cholera. She performed at the Adelphi on Monday week for the last time.

The postal convention between Austria and Saxony, for an uniform rate of postage, will come into operation, says a letter from Dresden, on the 1st of April next.

STRANDED WINE.—One hundred and forty-five hogsheads of claret (being about 700 gallons) have been picked up between Jury's Gap and Dover, and lodged in the storehouses of the Lord Warden. Some of the claret is of superior quality. It is supposed to have formed part of the cargo of a polacca-rigged vessel, from the circumstance of a mast and rigging belonging to such a description of vessel having also been picked up. As yet, no part of the wine has been claimed. The marks can be ascertained at the Custom-house, Dover, and possibly the owners or consignees may yet come forward.

MISS ADELAIDE KEMBLE AND MRS. ALFRED SHAW.

After a long interregnum of poverty, the English stage may be said to be in a fair way of once more becoming affluent in song. Since the days of Mara and Billington, "few and far between" were the "visits" of those whose merits rose beyond mediocrity: fine voices there were enow, but true singing was, in general, most shamefully neglected, or, it would seem, despised. The vocalist who could sweetly or loudly carol or bawl a ballad was held to be perfect in the vocal art. None of the higher emotions capable of being excited by the dramatism of song were ever dreamt of — none of the conflictions of passion which music can so faithfully depict were attempted. The ballad or ballad roudeau were the height of a would-be popular singer; and the audience that would fall asleep over Braham's "Deeper and deeper still," would be in active uproar of ecstacy at his "Scots wha hae" or "Bay of Biscay, O!" Happily, times are changed for the better; and we cannot have a fairer proof of it than in the persons of the two ladies whom we have represented in the parts of Semiramide and Arsace. The scene is taken from that portion of the drama, in which the giorno d' orrore of their fatal and criminal love breaks in upon them for the first time. The celebrated duet sung at this crisis has ever been a favourite from its simplicity and melody; and again from the facility it affords assorting voices to mingle in "sweetness long drawn out:" but we question very much if its character strictly be in keeping with the feelings of the situation. Be that as it may, it is always a charming morceau when well sung; and never was its performance more delightful, than as it has been given by the above-mentioned fair artistes. They seem to flow

In murmurs like two sister streams
In watery gliding soft wast time the moonlight beams:

The double cadence at the close was admirably constructed and as exquisitely given, particularly (without the slightest invidious comparison) by Mrs. Alfred Shaw, who, being the second, had the additional duty of narrowly watching and sympathising with the varied and finished nuances of her coadjutrix, which she performed with a curious felicitas of expression and fidelity. It was certainly the gem of the opera, and cannot fail to shine most brilliantly wherever it may be presented by these two distinguished ornaments to English song! What a pity that the revival of "Artaxerxes" will not have the valuable aid of Miss Kemble's powers! We mean no disparagement to the acknowledged and highly-prized merits of Miss Rainforth; on the contrary, we speak so from a wish to hear the three first female vocalists of the day together in our national opera. The part of Semire is no despicable one.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, 20th December, 1842.

Mon cher Monsieur,—We are now approaching closely on New Year's-day, and Heaven only knows what preparations are in progress to render this day more sumptuous, more memorable than ever. Every novelty that taste or ingenuity can invent is taxed to give éclat to the festivities attendant upon the season. My only difficulty will, therefore, be in the selection from the innumerable novelties which present themselves in our fashionable places of resort. Let me, therefore, commence by a humble description of costumes which appeared at a late representation at the Théâtre Italien, where it was my good fortune to be present. In an adjoining box I remarked a costume which appeared to me to possess in equal proportions the charms of novelty and good taste. It was composed of a robe of cut velvet, formed after the Greek, in front of which glittered a brooch of most splendid brilliants, arranged in a fashion entirely new. The same lady wore with her hair, which was arranged in round bands, an English coiffure, ornamented with a wreath of roses, over which the lace was turned back, and which had a very particular and charming effect. Not far from us another toilette arrested our attention. It consisted of a robe of satin Pompadour, cherry-coloured and white, with small sleeves draped with lace. The berthe had a double row of point d'Argentan; the skirt opened on the side upon a bouillone of white satin. Upon the head was worn a coiffure of velvet, having at the back a border of silver, the front ornamented with a hanging plume. In the same box was a young lady dressed in a robe of skyblue gauze, with three flounces; the corsage was half high, the sleeves short, draped, and ornamented with knots of ribbons. Her coiffure was à la Sevigne, the hair adorned with a crown of two branches in mixed flowers, of which the effect altogether was very striking. As it is not possible to complete a toilette perfectly without the aid of a well-made corset, assisted by an under petticoat, which shall be at once supple, full, and keep its shape, let me recommend to you a new invention which has lately appeared here, and which is called the tasti crinoline, and which has met with the greatest success amongst our leading merveilleuses. The inventor has introduced this crenolination in such a way as to bid fair to supersede completely the ancient under petticoats and bustles. In his tissues, such as flannel, Cashmere, silk, Thibets, or merinoes, he has contrived imperceptibly to introduce horse-hair in the fabric, so that in woollens, silks, or Cashmeres its presence is not seen, whilst, at the same time, it affords to the stuff into which it is introduced all the support that is required, without in the slightest degree injuring its appearance, its softness, or its warmth. As regards the ornaments and trimmings most in use amongst our élégantes, I have been much struck with coiffures and trimmings for robes composed entirely of feathers, and of flowers made of that material; nothing can surpass the elegance, the airy lightness of this description of ornament, which, I assure you, at the present moment plays a very important part in the dresses of our Parisian belles. I cannot conclude my letter without remarking upon the extreme to which the luxury of pocket-handkerchiefs is carried at present; they are, as regards workmanship, taste, richness of ornament, and trimming, really wonderful. I had almost forgotten to state that garlands of roses and grapes are still quite the mode; they are worn rather on one side, and the wreath surrounds the hair entirely, and has a very classical and peculiar effect, which must be seen to be duly appreciated.

HENRIETTE DE B.

THE CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XX.

NEW CHURCH, PADDINGTON.

The churches of London exhibit signs of the times. In the days of Sir Christopher, the good citizens all lived in the heart of the town, behind their shops and above their warehouses; and accordingly a church rose up in each parish until London was crowded with towers, domes, and spires, of every shape, character, and style. But as time went on, and tastes changed, the city far outstepped the old boundary; large suburbs grew up on every side—and, riches increasing, the Londoners began to appreciate the purer air of these out-town habitations. Small villas sprang up in each direction—the houses of the aristocracy and the wealthiest proprietors stretched farther and farther westward, until at length steam-boats and railroads came into play, and the City has at last become a place of mere business rather than of abode. Every man in anything like easy circumstances lives "out of the smoke" and the result is that the churches in the City are almost empty, whilst a necessity arises in all the suburbs for extra church accommodation. To meet this demand, as our readers are aware, there is a Government commission for building new churches, together with a society having a similar object in view. The commissioners, in their report for 1841, state that two hundred and eighty-one new churches had been completed in various parts of England; in their report for 1842 they add that fifteen others had been erected, of which number one was at Camberwell, another at Streatham, and three in Bethnal-green. That twenty-four others are now in course of building, of which number one is in Wilton-place, Pimlico; another at Paddington, which forms our illustration; a third in the Broadway, Westminster; a fourth in Clarence-street, Southwark; and two others at Bethnal-green. In addition to all these, the commissioners state they have made conditional grants to a great number of other places, and amongst them we find new churches for Waterloo district, Lambeth; Camberwell, Newington, Southwark, Turk's-row, Chelsea; Whitechapel; two in St. Pancras; two at Woolwich; one in St. John's, Westminster; and three in St. Margaret's, Westminster! Thus we find that little more than twelve months has added eleven new churches to London and the vicinity, with fourteen others in progress; making together twenty-five!

Of such of these buildings as are worthy, we propose to give illustrations, commencing with the New Church, Paddington, which stands at the termination of the range of mansions recently erected in a line with the New-road, and not many hundred yards from the Notting-hill road, near Bayswater.

No old church of London but has its knot of memories. Linked to its name and connected with its locality they form a subject for much interesting remark and thoughtful consideration. Some claim, perhaps, a rich merchant, who, beginning with thrift and steady carefulness and honest perseverance, continued in an upward course to plenty, then to riches, then to wealth his rich gallcons gathering for him and his the choicest fruits and goodliest produce of many a "far countrie"—until he gained the crowning glory of the citizen of good old times by becoming Lord Mayor, leaving a rich legacy to found almshouses. Another church boasts the bones of a poet—one, who, casting off the bonds of earth, revelled in the bright regions of fervid imagination another claims, it may be, a statesman; a fourth a painter, or a wit, or historian. Not so, however, with a new church. Independent of the sacred purpose for which it is raised it must rest for interest upon the beauty of the building, or upon its being something new, and therefore having legitimate claim to place in a newspaper. Still there is less scope for description. On the Hyde-park side of Paddington elegant buildings are rapidly springing up. Streets, squares, and crescents rear themselves where a few years since all was an open field. The style and architectural character of some of these buildings is bold and successful. The new church is Gothic, with a tower and spire: it is built to accommodate 1900 persons; 1000 in pews and 600 in free seats. For its erection a specific grant was made by the commissioners; the first stone was laid in 1841, and the time for its final completion is stated as March, 1843. The architects whose plans were approved were Messrs. Goldecott and Gutch, but the former gentleman having died the building is being finished by the latter.

NEW CHURCH, PADDINGTON.

A POLITICAL DUEL.—At an early hour on Saturday last, an hostile meeting took place between J. P. Stanfield Esq., of Marford House, Surrey, and Sir Robert Cardington, of Wilford. The parties, accompanied by their respective seconds and a medical gentleman, met on Westwood-common, and an exchange of shots took place without effect. The seconds then interfered, but failed in effecting any adjustment of the affair, and the principals were again placed in a hostile position, the distance being twelve paces, and the firing simultaneously. At the second discharge the ball from Mr. Stanfield's pistol took effect on the right arm of his opponent, severely shattering the bone near the elbow, whilst the ball from Sir Robert's pistol glancing across the left shoulder of Mr. Stanfield, passed completely through the collar of that gentleman's coat, without inflicting any injury. The affair then terminated. The misunderstanding arose at a late anti-corn-law meeting held at Wilford, and at which the two gentlemen took opposite views of the question.

THE KING OF HANOVER.—A letter from Hanover, Dec. 11, in the Journal de Frankfort, says:—"It is stated that the King intends to visit England after the marriage of the Prince Royal, for the purpose of consulting his former physician, Sir Henry Halford, his confidence in German physicians having diminished considerably since the death of Stieglitz.

Sir R. Peel has given £150 out of what is called the Royal Bounty, to be applied for the benefit of Mrs. Dwyer, sister of the late Sir Sydney Smith. The case was brought to the Premier's notice by Miss Jane Porter and Mr. Emerson Tennent. Her son, who was bred to the sea, has got a berth on board the Thunderbolt.

ROYAL SCANDAL.—A French legitimist journal, which passes for being well informed on the most minute details of what passes at court, makes the following statement:—"When it was in contemplation to instal the Duke of Nemours as future regent in the Palace of the Tuileries, it was proposed to the Duchess of Orleans to yield her apartment to the Duke of Nemours, and to remove her Royal Highness to a small apartment in the Pavilion of Flora, close to that occupied by Madame Adelaide, the King's sister. This arrangement would have the advantage of giving to the Duke of Nemours a more spacious apartment, and would likewise place the Duchess Helène and her children under the eyes of Louis Philippe and the Queen. This application was first made by a third person, to whom the duchess communicated her refusal. When this fact was made known to certain great personages, they reiterated their proposal and their desires; but the Princess Helène declared plainly, 'that too many recollections connected with her husband had rendered those apartments so dear to her, that she could not consent to abandon them.' It was even added, and we guarantee this fact, that she would not quit her apartments except by force, and by a formal order, but that she expected that her feelings would be spared that shock. This determined language had the desired effect, and the Duchess of Orleans occupies her ancient apartments. The Duke of Nemours continues to be as reserved and as cold as usual. A demand of 1,000,000f., for the education of the Count de Paris, is to be made at the meeting of the Chambers."

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.—THURSDAY.

SOULTON V. BIDDULPH AND OTHERS.

This was an action against the London and Westminster Steam-Packet Company to recover the value of a boat, the property of the plaintiff, which had been run down in the Thames by one of the company's packets. The action was not brought until eight months after the accident had occurred. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages £15.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

BEALE V. SELF—SLANDER

The plaintiff in this case was a surgeon, residing in the Commercial road, and the action was brought to recover damages for words, which, it was alleged, were spoken of the plaintiff, a medical gentleman, [illegible] damages for slanderous words alleged to have been spoken by the defendant. The defendant pleaded justification. The plaintiff, it appeared, was in professional attendance, in December, 1841, on a Mrs. Self, as accoucheur. His avocations requiring his presence elsewhere, as the medical officer of the Stepney union, he left his patient, who was in considerable danger for one day. In his absence other medical attendance was called in. The patient, however, died in a few days after, in the midst of much suffering. The absence and alleged improper treatment of the plaintiff became the subject of much unfriendly comment by the defendant, in the course of which he said that the plaintiff "was an ignorant quack, was liable to be prosecuted for professional ignorance, and that he was not fit to be allowed to sit in a dissecting-room." At the instance of the defendant an inquest was held on the body, when, after a diligent post mortem examination, at which plaintiff and defendant attended; the jury returned a verdict of "Natural death," and that the treatment of Mr. Beale, under her peculiar circumstances, was proper. On the part of the plaintiff, evidence was gone into to prove not only his professional competency, but the high character he bore. He had acquired it by a regular attendance at medical lectures at the hospitals. His lordship left it to the jury to say to what damages the plaintiff under the circumstances was entitled. The justification pleaded by the defendant he thought had not been made out. Verdict for the plaintiff.—Damages £100.

POLICE.

GUILDHALL.—William Connell, the young man who attempted the life of Mrs. Magnus, the "bar-maid" of the Auction Mart Coffee-house, was on Tuesday examined before the Lord Mayor. The prisoner stated that he was twenty-one years of age, but his boyish appearance would justify the supposition that he was not more than sixteen or seventeen. His visage wore rather a woe-begone expression until spoken to, when it assumed a sanctified air, answering the questions with somewhat of flippancy. Mr. Wilkinson, the solicitor, appeared for the prosecution, and stated that the charge to be preferred against the prisoner was that of "shooting at with intent to murder." He called police-constable, 648, who stated that he was on duty on Monday night week, and about five minutes after midnight he heard a report of fire-arms. He thought the sound came from Aspley-place, and went in that direction; he then heard a shriek for help from the top of Angel-court, and found it proceeded from a female who had come out of the Auction Mart Coffee-house. She exclaimed, "Mrs. Magnus is shot! Mrs Magnus is shot!" He then got over the rails, descended the area steps, and entered the coffee house. The female had got into the street by means of a window, for the gate was shut. Proceeded to search for the prisoner, and found him on the top of a staircase. When he first saw him, he was drawing his right hand out of his pocket. He said, "Here I am, here I am. What have I done? what have I done?" Witness told him he must take him in charge for wilfully shooting Mrs. Magnus. He brought him down stairs, and then discovered blood on his shirt, upon which he said to him, "Why you have cut your own throat." He replied, "Yes, I have." Witness then sent off for a surgeon, but Mr. Adams, of Broad-street, was passing at the time, who came in and dressed the prisoner's wound; he was then taken by witness to the station-house in Bishopsgate, when the charge was preferred against him of having shot at Mrs. Magnus. Prisoner was a good deal excited, and exclaimed, "Oh that woman, oh that woman! What a coward I must have been to have shot a woman I loved, and who had always shown so kind to me." The wound in his throat was not very deep. It was inflicted with a clasp knife (termed a Spanish knife), with rather a long blade The knife, stained with blood, and the pistol and the patch found in the box of Mrs Magnus, were here produced and examined by the Lord Mayor.—Witness proceeded: After the charge had been entered, he took the prisoner to St. Thomas's Hospital.—Mr. J. C. Adams, surgeon, of Broad-street and St. Thomas's Hospital, stated that he sewed up the wound in the prisoner's throat, and gave directions for his removal to the hospital. He had also visited Mrs. Magnus, and found her suffering from shock at up with her every night but two. Her wound was of the most dangerous character. The Lord Mayor asked if it was not very unusual for medical men thus to act up with patients?—Mr. Adams said the case was under his charge in no one so dangerous he thought no personal sacrifice too great. The bullet had entered on the right side, shattered one of the ribs, cut through the lungs, and came out on the other side near the heart. He had never before met a case with such extensive injuries which had not proved fatal. Had the ball gone an inch farther on one side or the other, death must have been the result. The wounded in the most dangerous effects had, however, been got over in a very extraordinary manner, and that which they had now to fear was, lest any excitement should bring on inflammation of the lungs, and terminate fatally, as a portion of one of the ribs which had been shattered they believed was projecting upon the lungs. The improvement which had taken place in the aspect of the case up to the present time was as remarkable as the severity of the injuries themselves. Had there been any wadding in the pistol, the chances were that the life of the patient would have been sacrificed. Mr. Guthrie, the army surgeon, had seen the case, and agreed with him in the opinion that it was most extraordinary the woman had not been killed.—Mr. Wilkinson said his intention was to ask for a remand; and he thought sufficient evidence had been adduced to warrant his lordship in now remanding the prisoner until Mrs. Magnus should be able to attend.—The Lord Mayor: What have you to say, prisoner, why I should not remand you? Prisoner (carelessly): I have nothing to say, except that the greater part of the evidence of the policeman is lies.—The Lord Mayor: What do you mean? Did he not take you as he has described? —Prisoner: I have nothing more to say. If a man comes here and gives wrong evidence, I have nothing more to say.—Lord Mayor: But in what respect has he given wrong evidence, as you call it?—Prisoner (flippantly) I have nothing more to say. He was then remanded for a fortnight, and removed from the bar.—The Lord Mayor gave directions that he should be taken to the infirmary of the Giltspur Compter, and well taken care of

BOW STREET.—THE BLASPHEMOUS EXHIBITIONS IN HOLYWELL STREET. Philip James Green, a merchant, residing at 5, Dorset-place, Mayfair, was on Tuesday last placed at the bar, before Mr. Jardine, charged with stealing a written paper from the shop window of Thomas Patterson, described on the paper sheet as a bookseller, 8, Holywell-street, Strand.—George Clarke, errand boy in the service of the prosecutor, stated that about two o'clock in the afternoon he was in his master's shop, when the prisoner came in and asked him to remove the placard that was then exhibited in the window, which witness said he could not do without the sanction of his master. Defendant then repeated the demand a second, and a third time, and upon witness refusing to comply, he jumped on the counter, pulled back the window-screen, and pulling down the paper delivered it to a person that stood by, and who, as witness understood, was his son. Witness then called a constable, and gave the prisoner in charge for robbery. The officer here handed in the placard, which was the same as that torn down by Mr. Bruce. The boy added that many gentlemen had asked what the price of the paper might be, and when he told them that in the circumstance, he desired him to get 5s. for it if he could.—The prisoner remarked that when in the charge-room the witness raised the paper at nothing when asked the price of it.—In answer to the charge witness did say do so?—Boy (pertly): I decline to answer that question.—Mr. Twyford, who was also on the bench, observed that the witness had already said he could not remove them without the sanction of his master.—Mr. Jardine said it might be easily inferred by whose directions they were placed in the window.—The boy, on being again questioned, said he had put them up by order of his master.—Mr. Jardine—Why did you decline to answer that question when you were first asked?—Boy. My master told me not to answer such a question.—Mr. Jardine then said there was no difficulty whatever about the nature of the charge, for it was not at all like a theft, the object of the accused being only to take down the papers in order to bring the subject into a state of prosecution. If Patterson had to complain of anything, he might, if he thought proper, bring an action for trespass; but as he (the magistrate) thought Mr. Green had no intention of committing a theft, he should not have been taken into custody on such a charge, and he might therefore be discharged.—Patterson then applied for the sum of 8s., which he understood had been paid into court by Mr. Bruce for the damage he had done.—Mr. Barnaby desired him to call at the clerk's office, and he should get the money upon passing a receipt for it.—Patterson wished it to be distinctly stated by the court, if the prosecution of the police was to be withdrawn from him, and if the accounts that appeared in the newspapers were correct.—Mr. Jardine said he had nothing to do with such matters.—Patterson: Can I take out a warrant against Mr Bruce for robbery?—Mr. Jardine: What is the nature of the robbery?—Patterson: He came to my shop, and having broken my windows, took from them a paper which still remains in his possession, or in that of the police.—Mr. Jardine said he must know a great deal more about the matter before he could assume that Mr. Bruce had committed a robbery. —Patterson again asked if he was not to be allowed the protection of the police.—Mr. Jardine replied, he was not to sit in the court to answer such questions, and requested to know what was the nature of Patterson's application.—Patterson: I want a warrant against Mr. Bruce.—Mr. Jardine: You must state on what grounds.—Patterson: To keep the peace, he having threatened to break every bone in my body (a laugh). and I have a witness to prove it.—The boy Clarke again stepped forward, and said that when Mr. Bruce came on Tuesday week he threatened to break every bone in Patterson's body; and he also stole a paper from the window.—Mr. Jardine: Is that the case?—Mr. Jardine inquired if he had seen Mr. Bruce since that occurrence?—The boy answered in the negative.—Mr. Jardine: It was with reference to the paper in question?—The Boy: Yes, it was.—Mr. Jardine said he was certain there was no danger to be apprehended from Mr. Bruce.—Patterson: Am I to understand that no redress will be afforded me?—Mr. Jardine: It is not in my power to advise you any under existing circumstances.—Patterson, upon hearing this, appeared quite disconcerted, and muttered something about adopting another course.—Mr. Abrahams, landlord of Patterson's house, waited on the magistrate, to express his regret that such persons had got on his premises. He was a strict Jew, and never countenanced the making the Holy Scriptures the subject of ridicule. Mr. Jardine observed that no person ever thought of imputing blame to him for what had occurred in the house.—Mr. Abrahams assured the magistrate that he would have great pleasure in affording every assistance to the authorities in putting down the nuisance.

On Wednesday morning, on Mr. Twyford taking his seat on the bench, a young man, named Thomas Pearce, described as a corn-merchant, of Lion wharf, Queenhithe, presented himself at the bar, in charge of sundry several written papers from the shop of Thomas Patterson, in Holywell-street.—The complainant, who was in attendance with his errand-boy, expressed a wish that the matter might be settled on the spot.—Mr. Pearce said he would be at liberty to proceed with the charge in a short time.—Mr. Pearce said he saw no reason for a postponement, as he was prepared to meet any charge that might be preferred against him, and any delay would be detrimental to his business, as the time for which he was expected on the Corn-Exchange at an early hour, to transact business of importance.—Mr. Twyford said he could not depart from the usual course of taking the night charges, as it was to be supposed that parties having complaints to prefer against prisoners came prepared with sufficient evidence to meet the charge. The complainant then called the boy Clarke to give evidence, and being placed in the witness box, Mr. Twyford, addressing him, said, "Well, boy, before I allow you to take the Holy Scriptures in your hand to be sworn, I think it my duty to ask you if you believe in a future state; I mean by that, heaven and the Deity?" Clarke replied that he did not think he was old enough to judge.—Mr. Twyford: Such being the case, I do not consider I should be justified in receiving your evidence. Are there any other witnesses?—Patterson replied he had no other witnesses.—Mr. Twyford (addressing the defendant) said, "You are discharged." The defendant cowed and left the office

CLERKENWELL.—William Cheek, a cab-driver, was charged with furious driving, to the imminent danger of the lives and limbs of passengers, and thereby damaging a chaise belonging to Mr. Hinton, of Highbury.—It appeared from the evidence of several witnesses that on Saturday night last the prisoner was observed to be quite drunk, and was driving his horse most furiously along Exmouth-street, Clerkenwell, running from one side of the road to the other; and that such was the danger apprehended, that the passers-by retook themselves to the pavement for their safety. The prisoner appeared to have no control whatever over his horse. At length Mr. Hinton's groom, who was driving his master's vehicle in an opposite direction, perceiving the danger to which his horse was exposed by the prisoner's conduct leaped from the box, and in a moment after the prisoner's cab came into contact with Mr. Hinton's chaise with such violence that the shafts of the latter were broken, and it was otherwise much damaged. The whole of the witnesses concurred in stating that the prisoner was driving at the rate of at least fourteen miles an hour, and that several persons, the prisoner himself included, had a most narrow escape from serious injury.—The prisoner, in answer to the charge, denied having been drunk, or that he had driven at the furious rate mentioned by the witnesses. He said the running against Mr. Hinton's chaise was entirely accidental.—The magistrate convicted him in the penalty of 20s., and in default ordered him to be imprisoned fourteen days in the House of Correction. He would leave Mr. Hinton to his remedy of examining into the extent of the damage done to his chaise. The prisoner said he could not pay the penalty, and was therefore sent to prison.

John Taylor, a well-known thief, was charged with picking a gentleman's pocket. It appeared from the evidence of E 37, that the prisoner, with a crowd of the honest characters in St. Giles's, were stand ng in Hyde street on the occasion of the execution of the murderer Courvoisier. It appeared from the evidence of E 37, that the prisoner, with a crowd of the honest characters in St. Giles's, were stand ng in Hyde street on the occasion of the execution of the murderer Courvoisier. The prisoner was observed to put his hand into the pocket of the prisoner, named Jack, have at him." The prisoner immediately ran after him, and dexterously picked the gentleman's pocket. The constable witnessed the occurrence, and arrested him. On his way to the station-house he pulled out a clasp-knife, but other constables came up and secured him. He was committed for trial.

WORSHIP STREET.—John Boyle, a ruffianly-looking fellow, was charged with having committed a most unprovoked assault upon Charles Wallen, complainant, a well-dressed young man, stated that about one o'clock on Monday morning, as he was returning from his friends in the Borough, he met the prisoner on the pavement in the neighbourhood of Whitecross-street, and he had asked him where the great fight was to take place to-morrow? Complainant said that he knew nothing about it—what fight did he mean? Prisoner said, "Oh the battle between Jem Burgess and another fellow," and then, calling up to him a big dog that was following him, said, "Here is the lad that can beat Bungaree!" and with that he said to the dog, "Seize him," upon which the animal flew at complainant with the greatest ferocity, and on his kicking the dog in his defence, the prisoner rushed upon him and commenced "pitching" into him with all his might. In the struggle they both came to the ground, and complainant was so cut about the face and head that he was almost blinded by his blood. Complainant's brother, who was present, attempted to call out for help, when about six men and six women rushed out from some concealed place, and all of them fell upon complainant and kicked him dreadfully about the body. His brother escaped from their clutches and brought the police to his assistance, when prisoner was given in charge. Complainant never saw the prisoner before. James Watson, the brother of complainant, corroborated the above.—The prisoner was sentenced to pay 20s., or to suffer ten days' imprisonment.

A middle-aged man and his daughter, a good looking girl, named Palmer, had obtained them of 10s., upon premises known as Rag-fair, and putting those in possession of an estate. The case may serve as a salutary caution to those who feel an inclination to put their faith in the astrological prediction of Moore, Raphael, or any other conjurer whose name ends in l. The accounts handed to the magistrate a written statement of the circumstances, and also a "Prophetic Almanack," which had been the primary cause of the loss they complained of, and among the numerous predictions contained in the almanack, the magistrate was referred to a particular part, which set forth in glowing terms the virtues of astrology, and concluded with a pressing invitation to visit the conjurer, and have the nativities calculated and a kind relative to the destinies of those who consulted him, and render them other important services in proportion to the payment received, from two to twenty guineas.—On the strength of the statements was, that Palmer and his daughter purchased the produced almanack, and perused the contents, they resolved to consult the prophet, whose address was given in Eagle-place, City-road, and upon inquiring for Mr. Raphael, were introduced to him in the person of a Mr. Palmer. The s ster first had an interview, and paid a preliminary fee of one guinea, in return for which the astrologer, having made himself acquainted with the particulars of her birth, parentage, and other family matters, undertook to ascertain from the heavenly bodies the nature of her destiny, and to draw up her horoscope. Several months, however, elapsed before he could obtain the necessary information, and putting those by mean time the brother was induced to pay another guinea to have the same service performed for him. The conjuror at length produced what he called their horoscopes, and charged two guineas for them. He then entered into a series of his inquiries as to what money or property there had been in the family, he gathered from the woman's statements that she had some vague notion of a claim to some houses and land at Ealing, and as she believed, in order to get rid of them; and, in reply to the importunities and threats of the brother, told him that if he dared to complain he should never have anything but ill luck, he (the conjuror) having sufficient influence to make him miserable, both in this world and the next. Despite his threats and computations, however, his dupes had now the courage to make the case known to the magistrate. The two "horoscopes" were now produced. The man, it appeared, was born under Leo, and his life to be a chequered one of good and bad fortune; and his sister to have a couple of husbands, but, the astrologer said, it was uncertain whether she would survive her fifty-ninth year.

Mr. Broughton having looked at the almanack and the other precious documents, expressed his surprise that any people could be found, at this time of day, so foolish as to part with their money for such trash; but he said he would have inquiry made about this Mr. Palmer, or Mr. Raphael, or by whatever name he might be known.—The applicants were then desired to leave their address, and Fitzgerald, one of the constables of the court, was directed to follow up the inquiry.

MARYLEBONE.—On Wednesday a gentlemanly-looking young man, how at the station-house, gave his name James Keating, was charged on suspicion of having stolen, from the person of Lady Malcolm, a reticule, containing a 5 Bank of England note, together with 25 in gold, and some silver. Major Malcolm (who has just returned from China) gave evidence to the effect that on the previous evening he and his mother, Lady Malcolm, arrived at the Paddington terminations of the Great Western Railway at half-past five o'clock. they alighted from the carriage in which they had travelled, and while passing therefrom across the platform to get into his "brougham," Lady Malcolm suddenly exclaimed, "Oh! somebody has cut my bag!" He (the major) saw that the prisoner was close to Lady Malcolm, upon her right, on which arm her reticule was held; and on her making the exclamation, he (prisoner) ran off behind the brougham, and "doubled" round an omnibus. He was followed and given into custody; and the reticule, which had not been deprived of any portion of its contents, was picked up from the platform, James Hallett and Thomas Williams were examined.—The latter, who is one of the railway company's sergeants, said that when he mentioned to his inspector that the prisoner was known, he (prisoner) said to him, "What good will you do if you 'jacket' me?" He (Williams) had known him for three years as a member of the "swell mob." Mr. Rawlinson, after a few minutes' conversation with Major Malcolm, from whom he ascertained that there was a misunderstanding on the part of Lady Malcolm to attend, discharged the prisoner, at the same time telling him that he was well known, and that, if brought up again, he might not perhaps get off so easy.

UNION HALL.—James Morgan and Henry Williams were charged with robbing a Mrs. Wise of a purse containing a quantity of silver, and also with making a determined attack on her son while engaged in securing them and effecting their escape.—Mr. Wise stated that in passing along Westminster-road on the preceding afternoon, accompanied by her son and a gentleman, she stopped for a moment to look in a jeweller's shop window, and while there the two prisoners came, when the female thrust her hand into her pocket, took out her purse, and then handed it over to the male prisoner. Her son and also the gentleman observing the fact, endeavoured to effect the capture of the prisoners, who made a most determined resistance, each of them endeavouring to throw them down, but they were held until a policeman came up; but in the meantime they got rid of the purse by giving it to some person who was near the spot, and who escaped with it. It was stated that after dusk of an evening, regular organised gangs of pickpockets were constantly hovering about the Westminster-road, and committing robberies—that they watched the policemen, and robbed with impunity when they were gone to a distant part of the beat from that where the intended act was to be committed. In this manner several females particularly had been robbed by these gangs of thieves. The prisoners were remanded, it being expected that others of the gang will be taken into custody.

THE QUARTER'S REVENUE.—It is stated in quarters likely to be well informed, that the official returns of the revenue to the 5th of January, 1843, will exhibit a fearful deficiency, much larger than was shown by the returns of the preceding quarter

THE CONVENT AT DEPTFORD.—Mr. Marshall, the Roman Catholic pastor of Deptford, lately applied to Mr. Capper, superintendent of convicts, for leave to attend the Catholic convicts on board the hulk in Deptford, in his spiritual capacity. He stated that he was prevented from hearing their confessions, except waking up and down the deck, and that they were obliged to attend the service of the established church, and prevented from hearing their own. Mr. Capper returned a polite answer, stating that he would consult some members of the Government on the subject of the reverend gentleman's application. In a few days after Mr. Marshall received a letter from Mr. Capper, informing him that he was at perfect liberty to hear the confessions of the convicts in their cells, and to administer to them all the rites of their church, and that, in future, the Roman Catholic convicts would not be obliged to attend the divine service of the established church.

OUTFITS TO CHINA AND ALL PARTS OF THE GLOBE. The recent Treaty with the Celestial Empire, and consequent extent of territory opened for British talent and industry, will induce many to avail themselves of journeying on this high road to a speedy fortune. Outfits will be required to an extent never before known in this country, and as some of the Emperor's comfort depends on the style and manner in which he is equipped for sea, a few words on that subject will not be misplaced at this moment. The preparations are generally made in excitement, and hats appointed for, which are priced more in accordance to the money the party has to expend than the value of the articles priced; and at sea leisure is afforded to repine over articles useless and valueless, at a time when they cannot be replaced.—In fact, no articles are considered too bad to give the sea-farer, who of all others should be supplied with the very best "No reformation" has yet extensively effected this branch of business. Many fancying letters &c., are received from abroad, unknow, have determined E. MOSES and SON to embark extensively in the above line on the same principle which has placed their TAILORING ESTABLISHMENT in the highest estimation of the Trade ever existing—namely, to supply the best articles of every description at a profit not exceeding the market interest of money, marking every art cle in plain figures when they request the public to inspect, making no distinction of "persons," thus insuring satisfaction by the soundness of work, quality of material, and a moderate evidence of finish. Naval and Military Men, Merchants, Captains, and Emigrants generally, are invited to make trial for Tailoring, Hosiery, Bedding, Cabin Furniture, and every article of convenience and use, when they will be at once convinced "A NEW ERA" has been commenced in a saving from fifty to cent. per cent. in price, and articles supplied which will be found useful and ornamental when the voyage has terminated. Observe—E. MOSES and SON, Tailors, Woollen Drapers, and General Outfitters, Wholesale and Retail, 154, Minories, and 88, Aldgate, City.

GOVERNESS AGENTS WANTED

WHERE ARE YOU GOING?—To the Palace.—St. James's Palace, Pall Mall, but to the very red mansion in Fleet street, rich in mirrors, associations, the very walls and ceiling of which have the same elaborate decorations and emblazonments as those of the royal mansions, during the occupation of Prince Henry and Charles! You can obtain one a sight of it? Come none with me. I am about to purchase the largest property in SOUTHAMPTON, and the first pre-quisite of the day, sale of the PATENT IMPROVED WIGS, which, he has brought to the highest excellence in quality and fashion. You may get your HAIR CUT and DRESSED, too, in the first style. The very air redolent of departed royalty!—Call at 76, Fleet-street, No. 76, it is only the Seventeen-th House from TEMPLE-BAR, and nearly opposite Chancery-lane

H. WALKER'S NEEDLES (by authority of The "Queen's Own"), with the new large eyes, are easily threaded by hard persons, and work with great ease, having improved points, temper, and finish. The labels are correct like those of the Royal Factory and Mr. Walker's Royal Highness Prince Albert in order, on coloured grounds. If Walker's improved fish-hooks, steel pens, and other specialities. Purchasers should see the packages of needles or pens, from 1s. to 5s., or will free by post by any respectable drawer, on receipt of 13 penny stamps for the 25 needles, or 6 penny stamps for 12 pens. Every quality, for shipping. H. WALKER, Manufacturer to the Queen, 20, Maiden-lane, Wood-street, London

GINGER BRANDY.—This invaluable Liqueur continues to be manufactured by VINCENT and PUGH, the original Proprietors, at their Distillery, 16, New Park street, Borough, and 18, Road lane, City, and may be obtained of all Wine and Spirit Merchants, dealers in the metropolis, in bottles neatly sealed and capsuled.

TO CONGISSEURS IN BRANDY.—They have also fully succeeded in bringing to public notice a Brandy which prefers artists every yet offered, combining both the delicacy of character and richness of bouquet natural to Cognac, they being supported in their assertion by the opinion of the French growers, and the second paragraph in the Times' City article of January 2nd.

THE PALE BRANDY is particularly recommended as something extremely rare.

ROYAL COGNAC BRANDY.—Mr. GRIMBLE, who has been the managing partner in this concern, begs to acquaint the Public, that in consequence of the great improvements he has, by his unwonted exertions, been enabled to bring the quality of the article, it will in future be known as the commerce of GRIMBLE'S ROYAL COGNAC BRANDY. The strong recommendation it has received from medical professors and scientific gentlemen, and its use in many of the metropolitan hospitals, are a guarantee to the public for its purity and wholesome qualities, whilst the patronage he has stood upon at by noblemen and gentlemen of high standing in society, and good taste and judgment, added to its extensive consumption in the mercantile world, are a sufficient evidence of its agreeable flavour and general excellence. Indeed Mr. Grimble is borne out by the most unequivocal testimonials in stating, that the source his connection has acquired from its first introduction. As a pure brandy, and as conducive to health, it challenges competition with the most expensive growths of the Cognac district, and we are happy to recommend judge to distinguish it as flavour from the vertable cognac. The price is as heretofore, 18s. per gallon, 10s. per half gallon, 6s. per quart, 3s. per pint, 2s. per half pint, 1s. per gill, with the usual charge for bottles.—Distillery, Bow, Bromley, Regent's Park

BRANT'S ORIGINAL ORIENTAL PIQUANT SAUCE is strongly recommended and highly esteemed for the delicious flavour it imparts to Fish, Game, Poultry, Cold Meat, Hashes, Stews, &c., which renders its properties to offer it with confidence to the public, both for its quality and economy. It only requires one trial to insure its approval, it is in very general use, and much approved by the Nobility and other epicures. Manufactured and sold by J. C. BRANT, 208, Oxford-street, London, in bottles at 1s. and 2s. each Families and families will effect a saving by using the larger bottles. Discount allowed if a dozen or upwards is purchased.

Brant's Choice British Wines of every description. His Rich Hermitage, lately introduced with so much success, is pronounced by a distinguished Peer, from personal experience, to possess the genuine flavour. It surpasses anything of the kind yet offered to the public, for strength, purity, and quality.

Also, Superior Ginger Wine, so essential an article at this season of the year, with the above, for other branches of society. Send in pints, 8s. per dozen, quarts, 15s. per dozen.

THE TOILET of BEAUTY furnishes innumerable proofs of the high estimat on in which GOWLAND'S LOTION is held by the most fashionable and possessors of ardent complexions. This elegant preparation completely eradicates the preservation of the complexion has from the effects of cutaneous malady and the operation of time, by refreshing the decency and sustaining the energies of the parts with which it is associated. "Robt. Shaw, London," is in white letters on the Government stamp, without which it is not genuine. Price, 2s. 9d., 5s. 6d., quarts, 8s. 6d. Sold by all perfumers, &c.

OLD CHRISTMAS,

A SONG OF THE WASSAIL BOWL.

They say that bright Venus, when she came to wean us
From prudence, and bind us to love, boy;
Blush'd up in a glow, from the sea-deeps below,
And took flight for the palace of Jove, boy!
Old Christmas was born on a frostier morn,
But with full as much warmth in his soul, sir;
Jove's nectar his sea; like a spirit-king, he
Burst fresh into life from the bowl, sir!
From the bowl, sir!
Burst fresh into life from the bowl, sir!
Ho, ho! for Christmas! on island, sea, or isthmus,
There's no old boy brings so much joy
As jolly, holly Christmas!

He came up to town, in a green thorny crown,
Cold struck his frost-coat, and all felt it;
But he ne'er threw it off, for men soon 'gan to quaff
Of the stuff that was certain to melt it!
His coat wouldn't stay, but, dissolving away,
Drop by drop, of departure gave warning,
Till old Christmas was found, stark naked and drown'd,
In the very same bowl he was born in!
Was born in!
The very same bowl he was born in!
Ho, ho! for Christmas! on island, sea, or isthmus!
There's no old boy brings so much joy
As jolly, holly Christmas!

When Venus went mad for Adonis, dull lad,
Who was killed by a boar for his folly,
To a sweet purple flow'r he turn'd in an hour,—
When Christmas died HE turn'd to Holly!
Venus got her fair swain leave to live once again;
So Bacchus got Christmas permission
To be born every year from his wassail-bowl cheer,
And to die in its happy perdition!
Perdition!
To die in its happy perdition!
Ho, ho! for Christmas! on island, sea, or isthmus!
There's no old boy brings so much joy
As jolly, holly Christmas!

On Monday night the police received information, that on the morning of the 8th instant some person or persons wilfully and maliciously set fire to the house, stabling, and numerous outhouses, on the estate of Mr. Denison, M.P., and thereby destroyed them, together with a number of wheat and hay-ricks, several valuable horses, and a quantity of poultry. The hon. member's estate is at Dorking, Surrey. Mr. Denison has offered a reward of £100, the inhabitants of the town and neighbourhood of Dorking £270, and the Government £100, to any person who shall give such information as shall lead to the conviction of the incendiary, and a free pardon to any accomplice (not being the party who actually set fire to the property) who shall cause the offender to be apprehended.

A large number of forged Bank of England notes are in circulation. They appear to have been worked from one plate, as they are numbered 1827, and are all dated June 4, 1842.

MEMORIAL TO THE MARTYRS, OXFORD.

Oxford has always ranked high in the list of English cities as possessing a rich profusion of stately edifices and classic structures devoted to education and linked with memories and associations of learning and piety. Another feature of great interest, of considerable beauty of design and completeness of execution, has just been added to the previous attractions of the place; and we lose no time in presenting our readers with an engraving of the memorial to the martyrs built by subscription and placed in front of the Magdalen Church. It presents an imposing appearance — the design being quite in accordance with the object in view and with the general character of the chief Gothic buildings of the city. An avenue of trees leads to the martyr-memorial, which is seventy feet high, and, as will be seen by the above sketch, designed after the crosses which the virtues of Queen Eleanor led her consort to erect to her memory. Of these records of royal affection,—raised upon each spot where the funeral procession halted on the way to the place of sepulture,—three only remain; one near Northampton, recently restored by Mr. Blore; another at Waltham—the well-known Waltham cross—restored by Mr. Clark; and a third at Geddington, now in ruins. The beauty of these Gothic structures has often been the theme for admiration, and the gentlemen entrusted with the erection of the Oxford memorial have given good proof of their taste by selecting a similar design for the commemoration of the piety, learning, and melancholy fate of Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer. Adding another architectural embellishment to Oxford, this monument stands also a beacon and a warning for all future time. From the three niches in which Archbishop Cranmer, Bishop Ridley, and Bishop Latimer are now to stand, a great moral lesson will shadow itself forth. As the gazer scans the lineaments of the old martyr-divines, memory will call up the facts which history tells of their career; and as the recollection arises, that the first, although archbishop of Canterbury, was burned at Oxford on the 21st March, 1556 — the fate which had befallen Bishops Ridley and Latimer during the previous October—as imagination conjures up the live scorching flames curling around the venerable figures of the aged men, the faggots heaped plentifully about their devoted bodies, and thousands around gazing upon the frightful spectacle and persuading themselves they were doing an act pleasant to God and necessary to salvation—when all these thoughts are prompted a heartfelt thanksgiving must rise to the lips at the consideration that we live in times when such atrocities are not allowed to disgrace the name of religion, and that the rack, the thumbscrew, and the stake are no longer the ready instruments of mistaken piety, bigot zeal, or superstitious cruelty.

MEMORIAL TO THE MARTYRS, OXFORD.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—We have received a very moderate arrival of English wheat since our last report, while the stands at Mark-lane, on each market day, have been scantily filled with samples. The finest qualities of wheat of home produce have gone off steadily, at full rates of currency, but in other kinds exceedingly little has been passing. We have had a fair retail inquiry for free foreign wheat, but no improvement has taken place in prices. Although the supply of barley has proved large, the best malting sorts have gone off on full as good terms; but grinding and distilling parcels are a shade easier. Oats, beans, peas, and flour have ruled heavy, at late currencies.

ARRIVALS. English: Wheat, 4210; Barley, 16,080; Oats, 11,020; Malt, 9070 quarters; Flour, 7530 sacks. Irish: Barley, 430; and Oats, 1070 quarters. Foreign: Wheat, 600 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 46s to 55s; ditto white, 57s to 59s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 49s to 57s; do. white, 51s to 58; rye, 34s to 38s; grinding barley, 27s to 29s; malting do., 30s to 32s; Chevalier, 32s to 34s; Suffolk and Norfolk malt, 56s to 62s; brown do., 50s to 54s; Kingston and Ware, 56s to 62s; Chevalier, 63s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 23s to 24s; potato do., 25s to 26s; Youghal and Cork, black, 17s to 18s; do. white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, new, 34s to 36s; do. old, 34s to 38s; grey peas, 36s to 38s; maple, 33s to 34s; white, 30s to 35s; boilers, 32s to 37s; per quarter. Town-made flour, 44s to 45s; Suffolk, 38s to 40s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 36s to 38s; per 280 lbs.

Foreign.—Free wheat, 50s to 52s. In Bond.—Barley, 20s; oats, new, 15s to 17s; do. feed, 14s to 16s; beans, 20s to 26s; peas, 23s to 27s; per quarter. Flour, America, 23s to 24s; Baltic, 22s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—A few parcels of Cloverseed have been offering, but at very low prices. Canaryseed barely maintains its value. In other kinds of seeds scarcely anything is doing.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 48s to 57s; Baltic, crushing, 42s to 45s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 42s to 46s; hempseed, 35s to 46s; per quarter; coriander, 10s to 18s per cwt.; brown mustard seed, 10s to 11s; white do., 10s to 10s 6d; tares, 5s 0d to 5s 9d per bushel; English rapeseed, new, 30l to 33l per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, 10l to 10l 10s; do. foreign, 7l to 7l 10s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, 5l 5s to 6l per ton.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 46s 10d; barley, 26s 5d; Oats, 17s 2d; rye, 28s 11d; beans, 29s 10d; peas, 32s 2d.

Imperial Averages of Six Weeks which govern Duty.—Wheat, 48s 5d; Barley, 27s 7d; Oats, 17s 7d; Rye, 30s 5d; Beans, 30s 11d; Peas, 33s 2d per quarter.

Duty on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s 0d; Barley, 9s 0d; Oats, 8s 0d; Rye, 10s 6d; Beans, 10s 6d; Peas, 9s 0d.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5d to 6d for the 4lb loaf.

Tea.—Prices are on the decline for all sorts of tea, with a very heavy market. At the public sales buyers have operated with great caution, and the rates have fallen from 1d to 2d per lb.

Sugar.—In this market exceedingly little has been passing this week, and quotations are a shade easier. Refined sugar is much depressed. Standard lumps are selling at 73s 6d; bonded crushed, 27s per cwt.

Coffee.—We have few buyers for coffee, either for home consumption or export, yet holders refuse to give way in price.

Cocoa.—There is a slight improvement in the demand for this article, but without any advance in prices.

Rice.—Bengal is in slow request, but supports former rates. Madras is quite as dear.

Cassia Lignea.—This article has declined about 2s per cwt., with a heavy demand.

Cochineal.—Very little business has been passing in cochineal, at late rates.

Saltpetre.—The market is dull, and prices are drooping.

Tallow.—The demand is dull, at 48s on the spot, and 48s 3d to 48s 6d for forward delivery.

Oils.—This market is very inactive, and prices are again lower.

Fruit.—Our prices for fruit are very dear for the time of year, yet the inquiry is by means inactive.

Provisions.—The Irish butter-market rules dull. In foreign butter very little is doing. Holstein is selling at 105s to 110s, and Friesland 106s to 108s. per cwt. The demand for lard is steady, at 55s to 57s for Waterford bladdered. In bacon, and most other kinds of provisions, next to nothing is passing.

Coals.—Holywell Main, 17s 6d; Tanfield Moor, 19s 6d; West Wylam, 16s 3d; W. G. Brown's, 17s; Hilda, 18s; Belmont, 19s 6d; Hetton, 21s; Braddyll's Hetton, 21s 3d; Lambton, 21s; Killoe, 21s; Adelaide, 21s; Evenwood, 17s 6d. Ships arrived, 161.

Hops.—The best East Kent begs command a steady inquiry; but in all other kinds of hops scarcely anything is doing.

Potatoes.—About 2000 tons of potatoes have reached the Pool this week from Scotland and various parts of England. Owing to the mildness of the weather, the demand is heavy, at from £7 10s to £8 per ton—the latter figure being for York reds.

Smithfield.—We have had a most excellent supply of each kind of stock here this week, which has met a steady, but by no means brisk, inquiry, at the following quotations:—Beef, from 3s 2d to 4s 6d; mutton, 3s 4d to 4s 6d; veal, 3s 8d to 4s 4d; and pork, 3s 8d to 4s 8d per 8lbs., to sink the offal.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—As is invariably the case, at this season, the supplies of slaughtered meat on offer for Christmas consumption have been very good, while the trade has ruled steady. Beef, from 3s 2d to 4s; mutton, 3s 4d to 4s 2d; veal, 3s 8d to 4s 4d; and pork, 3s 8d to 4s 4d per 8lbs., by the carcase.

ROBERT HERBERT.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

In the money market the same activity has not prevailed during this week which we noticed in our last publication, nor does the same confidence exist amongst capitalists, which, for some time past, was made so visible by their money operations. In the time account for Consols a decline of nearly 1 per cent. occurred two days ago, and since then no inclination to make investments in public securities of any description has been in any particular manner manifested. For this certainly unlooked for alteration in the money market various reasons, as is usually the case, have been given, but it is difficult indeed to select the right one. The smallest breath of future evil is quite sufficient to affect opinions in the money market, particularly amongst the dealers in the British funds; and accordingly we strongly suspect that the bears, on this occasion, have engaged into their service rumours, which, no doubt, are possible, but not very probable. The chief cause given by them for the time sales which they have, within these few days, been induced to make is the state of public affairs between France and Spain, particularly the increase of bad feelings between the two governments which the late events at Barcelona have created. Of any public evil, however, arising from this cause, no fear whatever need be entertained. The present Government of Spain will be ruled by good sense, and the hostings of the Government and of the press of France will evaporate, as is usually the case, in smoke. There is a far more likely cause for the slight depression which has occurred in the value of the Consols, than the probability of an European war. We regret to state that the prospects of the public revenue for the quarter ending on the 5th January next, are anything but cheering. On the contrary, from information which we have received, another considerable deficiency in the revenue will be then made known; and the opinion that fifty millions sterling of annual taxation is a larger sum than the industry and profits of the United Kingdom can annually afford to pay will thereby be materially strengthened. This may, no doubt, for a time assist the bears in their efforts to reduce the value of the Consols, but there exists a moral energy in the British empire which will speedily remove the anticipated evil. The revival of commercial activity, both at home and abroad, must speedily restore public confidence in all public channels for the productive employment of money. In London the three leading joint stock banks are in a gradually increasing state of prosperity, and amongst the joint stock banks out of London, improved management is now rapidly improving the credit of the great majority of these institutions. In railroad shares, likewise, a fair field for the profitable employment of money still exists. The expenditure of the leading lines must now annually be reduced, whilst their profits must be annually on the increase. This is more particularly the case in the London and Birmingham, and also in the Great Junction lines; the shares of the former readily commanding a premium of £100, and those of the latter one of £91 on each share. Nearly seventy millions sterling have been already invested in railroads during the last twenty years, and, during the next twenty years, it is very probable that a field will be opened for the investment of capital to the same extent in similar undertakings. Money so employed, at the same time that it improves the nation's wealth, gives wages to thousands of families, and increases the value of agricultural produce, of manufactured goods, and of colonial products of every description. To fancy that, with such unbounded sources of internal wealth, any deficiency can long exist in our revenue is ridiculous in the extreme, and, if possible, the idea even becomes more absurd, when we look at the present brilliant prospects of our foreign commerce, whereby the manufacturing portion of our population is already fully and profitably employed throughout all the manufacturing districts.

In commercial shipping property, the great source of the great strength and stay of the British empire, we have likewise the greatest satisfaction in announcing that some improvement has occurred, the value of ships being increased, certainly not less than fifteen per cent, since the receipt of the late favourable news from the East; and freights, for vessels of the first class, can be much more easily obtained than they have been for several years past, at improved rates.

In the colonial markets appearances are not quite so satisfactory as they are in most other departments of commerce. Sugar and coffee, as articles of necessary consumption, find buyers, of course, but the value of the former remains stationary, and little animation, in a present visible in Mincing-lane transactions. The West India planters have serious difficulties to struggle against, and no materia. amendment in their prospects can immediately be expected by them.

In Mark-lane we regret to say that no improvement has occurred during the week in the value of any description of agricultural produce, but still, after the turn of the year, a considerable improvement in the value of Wheat is anticipated by those whose opinions on agricultural affairs are at all times respectable, because they possess the best sources of information.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 34.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1842. [SIXPENCE.

OFFICE, 198, STRAND.

THE CLOSE OF THE YEAR 1842.

This is our last appearance before our readers in the year which gave us birth, and we have soon to buckle on our armour for a fresh campaign. Eighteen hundred and forty-two is well-nigh departed to his fathers, and

> In the endless vault of eternity,
> His coffin is the last of the row.

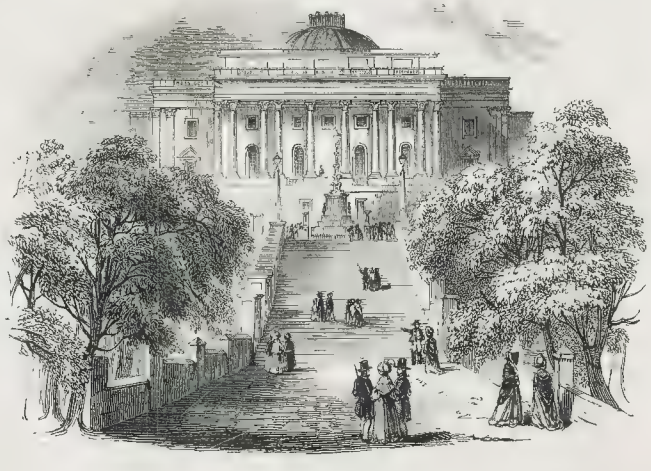
But the departure of years, like that of old friends, brings with it a train of reflection, wholesome in its nature and humanizing in its influence upon the heart. It almost imposes a retrospect of life and conduct, and in a public career it forces the politician, the legislator, and the statesman to watch the consequences of their actions, and to draw philosophy from results. It points, in fact, to all classes the duty of looking back even for their onward guidance; and the journalist is no more morally exempt in his vocation than other members of the social body which comprises the universal brotherhood of mankind. We shall, therefore, retro-glance with our neighbours upon the time that has slipped from under our feet.

When THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS began a career that has since slid into the full tide of prosperity, and kept buoyantly dancing upon the stream, it set out upon its voyage with a cargo of principles, which we trust will never be exhausted, as long as the vessel is owned by its present proprietors, and its present pilots steer. Many contended then that it could never attain to political influence, nor reach anything more than a mere pictorial renown. Even the novel, and hitherto unopened, field of art was to be exhausted speedily, and the newspaper which was to be a picture-book was not even to be that long. Now, two thirds only of the period of the past year have sufficed to astonish and undeceive the short-sighted prophets of our destiny, and have established a principle as important to truth and morality as to literature and art. They have proved, first, that while the every-day topics of the time can force even art itself to keep pace with their rapidity of action and event, the public might also arrive at the possession of what seemed a toy only to become a treasure—of novelty without frivolity—of pictorial spirit and reflection without the accompaniments of vapidity or grimace. It was proved possible to produce a seriously useful family newspaper, with illustrations, and to find new stars for the firmament of politics and history that could shine gracefully in the kindred society of the old. It linked art and literature in a new bond of kindred, and opened a fresh mine of mental and industrial pursuit. Secondly, it conquered the prejudice that principles and pictures, that mere embellishment and truthful sense and argument, could never harmoniously co-exist. "You may sell," said semi-observant flippancy, "you may sell for your plates, but never for your politics; you may command circulation, but you must not dream of influence." Now this doctrine is, we rejoice to say, crashed utterly by the present position of our journal. Never before was so much influence commanded with so much circulation; for, with the exception of the Times, and among the weekly journals generally, those which have had the largest amount of sale have had it among the least influential classes, so far as the effect of opinion is concerned, and have rather obtained it by abundant news detail than by the vindication of any system of political morality. We have endeavoured to steer a different course, and have succeeded. We have abjured party—abandoned mere politics, in their abstract sense of creed and class—studied and thought only of the purer principles of general good to mankind in their properly established relations to each other, and set up as our landmarks the symbols of eternal justice and eternal truth. We have sought no favour, pandered to no influence, avoided no contention, disgraced no public cause with a partial advocacy, nor attacked one with an ungenerous blow. Circulating much, perhaps chiefly, amongst the higher and middle classes, we have yet stood sturdily by the swelling bulk of the people, and have heartily championized the poor. It is no small pride to us that we have won the esteem of the working classes, and we have hundreds of testimonials to that effect. The letters we have received are ill-spelt and illiterate, but they are honest, hearty, and sincere, and many of them breathe the genuine spirit of true old English temper and feeling. From the middle ranks we have received a sweeping and abundant support; while the patronage afforded us by the clergy of the Established Church—we presume as a sound organ for proper instruction to the people—has not been in a single instance opposed by the regrets or disapproval of any other religious denomination or sect. On the contrary, we have been thanked for impartiality on all hands. We are not so silly as to imagine, either, that any class of our readers will be offended by learning that several letters from branches of the nobility have vouched our entrée into the regions of aristocracy, and that the journal which we have so much pleasure in endeavouring to render interesting to her subjects is weekly taken in considerable numbers within the palace of their Queen. In fact, our influence has been of that pervading nature which spreads over the whole surface of society like the bubble upon the stream—and mixes with all as harmoniously as do the ingredients in a well-blended bowl of punch—such a bowl as our merry Christmas was born from—and such punch as we would drink from to the happiness of our readers for the new year.

Such is the result of our eight months of existence—such the retrospect upon which we may pleasantly look back. And this position, established from the past, will be to our readers great guarantee for the future. Already are the conductors and proprietors of this journal devising new phases of pictorial attraction to place before our readers. The great anniversaries of public events are about to be abundantly illustrated—the features of foreign courts and capitals will be brought, as the news-occasion admits, into familiar contrast with those of our native land. Our colonies, as each supplies its juncture of interest, will receive graphic depicture upon our pages, and new and faithful forms of portraiture will soon be brought before our readers with recognizable truth. In the meanwhile no incident of the moment will be overlooked, and the same rapidity which has characterized our previous aptitude, in, as it were, engraving the news of the time, and giving life and vigour to the page of history, will be not only still manifested, but even increased by our employment of every available appliance of modern art. Some striking feature of novelty, also, that may accord with the spirit in which the Colosseum print will next week be presented to our subscribers will be speedily submitted to the attention of our friends.

By our principles we shall abide. We write of measures, not men, except when good men are propounding good measures. Minister nor peer nor magistrate will ever meet with more respect from us in comment than our readers have found us bestowing upon them hitherto in any juncture in which they ceased to respect themselves. On the other hand they are all cordially welcome to our full award of deserved approval, and none shall bestow it with more glowing heart than ourselves. Our battle will still be for what is moral, what is pure, what is humane, what is intelligent, what is just; for peace, rational government, and a generous charity to the poor; for the respect that is due to station, society, and the laws; for the best attainable order of national happiness that may be gained without convulsion, and unsullied by crime.

And now commend us affectionately to our readers, and let us prepare to put on the raiment of 1843.



THE CAPITOL AT WASHINGTON,

We avail ourselves of the occasion of the President's message (a summary of which will be found in another column) to present our readers with a view of the tasteful and spacious building in which the sittings of the American Congress are held, and in which, of course, the speech in question was delivered. Our space will not permit us to do more than call attention to this specimen of architecture, which does infinite credit to the taste of the Americans, who are proud of their metropolis, although, unlike the other American cities and towns, it does not increase as it ought to do either in population or wealth, owing to its uncommercial character.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—The Paris papers of Friday week were comparatively free from the war-exciting articles which had distinguished and disgraced their columns for some days previously. The Spanish intermittent was passing away, and the symptoms of the Anglophobia were less rabid.

The Moniteur Universel of Saturday published the following royal ordonnance:—

LOUIS PHILIPPE, King of the French.—To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting. On the report of our President of the Council of Ministers and Minister Secretary of State of the War Department, we have ordained and do ordain as follows:—

Art. 1. Those who have rendered to the state, in high public functions, eminent services, may receive from us the title and rank of Ministers of State.

Art. 2. No one can be appointed a Minister of State who has not been a Minister Secretary of State, Chancellor of France, President of the Chamber of Peers, President of the Chamber of Deputies, Marshal of France, Admiral, Ambassador, Grand Chancellor of the Legion of Honour, First President of the Court of Cassation, Procureur-General at the Court of Cassation, First President of the Court of Accounts, Procureur-General of the Court of Accounts, Vice-President of the Council of State, Governor of the Invalides, Governor-General or Commander-in-Chief of an army, Superior Commandant of the National Guards of the Seine, First President of the Court Royale of Paris, or Procureur-General of the Cour Royale of Paris.

Art. 3. When we shall think fit to assemble a Privy Council round our person, it shall be formed of—First, princes of our family, having attained their majority in age; secondly, ministers, secretaries of state in office; thirdly, such ministers of state as we shall call upon by special summons.

Art. 4. Our President of the Council of Ministers and our Keeper of the Seals, are charged with the execution of this ordonnance.

LOUIS PHILIPPE.

(Countersigned) Marshal Duc de DALMATIE.

The above ordonnance is preceded by the annexed report to the King of the French, dated the 23rd instant, from Marshal Soult, the President of the Council:—

SIRE—It is of importance to the dignity of the throne of your Majesty, and to the authority of our institutions, that the men who have rendered eminent services to the King and the country should remain bound by their position as well as by their duty to your Majesty, and that you may on occasions, when you think it fitting, call them towards you, and avail yourself of the light of their experience. This object will be more surely obtained in all well-ordered states by the formation of a Privy Council, which, without taking any part in the administration of public affairs, or in the action or responsibility of the King's Government, may be rallied round the Crown, whenever it requires the advice of men of honoured names; and nothing is more suited to promote the interests, as it is to the dignity of the state, than to ensure to men who have served it in its most important affairs a position correspondi ng to the rank they have filled, and to which the King may reel them. To be mindful of past services is ill becoming a great nation and a wise Government. The object of the ordonnance I have the honour to lay before your Majesty for signature is to confer on the Executive in matters of ecclesiastical business and other affairs, the power to call together the Chambers, in the course of the ensuing session, such additional measures as may be necessary for carrying it into execution.

Marshal Duc de DALMATIE.

The above project of law, which is nothing more nor less than to provide retiring pensions for ex-ministers, will provoke the most animated debates in the Chambers, and is a bold challenge thrown down by M. Guizot to the Opposition.

The Bordeaux and Nantes Chamber of Commerce had sent up delegates to Paris, with strong remonstrances to the Minister of Commerce, M. Cunin Gridaine, against the suppression of the native sugar refining, with an indemnity to the beet-root growers.

The Presse of Monday asserts that the Cabinet had postponed the projected creation of Peers all after the meeting of the Chambers. Havre, like Bordeaux and Nantes, deman ds the suppression of the beet-root sugar manufacture on payment of an indemnity. The agitation, therefore, extending to commercial and home interests, were fast arriving in Paris, to agitate the Ministry of Commerce and the Chambers on the sugar question.

It was stated that the King of Naples had consulted on M. de Lesseps, the French Consul, and M. Gatlier, commanding the French naval station off Barcelona, the cross of St. Maurice for their exertions on behalf of Sardinian sub jects during the late disturbances.

NEWS FROM THE EAST.—PACIFIC SOLUTION OF THE SYRIAN QUESTION.—Despatches, by extraordinary express, from Vienna, reached the French Government on Monday afternoon, dated the 21st, stating that a special courier had arrived in that capital with the important advices from Constantinople that the Porte had consented to the appointment of a Christian governor for the Maronite or Christian population of Syria, and a Druse governor for the Druse.

The Messager and Moniteur Parisien of Monday night publish the above interesting intelligence.

TRIAL OF JACQUES BESSON FOR THE MURDER OF M. DE MARCELLANGE.—This trial, which excites intense and general interest, on account of the extraordinary circumstances connected with it, and the suspicions of complicity against persons in a distinguished position of society, which have been current for a long time past, commenced on the 19th instant, before the Court of Assizes for the Rhone, held at Lyons. Besson, the person now under trial, and who is about 36 years of age, was a discharged farm servant of M. de Marcellange, a gentleman of property, living in a state of separation from his wife, the daughter of Count and Countess de la Rochenegly de Chambilas. The cause of this separation appears to have been the arrival in the family of M. de Marcellange of the mother of his wife, who, at the death of her husband, came to reside with her daughter, until that time, M. and Mme. de Marcellange had lived in harmony, or, if there were occasional differences, they were made up by the mediation of the Count de Chambilas, who frequently visited the married couple, his son-in-law, M. de Marcellange. From the moment of his death, everything changed. Mme. de Marcellange, instigated by her mother, made the home of her husband wretched, by brought, as shown by all the evidence on the present trial, he was a man of most amiable manners, of great kindness of heart, and was esteemed and respected by all who knew him, with the exception of the individuals implicated directly or indirectly in his murder. She commenced a suit of separation of person and property against him, and was defeated. During and after this suit M. de Marcellange resided on another property belonging to him in the same part of the country, and, being fond of agriculture, employed himself in farming his own land. His two children had died, and a strong impression was fixed on his mind that they had come by their death unfairly, the mother having, as he supposed, made her hate of the father fall upon the innocent offspring, but nothing has transpired to show that this suspicion was well founded. Besson, after his discharge, entered into the service of Mme. de Marcellange and her mother, and had not only menaced his former master, but had more than once insulted him to his face. His dislike of M. de Marcellange was notorious, and that gentleman frequently expressed to Dr. Leslie, a Scotch gentleman, who was the physician firing a gun. Another gentleman who is well versed in Mexican affairs is strongly of the opinion that there will be a battle, and that it will result in the entire defeat of Santa Anna's forces. The Mexican troops commenced their march from Seba Paya towards Campeachy on the 6th inst. The next arrival will probably bring us the whole story.

Up to the 12th, Captain Chatwood, of the iron steamer Guadaloupe, had not arrived at Vera Cruz, and was consequently ignorant of his recal by his Government. Report says that the Mexican Government is about to make him an offer of £5000 to induce him to throw up his commission in the British navy, but it is said he will not accede to anything of the kind.

George S. Curson, Esq., bearer of despatches to General Thompson, was met at Perote on the evening of the 10th instant, on his way to the city of Mexico, by the remaining arms.

The English brig of war Ringdove has been remaining some time at Vera Cruz, waiting for money to take home. The English Government has a small claim on the custom-house at Vera Cruz, and takes one-sixth of all the customs collected. Whenever an amount sufficient to ship is collected, a vessel is sent to take it with it.

LATEST FROM TEXAS.—Advices from Galveston to the 26th ult. have been received at New Orleans. Captain Eills, the British consul, had passed through Houston, on his way to the seat of Government. It was said that a quorum of the two Houses of Congress would be formed by the 30th inst. About three weeks ago Mr. B. Garrett was shot dead in a street of St. Augustine by General Henderson. Garner had for several days threatened to kill General Henderson, and had carried a gun for that purpose. A furious "norther" swept over Texas about the middle of the month. It was the first of the season; ice formed, and woollen garments were necessary to comfort.

COUNTRY NEWS.

BRIDGEWATER.—EXTENSIVE FIRE CAUSED BY A BALLOON.—Information was received at the various insurance offices throughout the metropolis of a serious fire having occurred on Wednesday week, near the village of Westonzoyland, a few miles from Bridgewater, occasioned by a fire balloon. The circumstances under which it took place are as follow:—In the early part of the week the village was placarded in all directions, announcing the arrival of the wonderful Wizard of the South, and that he would honour the inhabitants with a grand performance on the evening in question (Tuesday), the commencement of which would be signalized by the ascent of a "monster" fire balloon. Accordingly at the time named a great crowd assembled to witness the fête, and the balloon was sent off to the apparent delight of all, but before it attained any great elevation, the machine suddenly burst into flames, and unfortunately descended into an extensive stack-yard of Mr. Taswell, about a mile from the village, where it set fire to a valuable rick of wheat, and before the inhabitants could bear down upon the premises, two adjoining stacks ignited, and blazed away with awful violence.

ALARMING ACCIDENT ON THE LONDON AND BRIGHTON RAILWAY.—On Wednesday morning last, about a quarter before twelve, an alarming accident occurred on the Shoreham branch of the London and Brighton Railway. It appears that the train was proceeding to Shoreham, drawn by an engine called "The Brighton." Shortly after passing the How Station, about two miles from Brighton, several of the tubes of the engine burst with a loud report. A number of persons were immediately attracted to the spot, when it was found that the engine-driver, named William Cavan, was most severely scalded on the legs and abdomen. The stoker and Mr. Meredith, one of the chief engineers to the Company, who happened to be on the tender at the time, miraculously escaped unhurt. The connecting-rods and other parts of the machinery were found by the policeman stationed at How, at a considerable distance from the spot where the accident occurred. Although Cavan is severely scalded, it is expected he will in a short time be able to resume his duty.

CROYDON.—ALARMING FIRE.—On Wednesday information was received at the chief station of the brigade force in Watling-street, of a destructive fire breaking out about one o'clock in the morning at the Greyhound Inn, opposite the Town-hall, Croydon. The first alarm was given was Mrs. Martin (wife of the proprietor), who had retired to bed and was awoke by the smoke; but the exact spot of the fire could not be found until the inmates had effected an escape, when, upon the police entering, they discovered the flames burning fiercely in the cellars under the counting-house. The alarm bell in the town being immediately rung, plenty of assistance was soon on the spot, and, after some exertion, the fire was prevented from extending further than the cellars. It is supposed to have been occasioned by a spark falling from a candle into a heap of sawdust on the previous day which some casks were being unloaded into the cellar.

MANCHESTER.—STATE OF TRADE.—Since Tuesday last there has been a gradual improvement in the demand for manufactured goods of nearly every description; and, though the amount of actual business has not been very large, a slight advance of price may be noted in all the leading fabrics, with a very firm feeling on the part of the manufacturers. In yarns, for the season, very little business has been done, but the market exhibits a decided increase of firmness as compared with that of last week; and such of the spinners as feel inclined to make contracts for future delivery have little difficulty in doing so at prices rather above those at present prevailing. The partial suspension of the Yorkshire Agricultural Bank creates no sensation here, as its business is understood to have been very limited, and quite out of the ordinary range of Manchester engagements.

NEWCASTLE ON TYNE. -POACHING AND LOSS OF LIFE.—Intelligence was on Friday week received in this town of an inroad of poachers upon the lands of Kirk-cle-hall, in this county, the seat of the very Rev. John Saville Ogle, dean of Winchester. It appears that the gamekeeper of that gentleman was watching on the previous evening, when the poachers, who were discovered on the grounds, fired off their guns and fled, leaving one of their party, who was subsequently found dead, having received the contents of a gun in his thigh, evidently from his own party in mistake, as Mr. Ogle's keepers were without fire-arms. Medical aid was immediately procured, but life was soon extinct, the deceased having received nearly the whole charge of shot, which had divided the artery, from which he had bled to death. The body has not been identified.

OXFORD.—On Tuesday morning, between the hours of two and three o'clock, considerable alarm was created in the High-street, by loud cries of fire, the flames of which were seen issuing from the front shop of Mr. J. Gardner, chemist and druggist, opposite the Angel Hotel. A few many persons were soon on the spot, and on the arrival of the engines belonging to the city, New College, and the Clarendon printing-office, rendered essential service in working them, which, aided by a good supply of water, and great exertion on the part of the firemen, kept the fire confined to Mr. Gardner's house and shop, the interior of which was very much damaged, the whole of his stock in trade, fixtures, &c., being completely destroyed. Had the fire once gained an ascendancy the whole of the surrounding buildings would soon have been demolished, as that part of the High-street abounds with close-built courts, alleys and courts. The house adjoining, belonging to Mr. Rusher, surgeon, was materially damaged, but more from water than fire. Mr. Gardner's stock was insured; the cause of the fire remains a mystery.

SALISBURY.—On Tuesday morning a labouring man, named Samuel Bruton, was found dead at his lodging, in a yard leading out of Gigant-street, under circumstances which lead to the suspicion of his having coming by his death in a violent manner.

TRURO.—PROVINCIAL THEATRICALS.—On Monday, a most extraordinary occurrence cut short the evening's amusements. The curtain had just fallen at the close of the third act of Othello, when a sudden uproar behind the scenes announced that the performance of some parts not in the play-bill. After some minutes of suspense, the Moor himself, bearing on his cheek and visage evident marks of a recent scuffle, came forward and explained the cause of the confusion. It appeared that the person to whom had been assigned the part of Cassio, not trusting to his own powers to do justice to the character, had qualified himself to enact the drunken scene by ample potations, forgetting that it was necessary he should be sober when the scene was over. Losing all command of himself off the stage, having probably been excited by his injured quarrel, he knocked down the manager, furiously attacked the rest of the company, and finally made his escape in full costume. After some delay, two or three scenes minus Cassio were got through, and the spectators, after having been presented with free tickets of admission to the next performance, quitted the house. Wynne, the delinquent, although a warrant has been issued for his apprehension, has not since been heard of.

WARWICKSHIRE.—CHARGE OF WILFUL MURDER.—On Wednesday information was received at Bow-street, and thence to the various metropolitan and city police offices and stations, that a man, named James Crowley, of Warwickshire, stood charged with having committed wilful murder on Christmas-day last, the full particulars of which, however, were not appended to the information. Crowley is described as follows, viz.:—5 feet 9 inches high, stout made, has a mark or seam over one of his eyebrows, good-looking, and of gentlemanly appearance, and when last seen was dressed in a dark cloth coat, black shining boots, and leather leggings. After committing the murder he absconded, taking with him a horse of the following description:—A bright bay, switch tail, nearly thoroughbred, one hip down, black legs, ewe-necked, and about 15 hands 1 inch high. A reward of £20 will be paid for the apprehension of the murderer, on application to Mr. B. Johnson, churchwarden, Spernal, Warwickshire.

IRELAND.

THE CHINESE HEROES.—At the meeting of the Limerick Corporation on Monday week, Alderman Watson gave notice of a motion of thanks to the gallant officers, natives of Limerick, who distinguished themselves in China, namely—Sir Hugh Gough, Captain Boucher, and Major Sergeant and his son, 18th Royal Irish. Councillor N. Kelly suggested that, as Limerick had ever been distinguished for the gallantry of its ladies, the name of Lady Sale should be included. Alderman Watson said he would do so with great pleasure, and he read an extract from the letter of the Rev. Mr. Spencer's sermon in support of his views respecting the China treaty.

As a party of revenue police were searching for potteen through the mountains of Barnes in the county of Donegal, they discovered a still-house, in which was a still at full work, and round the fire lay two men in a state of insensibility from intoxication, and another man quite dead. The police did all in their power to restore animation, but in vain; the unfortunate man was called before his Maker while in a state of drunkenness. The two other men are slowly recovering. Private distillation to a great extent is going on throughout this and the neighbouring counties.

Lord William Fitzgerald, the second youngest son of the Duke of Leinster, was meddling incautiously with a loaded fowling-piece, on Christmas-eve, at Carton, when the charge suddenly exploded, and inflicted such damage on his Lordship's middle finger that an amputation of the injured member was rendered inevitable. The operation was skilfully performed, on the day following, by Surgeon Adams, of Gardner's-place, and the noble patient is now in a fair way of recovery.

The Limerick Chronicle states, that Major-General Lord Downes will in all probability be the successor of the late Major-General Hamilton in the command of the south-western or Limerick district. Lord Downes, better known as Sir Urysses Burgh, served on the personal staff of "the Duke" all through the Peninsular war.

The deanery of Saint Patrick's, vacant by Mr. Daly's elevation, has been offered to, and accepted by the Archdeacon Pakenham.

The Lord Primate has appointed the Rev. Dr. Miller, of Armagh, to the office of Vicar-General of the diocese of Armagh, on the resignation of Dr. Radcliffe, who, however, continues to be Judge of the Prerogative Court in Dublin.

MR. O'CONNELL AND THE IRISH POOR-LAW.—Mr. O'Connell has addressed, through the columns of the Cork Reporter, a long letter, or rather essay, on the subject of the Irish Poor-law, accompanied by comments on its history from its first conception, its working, and its effects upon all classes of the community, until, by the almost unanimous concurrence of all parties, it is pronounced to be, in its present shape, totally unsuited to the circumstances of the country. The enormous length of this communication prevents the possibility of even a reasonable abridgment. It must, therefore, be sufficient to add, that while some have declared for a repeal of the law altogether, others for material changes and reconstruction, Mr. O'Connell advocates the former measure, following in regard to it by augmenting the present medical charities. Here are the concluding passages of the non- and learned gentleman's letter:—"Another necessary consequence of the continuance of the Poor-law in Ireland must be the giving of out-door relief; regard to mere decency be suppressed. In that case, out-door relief must, of course, be given in all pressing cases. But, after all, it is monstrous to talk of a Poor-law without out-door relief. If there be a principle at all in the Poor-law, it must extend itself to giving relief to all who want it, whether in the poorhouse or out of the poorhouse. Had not that been true, to such a length, there are many other points relative to the Poor law that I should touch on, more especially to illustrate the difficulties which occur, even in levying an universal poor-rate. I deeply deplore that I cannot discover means of avoiding the inevitable conclusion, that the Poor-law will be in Ireland what Talleyrand called 'beginning of the end.' It will be, in my opinion, the last drop in the filling up of the waters of bitterness to make them overflow the land. It will give to Whitebyism and to Ribbonism another and a most melancholy feature. It will give the last worst phasis to the agrarian system of disturbance—the warfare between landlord and tenant. Shall you ask what is my remedy? My remedy would be the restoration to Ireland of her nationality—of her domestic legislature. Ireland is by nature and by natural advantages, the richest country in the world; the best situate for commerce and manufactures; infinitely the most productive of all the necessaries of life. It, therefore, appears to me plain as the clearest demonstration, that her people are poor and wretched only because they are not well governed; and above all, because, in the present system of the union, the resources of Ireland are drained out of her as fast as they spring up. But there are some of you whom I do not now expect to make converts to that national sentiment. There are, alas! amongst you many who are nationless, as I fear there are some who are careless, save only in a creed of hate. I cannot, therefore, expect to make you love Ireland, or to become Irishmen—all that belongs to another (and I trust not a distant) day. I therefore must propose to you my present remedies. They are few with an alternative. My first is, the total repeal of the present Poor-law. Ireland was not worse before the Tate Poor-law was enacted than she is at present. My second is, to follow up that repeal by augmenting the present medical charities, and extending the same principle to the multiplication and management of other charities. Or, if in lieu of both, you are to have a Poor-law), to make the poor-rate an Income-tax; all persons to be exempt who have not an income of £500 per annum. The poor-rate to be, say 1 per cent. upon £500 a-year, and to augment in proportion as the income augments, until, if necessary, it should be 20 per cent. upon the enormous incomes of absentee proprietors. An experiment of this description, but not carried out to the extent which I propose, has mitigated the horrors of the time system. Let it be distinctly understood that I propose that no man should pay poor-rate who has not £500 a year; but that the owner of £500 a year should pay one per cent., and that such per centage should increase in the ratio of one for every additional hundred per annum. The actual per centage, however, would not be an essential part of my plan. The principle of that plan is, to except all persons under £500 a year, and to levy the poor-rate by a graduated income-tax upon every person having that income, with an accumulating ratio for greater incomes. It is quite clear that no violent resistance, no insurrectionary movement, would be created by the plan which I propose. It is the wealthy alone who would, on my plan, be compelled to support the paupers. And the self-interest of the class, with the power which naturally belongs to them from their station in the State, would effectually protect them from the faults and the follies of the Poor-law Commissioners."

AFFAIR OF HONOUR IN CLIFDEN.—A hostile meeting took place at Clifden, on Wednesday week, between Henry Ainsworth, Hildebrand, Esq., of Boffin, and Patrick Bowes Daly, Esq., brother of the Rev. Dr. Daly, of Galway. The parties, attended by their friends, W. Conneys, Esq., of Augbris, for the former, and Francis Browne, Esq., for the latter, met in a field near Clifden Castle. After an exchange of shots, Mr. Hildebrand apologised in suitable terms, and they left the ground perfectly reconciled. The quarrel arose out of a discussion on National Education, which took place at a private party given at the house of Dr. Morgan, and at which both gentlemen were guests.

DREADFUL LOSS OF LIFE IN THE CATHOLIC CHAPEL OF GALWAY.—The Dublin Pilot of Monday contains the following account of a dreadful accident at Galway, on Christmas morning:—Galway, Dec. 25.—As a constant reader of your paper I write to give you the earliest information of a very sad catastrophe which occurred in this town this morning at the parish chapel, whereby from forty to fifty persons were killed, under the following awful circumstances:—As is usual here on every Christmas morning, the first mass is read at the parish chapel at six o'clock A.M. The doors are opened at five o'clock. There is always an Irish sermon at first, which is attended almost exclusively by the country people, the inhabitants of the liberties of the town, and the working classes. Before six o'clock the chapel was so densely crowded that there was no getting into it, either by the aisle or gallery. In the centre of the aisle, and under a large chandelier, is a high step ladder, which opens out in the form of the letter A. On this some persons were crowding up, and, by some means or other, broke one or two of the steps. The noise of the crash or break being heard plainly in the gallery, the persons there thought that it was giving way, whereupon a simultaneous rush was made to the staircase (which is not very wide); some of the first getting down, from the great pressure, fell, and those immediately behind them fell over them, and thus, from the constant pressure from above, there was no time to extricate them, until, melancholy to relate, from forty to fifty have been taken up quite dead. Never was a more distressing scene witnessed than the multitudes coming in from the surrounding districts, looking out for some friend or other amongst the dead, and then the screams and shouts as each discovered a father, mother, sister, or brother! While I write seven coffins lie at the Commercial News-room; the town dispensary is also full, as are the watch-house and Temperance-rooms, and the sacristy of the chapel. One of the doctors in attendance tells me he never heard of so many cases without one recovery; in short, any one that fell, did so to rise no more. Not the smallest damage was done to the chapel, with the exception of some of the windows, which the crowd broke, and threw themselves out into the street, so dreadful was the alarm; others threw themselves into the aisle of the chapel. If all had remained quiet, no damage would have been done, as there was no ground for the alarm.

FURTHER PARTICULARS.—Drs. Callahan, Browne, Gray, Moran, and O'Grady are using all their skill for the sufferers. Their names are John Philips, James Walsh, Thomas Hardiman, Mary Laffey, John Downes, Thomas Commins, Honor Laffey, John Summervi le, John Burke, John Murray, Mark Laffey, Mary Synnot, Honor Kelly, Michael Rooney, Mary Clougherty, Celia Commins, Pat Connelly, Pat Forde, Luke Costello, Dooley, Connely, Mary Curley, P. Hemple, Biddy Reardon, Boulger, Henry. Four names unknown. At this moment (two o'clock) thirty-five persons are dead, and it is supposed that from ten to fifteen more will shortly be numbered among the dead. There are a great many, besides, maimed; they are all of the lower class, such as poor tradesmen, labourers, and servants. There was no danger at all of the gallery giving way; it is very strongly built, and would bear four times the weight that was on it at the time. There must have been between four and five thousand people in it at the time.

The Augsburg Gazette of the 22nd inst. states, on the authority of a letter from Constantinople, that the Ottoman Porte has yielded the arbitrament of the affairs of Servia to the great European powers, and that the French and English Ambassadors immediately sent despatches to their respective governments requiring instructions.

GERMANY AND AMERICA.—We find the following in the Journal de Frankfort of the 23rd instant:—"It is said that a treaty of commerce is about to be concluded between Austria and the United States of America. The negociations which have taken place between Prince Metternich and M. Jenifer, the American Minister at the Court of Vienna, are sufficiently advanced to leave no doubt of the speedy conclusion of the treaty. On the other hand, the negociations going on at Berlin, for the same object, do not proceed with the same success. It is true that the German Customs Union being composed of several states, the negociations must necessarily be of long duration, and attended with more difficulties. We hope, however, that the example of Austria will not be lost."

MALTA.—The Secretary to Government has communicated to the body of merchants a notification received from her Britannic Majesty's Consul at Tripoli, that the Pacha of that place has prohibited the exportation of cattle for the space of two months, owing to the scarcity of beasts, produced by the policy of the late Pacha, Askar Ali.

INTENDED OUTBREAK AT GENEVA.—The following appears in the Courrier de Genève of the 24th inst.:—"It is pretty publicly declared that a conspiracy has been formed against the state, and that the insurgents intend acting by night and by surprise; they intend, as is declared, to arrest the members of the Government, to seize on the Hôtel de Ville and the gates of the town, to form a provisional government, and to act afterwards as may seem fit. We announce this intelligence merely as a coffee-house rumour, but it is generally spread abroad, and we recommend our fellow-citizens to be ready to repair, whether by day or night, to the Place d'Armes at the first alarm. Accounts, which we conceive to be perfectly correct, inform us besides that emissaries have been going through the rural communes to obtain their assistance in the coup de main that is in preparation, and that in general they have been very ill received."

METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS.—Mr. Cubitt has commenced the foundation for a splendid casan pier on the Marquis of Westminster's Pimlico estate on Thames-bank, opposite St. George's-square. Part of the gas works are to come down to complete the road now making from Vauxhall-bridge to Battersea-bridge. Mr. Cubitt has also opened a commodious road from Vauxhall-bridge through Lincoln-place, Bessborough-place, Marsham-street, Eccleston-square, Eaton-square, and Belgrave-square, to Albert-gate at Knightsbridge.

THE MODEL PRISON, PENTONVILLE.—The Secretary of State having certified to the Commissioners his approval of the dietary rules and regulations for the government of the Model Prison, it is now finally settled that the prison shall be tenanted by a certain number of convicts who may receive the sentence of seven years' transportation at the ensuing Epiphany Quarter Sessions, which will be held throughout the country at the commencement of the next week. By the rules of the establishment, the term of the convicts' captivity will extend from two to three years; but this will in a great degree depend on good conduct, for should the prisoner become refractory, he will be at once removed from Pentonville to the mills, to undergo the full term of his sentence.

A numerous public meeting of the rate-payers and inhabitants of the parish of St. Matthew, Bethnal-green, was convened at La Patente Chapel, Brown's-lane, Spitalfields, on Wednesday evening, to receive the Poor-law Commissioners' answer to the memorial for an increase of food to the poor, and on other matters relating to the comfort of the distressed poor and suffering rate-payers; Mr. Hyne in the chair. The chairman having stated the object of the meeting and the commissioners' answer having been read, Mr. Shevill moved the following resolution, "That the Poor-law Commissioners' answer to the memorial, as far as relates to the dietary, is unsatisfactory to the meeting, and that it is painful to hear the continued complaints of the inmates of the new workhouse, particularly of the aged, who want more bread, and not so much soup days, in spite of the opinion of an eminent physician that soup without bread is injurious to the stomach, impairing the digestive functions, and inducing diseases and debility; and that this meeting is dissatisfied with the poor-law dietary, and pledge themselves that if it be not amended by the Board of Guardians and the Poor-law Commissioners, to petition Parliament, or take such other legal measures that may be advised to remedy the evil." This resolution, with several others, declaratory of the intentions of the meeting, was unanimously adopted, and the meeting adjourned.

Thirteen families have been thrown on the parish of St. James, Clerkenwell, for support within the last few days, in consequence of the male parents having deserted them. The authorities of the parish have publicly offered a reward for the apprehension of the deserters, some of whom were tradesmen in comfortable circumstances.

JOLLY, HOLLY CHRISTMAS!

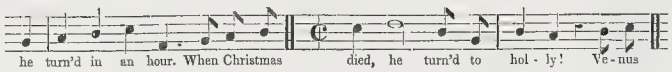
Music to the 3rd and 4th lines of the 3rd verse.



He came up to town, in a green thorny crown,
Cold struck his frost-coat, and all felt it;
But he ne'er threw it off, for men soon 'gan to quaff
Of the stuff that was certain to melt it!
His coat wouldn't stay, but, dissolving away,
Drop by drop, of departure gave warning,
Till old Christmas was found, stark naked and drown'd,
In the very same bowl he was born in!
Was born in
The very same bowl he was born in!
Ho, ho! for Christmas! on island, sea, or isthmus!
There's no old boy brings so much joy
As jolly, holly Christmas!

When Venus went mad for Adonis, dull lad,
Who was killed by a boar for his folly,
'To a sweet purple flow'r he turn'd in an hour; –
When Christmas died HE turn'd to Holly!
Venus got her fair swain leave to live once again;
So Bacchus got Christmas permission
To be born every year from his wassail-bowl cheer,
And to die in its happy perdition!
Perdition!
To die in its happy perdition!
Ho, ho! for Christmas! on island, sea, or isthmus!
There 's no old boy brings so much joy
As jolly, holly Christmas!

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, 27th December, 1843.

Mon cher, Monsieur,—As I have long foretold, the paletots have now become extremely fashionable; indeed, I may say that they are the only description of out-door dress generally patronised by our first-rate élégantes. The one which forms the subject of the sketch at the head of this article presents improvements which are not perceivable in the engraving: it is the invention of one of our first houses. It is remarkable for its novelty, its distinguished appearance, and for its supreme comfort. Its form, happily combined so as to give full effect to the height of the figure and to carry off all appearance of unseemly breadth, affords, nevertheless, every facility for being worn over all descriptions of toilettes. In fact, the paletot is the reproduction of the witchoura in everything but the name and the slight modifications which fashion has given to it, and, as such, it may be safely characterised as the prettiest promenade toilette which a woman can adopt. It is something more, it is the triumph of fur; for in order that the paletot may be really handsome and rational it must be lined with chinchilla or ermine. We have seen several of this sort from one of our most famous establishments, in velvets of all colours, and in satins of every variety of beauty. Those which have the turn-backs lined with ermine are often accompanied with a pelerine of the same; and when that is the case an ermine muff becomes an indispensable adjunct. In ball dresses I have not yet remarked much difference since my last letter, excepting, perhaps, some slight ornaments formed of ribbons upon tulle or of flowers upon gauze, which, after all, amount to but little, and which require to be seen to be appreciated. But it is otherwise with a most charming and elegant ornament of our ball costumes, which I will now endeavour to describe; it is a garland of artificial flowers, arranged either lengthways from the bottom to the top on each side of the skirt, or as detached bouquets surrounding the bottom of the robe, or of Pompadour garlands fixed upon the front of this robe, all of which have a most enchanting effect, and are really novelties. Some of these wreaths are of mulberries with velvet leaves, others are garlands of May roses, with their light and transparent appearance, whilst some are only bands of small rose-buds, which surround wreaths of ivy. All these are exceedingly beautiful, and, upon a handsome woman, are perfectly classical and charming ornaments. Perhaps, however, the most unique articles as artificial flowers are the bouquets for the hand, which are meant as New Year's gifts, and which accompany those pretty boxes of pocket-handkerchiefs which are considered as the most fashionable present that can be offered to a lady. That these boxes contain something really acceptable may be easily imagined, when your readers learn that they contain from six to a dozen of handkerchiefs of different patterns, and that we have now before our eyes one that has been ordered at a price of only 12,000 francs; though, to speak the truth, a very humble imitation may be obtained for 25 francs. Perhaps I may be allowed to remark that, amongst the most fashionable in-door employments of the season, few are more generally observable than the embroidery of various elegant articles in Berlin wool. These are executed in every variety of pattern and design, and really serve admirably for that sort of graceful but laborious idleness which is, perhaps, less an employment than an in-door amusement. In conclusion, let me, my dear monsieur, offer you the compliments of the season, and a happy commencement of the coming year.

HENRIETTE DE B.

FLORICULTURE.

CACTUS SPECIOSA.

The genus Cactus consists of a vast number of singular and variously constructed succulent plants, for the most part natives of Central and South America and adjacent islands; where they are invariably found inhabiting the apparently most sterile and inaccessible spots, generally preferring the southern slopes or ledges of broken rocks, where in places containing but a small quantity of alluvial deposit they take root and speedily attain a size seldom witnessed when transplanted to the variable and comparatively clouded atmosphere of Britain. In even a passing glance at a collection of Cacti, the most cursory observer is struck with the strange irregular forms which present themselves, from the pendent and cord-like stems of C. flagelliformis or creeping cereus, to the upright branched and showy C. repandus, and from it again to the immediate opposite, the globular Melocactus or Turk's cap; but of the whole tribe our present illustration is undoubtedly the most popular. C. speciosa, or as it is sometimes called, Epiphyllum phyllanthoides, is a native of the more elevated parts of Jamaica, and is at the same time the most profuse bloomer and more easily cultivated than any other plant of the family. As a window plant, or for the decoration of halls, in vases, &c., it is without a rival. The soil in which it succeeds is a mixture of loam, leaf mould, and old mortar, broken fine, and thoroughly incorporated. Several pieces of broken potsherds should be placed in the bottom of the pots, to secure an efficient drainage. The most proper time for potting is the early part of the spring and during the summer. The plant should be allowed all the sun it can possibly receive, with a liberal supply of water; but by the middle of the autumn this supply must be gradually reduced, and in the winter months, from November till February, very little or none is required. On the observance of these two particulars the well-being of the plant, and the bloom of the succeeding season, chiefly depend. It may be readily increased by cuttings, which may be taken off at any time After their removal from the plant it is necessary to lay them in a dry situation for about a fortnight before planting them, in order to reduce the quantity of viscous juices they contain, or they are extremely liable to rot. The soil in which cuttings should be planted is the same as recommended for the mature plant, with the addition of one third white sand: if covered with a small glass they root in about a fortnight, and may be re-potted at the end of the same period, after which their treatment should be as before directed.

SHEFFIELD.—The draft of the Charter of Incorporation of Sheffield has been sent down, and is found to agree, in its main features, with those granted to other boroughs; guarding, however, with all possible care, against any thing that might impair its validity. It is affirmed that the Charter has received the sanction of the Attorney-General; which will soon be followed by that of the Solicitor-General. It is proposed that the borough shall consist of nine wards; four for the township of Sheffield, and one for each of the out-townships. There are to be forty-two town councillors; namely, six each for the four wards of Sheffield and the ward of Ecclesall, and three each for the wards of Upper and Nether Hallam, Attercliffe, and Brightside. The number of aldermen will be twelve.

WEST BROMWICH.—An alarming fire broke out last week in the works of Bethell and Go., gas distillers, West Bromwich, by which the whole cisterns and offices were destroyed.—The fire at one period presented an awful appearance. About 7000 gallons of creosote and 2000 gallons of tar were consumed. The property is said to be wholly uninsured.

SUDDEN DEATH.—An awful instance of sudden death occurred to Mr. Robins, a respectable wine-merchant of Brighton. Mr. Robins was engaged in his office on the Marine-parade, and complained of illness. He got into his gig and proceeded to his residence, in the west part of Brighton. On arriving at the door he was got out of the gig with some difficulty, and although several medical gentlemen were in immediate attendance, he expired in a few minutes.

LEEDS.—HORRID MURDER NEAR ILKLEY.—On Saturday morning last the inhabitants of Ilkley, near Leeds, were horrified by the finding of the murdered body of a man, aged about 50 years, in a field in the township of Nesfield, through which the public highway from Ilkley to Beasely and Bolton-bridge passes, about a mile distant from Middleton Lodge, the residence of W. Middleton, Esq., and less than a mile distant from the village of Ilkley. The gamekeepers and watchers of Mr. Middleton (six in number) found the body about two o'clock on Saturday morning. Life was not then quite extinct. The deceased was laid on his right side, and his hat over his face. On the keepers attempting to raise him up, and on removing his hat, they discovered that his head was broken to pieces, and his hat nearly filled with blood. He expired immediately on being moved. A short walking stick with a most formidable head was found by the body, covered with blood. The body was then moved to Ilkley by the constable, whom the keepers at once applied to, and the body was identified as that of William Hustwick, of Beamsley, a labourer, who, it was ascertained, had left Ilkley about half-past ten o'clock the night before, in company with his cousin, Joseph Hey, of Beamsley, a carpenter. Hey was immediately inquired after, and taken into custody, to await the coroner's inquest, which was held on Monday, before Thomas Brown, Esq., of Skipton, and a respectable jury. The landlord of a public-house and several other witnesses were then examined, who deposed to having seen the accused and the deceased together, after which Joseph Hey, having been called on by the coroner, said—" After going a short way deceased began to stagger. I took hold of his arm. We went gently on. He would sit down. We got too near the limekiln. He then lay down and said he would stop. I said, nay, come on. He said, I'll lie down a bit and then follow thee. I then left him." He went on to state how he had proceeded homewards, sitting down in different places, hearing a clock strike twelve, and getting home at two. The jury returned a verdict of wilful murder against some person or persons unknown. The murdered man was unmarried. Hey, after the verdict, was set at liberty, and attended the funeral of the deceased next day by invitation of his friends.

THE COLOSSEUM PRINT.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS AND NEWS-AGENTS.

The unparalleled success of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS (which has far exceeded the most sanguine expectations of the Proprietors) renders it necessary for them (in order to avoid anything like confusion or disappointment, and to give completeness and perfection to their scheme, by bringing the volume to the end of the year, which it would have been otherwise impossible for them to do) to postpone the issue of the Colosseum Print until Saturday, the 7th of January, when it shall appear, with a well-arranged Index and Title Page, thereby affording time to the trade, who have fully represented their difficulties to us, to ensure the most extensive and impartial distribution. The following directions will be found to facilitate materially the wishes of our subscribers to obtain the print, and we beg that they may be in all cases observed:—

Subscribers should write to the person to whom the subscription has been paid, directing him in what manner to forward the print, so that it may sustain the least amount of injury in its transit; for, although it will bear a stamp, and may be forwarded postage free (for the additional cost of the stamp), yet it is obvious that such a method is most objectionable; and as in all large towns there are a great number of subscribers, it would be preferable that some arrangement might be made by which they might be sent by parcel, and thus escape the damage which they must inevitably sustain by being sent by post. Booksellers and News-vendors in the country are therefore requested to give their orders to their town-agents in this way.

On the 7th of January, will also be issued a supplement or extra number, price sixpence, which will contain

A Preface, with illustrations by Kenny Meadows
Two Keys to the Colosseum print.
Ten views of Old London, contrasting it with one large new view.
"London the City of the World," a song, the words by Bayley, the music by Loder, with a beautiful allegorical device.
A Set of Twelfth-night characters by Crowquill.
An elaborately engraved title page, from a beautiful and original design by Gilbert, and an Index with illustrations by an eminent artist.

This extra number (it is hoped) will add considerably to the beauty and value of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS as an historical record for families of all the stirring events of our time, and, although regularly stamped, will be sold with the current number and not separately.

At the opening of Parliament the Subscribers of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS will be presented with an attractive supplement gratis.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"Mr. Ingram," Oxford, shall have the proof. The sketch has not reached us.

To two correspondents signing themselves "English Catholics," and a third "A Subscriber and Admirer generally," we have to intimate a regret that they should have in any way misunderstood the tendency of our article. The words "ROMAN Catholic" should have been used in reference to a purely Roman Catholic edifice, and our notice was designed to be of a nature to induce no religious opinion or speculation on any possible account. The building was only spoken of as an object of architectural interest, and, although allusion was made to the ancient architecture of Roman Catholic ages, it was intended to apply to the condition of the fine arts in those periods, and not in the remotest manner to the then prevailing faith.

 The Magazines for January, and Boz's new work, will receive our notice next week.

 Half the artists in England who have beaken themselves to draw for engravings upon wood—all the eminent wood-engravers—and a whole host of professional and amateur draughtsmen, both in the country and the metropolis, can bring testimony to the extreme liberality of expenditure with which we have ever met their efforts on our behalf, and to our quenchless anxiety to procure novel, attractive, and original subjects for illustration in every walk of art. In obtaining these, however, we have never sought to do so at the expense of fairness or respectability: we have passed a general injunction to our artists never to bring us anything which they cannot be legitimately entitled to sell; and, whenever any subject belonging to another has been proposed to us, we have been at personal pains to procure the permission of the right proprietor; and we rejoice to be able to thank some of the first publishers of our time (among them Mr. Murray, the Messrs. Blackwood, Mr. Knight, Messrs. Ackermann, Messrs. Graves and Co., Messrs. A. H. Baily and Co., and others) for the honourable and cordial spirit in which, in every instance, they have met our requests. And so little, indeed, should we contemplate a refusal of this sort of interchange of literary kindness from the high purveyors of literature, that we should never dream of making an exception of any particular house to our regular rule of application. But in a large establishment, like that of the "ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS," we are, with the utmost caution and desire to be just, subject to the nuisance of imposition; and to this we appear to have been exposed in the instance of two engravings of Newstead Abbey, published in our last number, and copied from a valuable and original work, the property of Messrs. Fisher, Son, and Co., of Newgate-street, entitled, "The Counties of Chester, Derby, Lincoln, Nottingham, and Rutland, Illustrated." Now, will it be believed that we bought those drawings of a Mr. H. Dixon, an engraver, of Camden-town, as original—that he brought them to our office, ready drawn and engraved upon the wood, stating that they were the work of a friend of his, who had been in the Newstead neighbourhood? We never saw Messrs. Fisher's book; but, being now convinced that our two prints were fac-similes of theirs, we at once state the source from which we derived them, and make the fair amende honorable of acknowledging the publication so unwittingly pirated. Did we experience a desire to copy any subject belonging to Messrs. Fisher we should call upon them for their permission so to do. This is our rule, and when it is infringed it is only, as in the present instance, through some treachery or imposition which no fairness nor foresight can avoid. Messrs. Fisher and the public may well forgive us for such lapses as these. There would seem, however, that a sort of fatality existed to bring Messrs. Fisher and our journal into collision, for on a former occasion we were in error to a certain extent in reference to our engraving of Constantinople, which was copied from one of their superb Oriental works entitled "Constantinople, and the Scenery of the Seven Churches of Asia Minor, Illustrated," and the drawings for which were made, we understand, on the spot, by Thomas Allom, Esq., expressly sent out by Messrs. Fisher and Co., at vast expense, for the purpose. To these gentlemen (Messrs. Fisher and Co.) our thanks are justly due for their courtesy in accepting this acknowledgment, when informed by us of the manner in which the copied drawings had come into our hands, and of our entire ignorance of the sources from which they had been procured.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1842.

The present festive season has been productive of one marked feature of improvement in the taste and manners of the humbler classes of the community, which, having recognised in their conduct, we rejoice to encourage and approve. We allude to their desire to attend exhibitions of national diversion and instruction, and to comport themselves in a discreet and orderly manner, which will form one of our best arguments in favour of throwing open our national institutions generally, to the free indulgence of popular enjoyment. It would seem that many many thousands of persons have during the past few days availed themselves of their flitting holidays to visit not only our museums which make no charge for ingress, but even those which demand as qualification for entrée the passing of the ordeal of the fee. All the cheaper institutions—such, for instance, as the Adelaide Gallery, where insight was to be gained into art or science, or any intelligent pursuit—have been most freely attended; and the fact proves that the inquiring poor, who are willing to tax their savings for such holiday enjoyment, deserve to be met half way by the nation, and to have the boon of gratuitous entertainment liberally awarded to their improving taste.

There is every thing moralizing in the tendency of rational diversions for the people, and every thing de-moralizing in that of the intemperate abandonment to loose habits and low animal gratification which we trust they are destined to succeed. The adoption of music licences for places not devoted to mere speculations of tavern profit was one of our first recommendations to the magistrates in session; another to the Legislature is the giving an Open sesame to places where amusement may be rife, but where instruction is the guardian genius of the locale. We remember a time when we would not have tendered this advice; but it is really a pleasure to be convinced that that time is now of the past. Nothing can have been more orderly, decent, and respectful than the recent bearing of the humbler community at the exhibitions, and even at the theatres; and on such nights as the first of the holiday pantomimes they demeaned themselves in a manner less boisterous, roaring, and tinged with meaningless and brutal interruption, than on any previous occasion for many years. The indication was perhaps a trifling one, but it harbingers a civilizing spirit, and heralds in the advent of improving times.

A reference to our police intelligence will put our readers in possession of a case of shameful and arbitrary conduct on the part of the police, which, if it arises from the nature of the instructions promulgated at Great Scotland-yard, divulges the existence of as wicked a conspiracy against public liberty as ever endangered the peace and happiness of a country. We are disposed to think, however, that this is not the case, for the doctrine on which the police proceeded was so glaringly absurd and unconstitutional, that even the presiding magistrate was for a moment shocked, and could hardly believe his senses that any man entrusted with the preservation of the public peace could so wantonly outrage the most valuable and valued privileges of a British subject. It is really refreshing to have an opportunity of paying a well-merited compliment to the decision and impartiality of any of our police magistrates, for so frequently have we felt it our duty to observe upon their conduct in a different strain, that we are in the daily receipt of expostulations from many esteemed correspondents against our apparent harshness and severity. We trust we shall never see the day when it will be considered necessary by a public journalist to apologise for treating with perfect freedom of opinion and speech the acts of our public officers; at the same time we feel bound to state that it is ever with the utmost pain and reluctance we are induced to comment in terms of disapprobation on the conduct of men who, to be efficient in their official positions, should enjoy the unqualified and entire confidence of their fellow-subjects. In the present instance the conduct of Mr. Broderip (the presiding magistrate at the Thames Police Office) was such as we should have expected from a gentleman of his acknowledged experience and ability, and we trust it will serve as an example to some of the Solons in other parts of the metropolis who have been gaining a rather unenviable notoriety latterly by their strange and unaccountable decisions. The case in question is so short, but so instructive withal, that we cannot resist the temptation of repeating it here:—

"On Wednesday last a well-dressed young woman of apparent respectability, named Susanna Elizabeth Dale, was "brought before Mr. Broderip, at the Thames Police Office, "and placed in the felons' dock. A policeman, named Hagan, "183 K, stated that on or about four o'clock on Tuesday after-"noon, or 'thereabouts that time,' a person came to the sta-"tion-house for a police constable, and he proceeded to No. 4, "Charles-street, Stepney, where he found the prisoner con-"tending with the proprietor of the shop about a pane of glass "she had broken. The prisoner settled for the pane of glass, "but refused to give any satisfactory account of herself, and so "he locked her up. Mr. Broderip: What for? Policeman: "She would give no satisfactory answers to my questions what-"ever, and would not give her address. There was a great "mob in the street. Mr. Broderip: Why, she paid for the "broken glass, what satisfaction did you want? Policeman: "She would give no satisfaction at all. Mr. Broderip: And "because she would give no satisfaction you locked her up. Is "it so? Policeman: Yes, that's it! There is no one here to "charge her. Mr. Broderip: I think it is very likely she will "bring an action against you for false imprisonment. The "woman is discharged."

Had it been proved that the female in question was intoxicated, or that she had intentionally broken the window, there might have been some excuse made for this extraordinary interference of the policeman; but it is not suggested that the glass was not broken by the merest accident, and it was not even insinuated that this respectable-looking female, who was vilely consigned to a felons' dock, was guilty of the smallest crime of which the British law takes cognizance.

FOREIGN POLITICS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Dec. 28.

Are the Chambers to be opened by the King in person, with a royal speech, or are they to be opened by the Minister of the Interior, who will immediately present the bill for supplementary secret service money, to challenge a vote of confidence for the Cabinet? Such are the questions mooted in every circle, and various are the opinions hazarded on the subject. It is contended that if the Soult-Guizot Ministry presents itself without a discourse from the Throne, it will be a sign of a want of confidence on the part of the King, and that it must speedily fall, if it loose the only prop which keeps it standing. Then the King's speech, on opening the past dynastic session, for the Regency Bill, is quoted as a distinct pledge that his Majesty would open the present Chambers in person for the business of the nation. It is argued by others that M. Guizot desires earnestly the speech, as being the most constitutional course to provoke full debates on all points of the home and foreign policy in the project of address. It is pretended in some quarters that M. Guizot ought to resign if his advice is not followed by his Majesty. The fact, I believe, is, that nothing has been decided, and nothing will be arranged until the week before the opening of the session, when there will be quite time to make a king's speech. As for any conclusion being drawn against the stability of the Cabinet should there be no discourse, this is entirely erroneous. You may rest assured that M. Guizot, up to this moment, enjoys the entire confidence of the Crown, because the Minister for Foreign Affairs stands well with Continental Cabinets, and that fact is enough for the King, with whom the foreign relations of France are always uppermost in the mind. The unpopularity of M. Guizot at home is rather in his favour at the Tuileries, as it is regarded as the sign of a strong government. For the rest, there is no parliamentary combination now on the tapis against the Ministry. The "Illustrations" begin to arrive. M. de Lamartine, who aims to be leader of the Liberal Left, one stage removed only from the Republicans, is here; Berryer, the great Royalist orator, is also in Paris; Passey, Thiers, Molé, Salvandy, Lonyer, Odilon, Barrot, Dupin, &c., are on the spot. Dufavre is not yet here. His honeymoon lasts all the year; and his friends complain that since his marriage he has lost his energy, and cannot come to the "scratch political."

The Spanish hubbub is pretty well over. The Regent's Government went too far in asserting what cannot be proved, however strongly surmised, as Senor Gutierez, the Barcelona political chief, is to be sent to the right-about, and we may look for something apologetical in the Madrid official Gazette to satisfy the dignity of the French Cabinet offended in the person of M. de Lesseps, its consul. The Spanish ministry will assure the French court that it had no intention to brand it; that France was accused of plotting, bribing, and bullying purely in a Pickwickian, and not in a personal sense; and we are to have peace, therefore, in the Peninsula until the next insurrection or revolution, when the long pent-up Bourbon bile (of the younger branch) may find its vent, and eventually realize the saying of the head of the elder family, that "the Pyrenees no longer exist," that is, if we permit the removal of the former.

We have had three débuts at the Académie Royale (French Opera). M. Brémond, from Marseilles, in Bertram in Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable," and in the Cardinal in Halevy's "Juive"; Mdlle. Fiamand in Auber's "Serment"; and Mdlle. Delphine Morguet in Fenella in Auber's "Muette de Portici." M. Brémond has a fine bass voice, but lacks éclat and style. He has, however, a commanding stage figure and will be useful, although Levasseur is still the only legitimate Dieu on the French stage. It would break O. Smith's heart to look at the demoniac aspect of this still great singer in Bertram. The lady débutante, as I stated last week, is an accomplished singer, but nothing great. The new danseuse promises well. The cooper-tenor, Poultier, by the way, is singing splendidly since his provincial tour. He is acquiring more confidence, and there are little bits in his singing which are unequalled. Meyerbeer has left Paris for Berlin. He will be back here in April next, to commence the rehearsal of his "Prophet." He is to produce his "Crociato in Egitto," in which Pasta and Volpini were so famous at the French Opera, and has written several fresh pieces for it. The "Péri," the new ballet, is the next novelty. Carlotta Grisi will be the heroine. We are to lose soon the pretty Swede, Madlle. Lucile Grahn, who leaves the "centre of centralization" for St. Petersburgh, the Russian having engaged her for three years. Fanny Elssler's next appearance in Paris will be in the civil courts. Her legal adviser, M. Charles Ledru, and her ambassador to Paris, the American Mr. Wikoff, have instituted an action to recover the value of "Faithless Fanny's" furniture, seized by the myrmidons of the law, for payment of the damages awarded against her for breach of promise of marriage she had contracted with the French Opera, by remaining in the "United States" with the Yankee Goths beyond the period fixed by her engagement. The Marquis de Custelette, who, albeit married to the rich American banker's widow, Mrs. Welles, has not forgotten Fanny's desertion, heads the "lion" party, or "loge infernal," which is resolved to oppose her reappearance here.

Do you remember the great noise that was made last year by the announcement of a drama to have been produced at the Renaissance, now the Italian Opera, written by M. Léon Gozlan, which piece was prohibited by the Minister of the Interior, because it was a libel on our most gracious Queen and Prince Albert. The title was, "Il était une fois un Roi et une Reine." Well, this piece, so prohibited, by the French authorities, has just been produced in another form, and free from political allusions, under the title of "La Main droite et la Main gauche," at the Odéon, the scene taking place in Stockholm. The reigning Queen of Sweden has for husband a German prince, named Herman, a good kind of man, who only dreams of the tulips—of his garden. "Prince" says her Majesty, "would we are engaged with state affairs in a Cabinet Council, occupy yourself with the masked ball we give this evening." Prince Herman is, however, ambitious. He wishes to know what is passing in the State, but he is only the royal spouse, and not the reigning King, and he cannot be. Therefore the plot of one of the most amusing and yet absurd dramas that has been brought out for a long time would occupy too much space in your "Illustrated columns." Every act is a drama of itself, and there are five acts, filled with the most varying incidents, so that the attention is kept in suspense to the very conclusion. Briefly, the Queen has contracted two marriages, right-handed and left-handed ones, according to Continental custom—that is, she marries a Major Palmer, a half madman, with the left hand, and Prince Herman with the right. Prince Herman has done the same thing, he having married Rodolphine with the left hand before his union with the Queen of Sweden. Out of these marriages arise the situations of the drama, some of them of a touching nature, and some of them broad comedy. A kind of Talleyrand, the Minister Erie, avails himself of this state of things, of which he alone is cognizant, and accomplishes the dénouement by restoring to Major Palmer his daughter, the Countess of Lowenburg, who then renounces his claims to share the throne, and by restoring to Prince Herman his son Wilfred by Rodolphine. The left-handed wife—grown-up leave Sweden for ever, as Wilfred is united to the Queen's daughter, the countess; and the drama ends by the Queen saying to Herman, "Let us go and reign." "Yes," replies the Prince, "let us begin to reign." I have only to add that Madame Dorval plays Rodolphine with exquisite feeling and taste, and it is altogether well got up and performed. It is destined to have a great run; but one strange mistake of M. Léon Gozlan will not escape attention, and that is—he has constructed his drama on a blunder as to the nature of a morganatic marriage. A Prince or Princess may contract a union either with the right or left hand, but this cannot be done at the same time, and, if so done, is bigamy to all intents and purposes.

A Council of Ministers was held at the Tuileries, this day, at one o'clock, at which the King presided. A numerous meeting of the members of the Chamber of Peers was held at the same time in the apartment of the Grand Referendary.

ARRIVAL OF THE COLUMBIA STEAMER.—The steam-packet ship Columbia arrived at Liverpool yesterday morning, at an early hour; but brings no political or commercial news of the slightest interest. She left New York on the 15th, seven days later than the Independence, which arrived on Sunday.

Sir Charles Bagot continued in a declining state, and he was recommended removal to a warmer climate.

New York rate of Exchange 6 and 3/4 per cent. premium.

DEATH OF ARCHDEACON WRANGHAM.—We are sorry to have to announce the death of Archdeacon Wrangham, which event took place on the 27th inst., at his residence in Chester, in the 74th year of his age. This venerable and distinguished man was Archdeacon of the East Riding of York, Chaplain to the Archbishop of York, Canon of York and Chester, and Rector of Hunmanby in Yorkshire, and of Dodleston in Cheshire.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, Sunday.—This morning her Majesty and Prince Albert, and the whole household, attended divine service in the private chapel within the castle. The Rev. Lord Wriothesley Russell officiated. The Duchess of Kent and Lady F. Howard attended divine service in the parish church. In the afternoon the Duchess of Kent came to the castle, and dined with her Majesty and Prince Albert. There was no addition to the royal dinner circle this evening. The royal dinner-table exhibited a noble baron of beef, plum-pudding, and other fare of the true old English style. After dinner the servants were regaled with toast and ale, as is usual on Christmas-day.

WEDNESDAY.—Her Majesty did not leave the castle to-day, in consequence of the wet and unfavourable state of the weather. Prince Albert proposed to have shot in the park, but was prevented by the weather. The Prince, attended by Sir E. Bowater, took equestrian exercise in the riding school. In the afternoon the royal dinner party included the following:—The Duchess of Kent, Viscount and Viscountess Canning, Lady Fanny Howard, the Hon. Misses Liddell and Lister, Captain Seymour, the Marquis of Ormonde, Mr. and Mrs. Harcourt, Sir E. Bowater, Captain Meynell, Colonel Grey, Sir H. Wheatley, Dr. Pretorius, and the Hon. C. A. Murray.

TUESDAY.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert walked on the Road parterre for a short time. He Royal Highness Prince Albert afterwards rode out on horseback, attended by Sir E. Bowater and Captain Seymour. Her Royal Highness the Princess Royal was taken out for a short time. The royal dinner party included the following personages:—The Duchess of Kent, Viscountess Canning, the Marquis of Ormonde, the Hon. Misses Liddell and Lister, Lord and Lady Wriothesley Russell, Sir E. Bowater, Colonel Grey, Captain Meynell, Captain Seymour, the Hon. C. A. Murray, and Dr. Pretorius.

WEDNESDAY.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert took their usual walking exercise. His Royal Highness Prince Albert afterwards enjoyed several hours' shooting in the royal preserves at Cranbourne Tower. His Royal Highness was attended by the Marquis of Ormonde, Viscount Canning, Sir E. Bowater, Captain Meynell, the Hon. C. A. Murray, and Mr. G. A. Anson. The sport was excellent.—In the afternoon her Majesty and the Prince walked through the royal pleasure-grounds to Frogmore, returning to the castle in a pony phaeton.—The Princess Royal was taken her usual airing.—Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited her Majesty and the Prince at the castle.—The royal dinner party this evening included the following personages:—her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Viscount and Viscountess Canning, Lady Fanny Howard, the Hon. Misses Liddell and Lister, Mrs. Arbuthnot, the Marquis of Ormonde, Sir E. Bowater, Captain Seymour, Captain Meynell, Colonel Grey, the Hon. C. A. Murray, and Dr. Pretorius.—The band of the 2nd Life Guards was in attendance.

His Excellency the American minister, with Mrs and Miss Everett, passed the Christmas with Lord and Lady Ashburton at the Grange.

The Standard states that the King of Prussia has consented to become the arbitrator between France and England upon the difficult and long-contested subject of the Porte des chats.

Count de Ste Aulaire, the French ambassador, visited the Earl of Aberdeen on Tuesday at his residence, Argyll-house, Argyll-street. The ambassador transacted business at the office of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

POPE'S PRECEDENCE.—It having been observed by one of the guests that some doubt might arise on a point of precedence, in consequence of the arrival at Paris of M. Fornari, the new Pope's nuncio, the Gazette de France says that no such difficulties can arise, the Congress of Vienna having decided that the ambassador from the court of Rome shall occupy on all official occasions the first rank among the diplomatic corps. The only reason why this precedence was not granted to M. Gerolamo, the nuncio at Vienna, was, that he held only the office of internuncio, or charge d'affaires.

At Trentham Hall, in the last week, the Marquis of Stafford's birthday was celebrated by a feast to the tenantry, and other rejoicings, on account of the young lord attaining his fourteenth year.

The French ambassador, the Comte de Ste. Aulaire, &c., are expected to leave town on the 2nd of January next, for Bowood Park, Wiltshire.

Mr. Smith, of Deanston, delivered a lecture on the agricultural draining and subsoil ploughing in the music-hall of Belfast, on Wednesday last week, which afforded great satisfaction to a numerous and respectable audience of two hundred persons, amongst whom were the Marquis of Donegal, the Marquis of Downshire, Lord Lurgan, Lord Newry, M.P.; Sir Robert Bateson, Bart., Robert Bateson, Esq., M.P.; George Dunbar, Esq., mayor of Belfast; Dean Stannus; William Sharman Crawford, Esq., M.P.; Wm. Blacker, Esq., Market hill; J. Thomson Tennent, Esq., &c. The Marquis of Downshire was called in the chair.

HIMLEY HALL.—A splendid ball was given on Tuesday, by Lord Ward, at his seat, Himley Hall, in celebration of the coming of age of the Hon Dudley Ward, his eldest son and heir. The Earl and Countess of Carlisle, Lord and Lady Lyttelton, Lord and Lady Hatherton, Lord and Lady Wrottesley, Lord De Grey of Groby, with most of the nobility and gentry of the adjacent counties, were present.

The Marquis of Douglas arrived at the Duke of Hamilton's, in Portman-square, on Sunday, from Mannheim, in the Grand Duchy of Baden. We hear that his lordship's marriage to her Serene Highness the Princess Mary Amelia Elizabeth Caroline of Baden, the fair and accomplished niece of the reigning Grand Duke, will be solemnised in Germany, where the illustrious fiancés, who is one of the most distinguished beauties of the Continent, resides with her mother, the Grand Duchess Dowager Stephanie. The Duchess of Hamilton, whose health has greatly improved by her sojourn at Baden-Baden, is still at Mannheim. The Duke of Hamilton is passing the Christmas at Hamilton Palace, Lanarkshire.

It is expected that her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert will visit Claremont in the course of a few days. The game in the royal preserves at Claremont is more abundant than it has been known to be for many seasons past. Not a single head of game of any description has been shot from the commencement of the season, except a few pheasants in the early part of October, which were forwarded to Brussels. It is expected that their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal will remain at the castle during the short absence of their illustrious parents at Esher.

ROYAL MARRIAGE.—The France says:—"The marriage of the Princess Clementine of Orleans with Prince Augustus of Saxe Coburg Gotha, brother of the Duchess of Nemours, and of the husband of Donna Maria of Portugal, has been for some time decided on. Prince Augustus was born on June 13, 1818, and is a major in the Austrian service, in the 10th Regiment of Hussars, called the King of Prussia's. The Prince is a few months younger than the Princess Clementine. The family arrangements on this subject are now to be signed."

Despatches from the Governor of Van Diemen's Land were received at the Colonial-office. Despatches were also received from the Governor of South Australia, and from St. Helena.

The Duke of Wellington continues at Strathfieldsaye, without company, but visitors are expected early in the ensuing month. The Marquis and Marchioness of Douro are still staying at Hatfield-house, Herts, on a visit to the Marquis of Salisbury.

The Earl of Hardwicke, while hunting with the Trumpington hounds on Monday, fell from his horse Pigeon, at the last fence, and sprained his shoulder, from the effects of which accident he is happy to say he is rapidly recovering.

"Prince Puckler Muskau," says a letter from Gorlitz, "has just met with a frightful accident. An Arab horse lashed out suddenly and struck him on the head. The Prince is obliged to keep his bed."

Lord Frederick Fitzclarence's birthday was celebrated by the inhabitants of Stirling with every demonstration of respect, last week; but the customary bonfire and other rejoicings were dispensed with, in consequence of the death of the Countess of Munster.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

SEASONABLE BENEFACTIONS. On Tuesday a kind individual forwarded, anonymously, the sum of £5 for the poor-box of Marylebone police-court. At Worship-street Mr. Bingham, the sitting magistrate, announced that a sum of £20 had been received in aid of the poor-box of that court. The benevolent donor had given his initials, G. H. I. A sum of £10 had also been received, the bequest of the late Mr. Davidge, the theatrical manager. A letter, containing £5, was forwarded to the poor-box of Clerkenwell police-court, by Messrs. Gosling and Sharpe, the bankers, as a donation from the Hon. Miss Arden.

COMMERCIAL TRAVELLERS' SOCIETY.—The forty-third anniversary of this excellent and highly benevolent institution was celebrated at Lovegrove's London Coffee-house, Ludgate-hill, on Wednesday evening last, by a dinner, to which upwards of 100 gentlemen sat down shortly before six o'clock. The amount of the donations and subscriptions announced during the evening were proportionably greater than on any previous occasion.

THE FRAUDS AT THE CUSTOM-HOUSE. The Government Police Gazette of Tuesday contains the offer of a reward for the discovery and apprehension of a person named William Burnby, against whom true bills of ind ctment were returned by the Grand Jury at the last sessions of the Central Criminal Court, for divers perjuries committed by him on his examination before the Surveyor-General of her Majesty's Customs, touching the conduct of certain officers of the Custom-house, London, and others, against whom warrants have been issued.

On Wednesday morning, between nine and ten o'clock, the following determined suicide was committed by Mr. John Sowerby, a respectable master butcher, residing in Farringdon-market, who drowned himself in the Paddington Canal. It appeared from the statement of two labouring men who were passing at the time, that they saw the deceased plunge into the canal, and immediately sink. They hastened to the spot, and, jumping into the water, found the body after the lapse of a quarter of an hour. It was removed to a station-house at Paddington, and surgical assistance was procured, but all attempts to restore animation proved useless, life being extinct. The unfortunate man had been absent from home since Monday last, but no cause was assigned for the fatal act. He was 50 years of age, and has left a widow and family to deplore his loss.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

In 51 out of 143 parishes the clerks have neglected to make any report, so that this return may be regarded as so far imperfect.——The "Complete Suffrage Conferences" commenced their sittings at Birmingham on Tuesday last, when Mr. Sturge was called to the chair. The meeting is described by the morning papers as exceedingly noisy and disorderly.——A special general meeting of the Croydon Railway Company was held at the London Tavern on Tuesday last, to consider the report of the directors, which set forth that the directors, having exhausted all means to endeavour to prevail on the Greenwich Railway Company to modify their toll, had come to the resolution that it would tend to the advantage of the company to discontinue the carrying trade. Ultimately a committee was appointed to open new negotiations with the Greenwich Company, and the meeting was adjourned until the 24th of March.——On Christmas-day a lad named Thomas Powell, in the employment of a greengrocer in the Lambeth-walk, took advantage of his master's absence to enjoy a hearty swig of gin from a jug that stood on a table, when he was so overcome that he sank down and shortly afterwards expired.——On Christmas-day the female convicts, upwards of 160 in number, on board the Margaret, of Bristol, at present lying off the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich, waiting sailing orders for Van Diemen's Land, were supplied with a large piece of plum-pudding and a gill of wine each, in addition to their usual fare.——The Rev. Bernard Smith, of Leadenham, has followed the example of the Rev. Mr. Sibthorpe, by resigning a living worth £900 a-year, for the purpose of embracing the Roman Catholic religion. The question of admitting pews in churches, or throwing them entirely open to the public, is making considerable noise throughout the country, and in several places (amongst the rest Ipswich and Harwich) this democratic principle has been adopted.——The freedom of the City of Glasgow was last week conferred on Mr. Cobden, M.P.——The Civil Tribunal of Pontenay (Vendée) has just been called on to decide whether a person who had been ordained a priest, but removed from his functions, can enter into the marriage state. The tribunal has decided in the negative.——On Tuesday morning a journeyman tailor of the name of Kirby, residing in Rupert-street, drank to such excess, with several other companions, that he was brought home a lifeless corpse before two in the afternoon.——The Commissioner of Bankruptcy at Manchester was employed on Monday last in investigating the case of Raleigh and Co., bankrupts, in connexion with the Manchester Bank, and after sitting a number of hours was obliged to have recourse to a further adjournment.——Miss Hamblin the actress who stood accused of the murder of her husband by stabbing him with a dagger, in the Mobille Theatre, in the month of March last, was recently tried at Mobile, when, after a number of witnesses had been examined, the jury returned a verdict of "Not Guilty." On the announcement of the verdict the prisoner fainted.——Last week the Orwell steamer, which plies between Ipswich and London, brought to the metropolis no fewer than five tons of oysters.——Several cases of sudden death have occurred during the holiday's which are clearly attributable to acts of intemperance: a man named Budd, a lawyer who resided in Westminster, fell down the stairs and broke his neck whilst in a state of intoxication.——The public records in the care of Sir Francis Palgrave are undergoing classification and reparation. They contain a vast body of historical and antiquarian information: the charters alone amount to 20,000. Out of the total number of documents 34,557 have gone through the requisite processes, and the whole of the remainder, the entire mass of records contained in the vaults, will be finished in 1844.——An astronomer of New York, Mr. Pierrepont, in the course of scientific observation, that extraordinary changes are taking place in the solar system. The inclination of the earth's axis with the ecliptic he shows to be changing. The poles of the planet Venus are changing, and her colour approaching to a deep red: Herschel is diminishing in size, and Saturn appears to be partly in conflagration.——Upwards of 1000 persons visited Westminster Abbey during Monday and Tuesday, and more than 300 persons the United Service Institution. On the former day, more than 2000 persons paid for admission to the Royal Adelaide Gallery after seven o'clock.——On Tuesday a young man, named Robert Haye, an apprentice on board the ship Chance, lying off Rotherhithe, was committed to Newgate, from the Thames police office, to take his trial for feloniously wounding Robert Horton, the master of the same vessel, with intent to murder or do him some grievous bodily harm.——Mr. George Price, the barrister, was fined £1 at the Marlborough Police-office on Wednesday for creating a disturbance at the Vine-street police station. It appeared that Mr. Price had interfered from motives of humanity to prevent the incarceration of a respectable-looking female, who was captured with a number of others on the anniversary of the birthday of Prince Blucher was celebrated at Dusseldorf, on the 15th inst., by a brilliant entertainment, at which many comrades of the deceased veteran, but nearly all the officers of the German forces present.——The celebrated comet of Encke was near killing a few weeks ago by the explosion of a retort in his laboratory at Stockholm. Fortunately he escaped with some contusions.——The archbishop of Posen is so ill with the jaundice that his life is despaired of.——The number of ships that passed the Sound in November, was, from the Baltic, 704; from the North Sea, 241. Of these the English were 12 from the north, and 323 from the Baltic, or 335 out of 1005, or one third of the whole.——The correspondent of a morning paper denies that the Great Western Railway Company have adopted the precaution of placing an empty carriage between the engine and the first passenger carriage.——James Cooke, [illegible] was charged at Bow-street with fraudulently obtaining a horse, chaise, and harness, value £30, from Mr. James Hall, a job-master.——Various other robberies have been brought against him, and he stands remanded.——Shaw Riley was finally examined at the Wandsworth Police-office on the charge of embezzling various sums of money, amounting to £50 and upwards, the property of his employer, Mr. Frost, auctioneer, at Clapham. He was committed on the evidence of the British government, having been informed that several inhabitants of Biarrits had, at the peril of their own lives, saved the crew of an English schooner wrecked in the night of the 24th October, sent 300 francs to be distributed among those brave men; to which the Lord's Committee added 300 francs more.——A reward of 2000 dollars has been offered by the subscribers to the Niger expedition for the liberation of Mr. Alfred Carr, who is supposed to be held prisoner (if not murdered) by the natives at the model farm in Africa.

POSTSCRIPT.

Friday Evening.

NEW GOVERNOR-GENERAL FOR CANADA.—We are enabled to state, on the most unquestionable authority, that Lord Eliot, the present Secretary for Ireland, is appointed the new Governor-General of Canada, in the room of Sir Charles Bagot, whose illness has assumed a dangerous and alarming complexion.

ON DIT that the Hon. Stuart Wortley is to succeed Lord Eliot as Secretary for Ireland, an appointment which is not likely to excite any serious objections on either side.

DRAYTON MANOR. Sir Robert and Lady Peel and family are expected to leave early in the ensuing month for Whitehall Gardens for the season. Shortly after their arrival a series of grand dinners and soirées will be given at the right hon. baronet's mansion; and on Wednesday, the 1st of February, the custommary grand [illegible] will take place.

Mr. Saunders Davies was, on Wednesday last, elected to serve as a member of Parliament for the County of Carmarthen, vice Mr. J. Jones deceased.

Last night a alarming fire broke out in the premises occupied by Mr. [illegible], and Brown, bookbinders, No. 10, Red Lion-court, Fleet-street. Owing to the inflammable materials, the fire spread with great rapidity. A good supply of water was obtained, and the flames were subdued in the course of half an hour.

DREADFUL SHIPWRECK.—The British brig Naiad, from Halifax to Demerara, was fallen in with on the 11th of November, in lat. 28 deg. 10 min., long. 53 deg. 10 min. full of water, and the only survivor taken off, by the Seawmut, arrived at Boston from Rio Janeiro. The survivor, William Fosdick, states that they left Halifax for Demerara on the 14th of September, and on the 22nd, in lat. 29½ deg., were capsized in a heavy squall, under close-reefed topsails at the time. She righted next day full of water with loss of spars and mainmast. A little flour was washed up from the hold, which they collected and dried in the sun and ate; everything was done by Fosdick to keep up the spirits of his companions (seven in number), but they all drooped and died, except one, who, with Fosdick, went into the maintop in a very stormy night. It coming on to rain, Fosdick touched his companion in order to rouse him to obtain a few drops of water as it fell, but found him dead. In the morning he cut him loose, and he fell into the sea. He then remained six days before the Shawmut hove in sight, and when taken on board he was unable to speak or walk, but the medical skill of the captain saved his life, having been 49 days without food or water.

THE CHRISTMAS PANTOMIMES. By ALFRED CROWQUILL.

DRURY LANE

COVENT GARDEN.

HARLEQUIN TELL, OR THE GENIUS OF THE RIBSTON PIPPIN'.

Behold! the pantomime of Tell—
I'll tell you how he did so well;
An arrowish escape he had,
To die himself or kill his lad.
But rather chose with fate to grapple,
And aim at freedom through an apple.
By Ribston pippins made aspirant;
Soon after that he shot his tyrant!

PUNCH'S PANTOMIME.

Punch, what have you bowled out to-day?
You've oft shown fight, you now show play;
Your theme's no carter, meaning wagg'ner,
But the great charter we call magna.
Bill by the barons drawn upon,
And then accepted by King John,
Endorsed by England to the free,
And made by Punch a jeu d'esprit!

HAYMARKET

ADELPHI.

RIQUET WITH THE TUFT.

So ho! So ho! (not Soho-square)
What, good Sir Riquet, are you there?
Tuft-honour'd mortal, with the nous
To make tuft-hunters of the house!
Riquet, your form is strong to view,
There's nothing ricketty in you,
Although you stand, you man of fun,
As if you meant to have a run!

HARLEQUIN NOBODY, OR THE BABES IN THE WOOD.

Harlequin Nobody! what shall we say
At the notion of Nobody having his way,
And, on being complained of by some queer so-so-body,
Replying, with triumph, "That's nothing to nobody!"
Again, when he lit on the "Babes in the Wood,"
Where Nobody saw them, 'cause Nobody could,
And plaintively hoped in our bosom we'd put 'em,—
As Nobody'd thank us, we didn't—we cut 'em!

OLYMPIC.

HARLEQUIN AND OLD COCKER.

Here's the Rule of Three, upon Boxing-day,
According to Cocker, come to the play.
Practice makes perfect every tick,
And the tack of time is arithme-tic.
No Division the house provokes,
There's a Multiplication of capital jokes;
And the world may laugh at the merry transactions,
Till it shakes its ribs into Vulgar Fractions!

SURREY.

HARLEQUIN PUCK, OR THE CRYSTAL FOUNTAIN.

Oh! for the frolics of Harlequin Puck,
Who was born in a lily-bell all to good luck,
Who bathed in crystal to get himself clean,
And then went to gambol with pea and with bean;
And who, Shakspere says, was happy indeed
When the Pantomime people all muster'd he seed,
In the great Surrey garden of frolic, you know,
Where, highly delighted, he makes them to grow!

SADLER'S WELLS.

HARLEQUIN KING ARTHUR.

King Arthur, so, ho! then we have you upon
The Harlequin trick of burlesquing "King John!"
As if your good Majesty thought it no sin
To combine the droll acting of Harley and Quin!

CITY.

HARLEQUIN THE ONE-EYED BLACKSMITH.

Ha! one-ogled blacksmith, what are you about?
Your sight's "all my eye" I have not the least doubt.
But, if you've a spark left of principle too,
You will not keep forging the way that you do!

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

PORTSMOUTH, Dec. 28.—The Cambridge, 78, Captain Edward Barnard, went out of harbour this morning, remaining at Spithead until this evening, when she sailed for Plymouth, where it is supposed she will be paid off. The Austrian frigate Bellone, under the command of his Imperial Highness the Archduke of Austria, remains at Spithead, at which anchorage she is detained by the recent and present westerly wind. The Philadelphia, outward-bound New York packet-ship, put back last night, and remains at Spithead, wind-bound. Upwards of fourteen sail of merchant ships have brought up at the Motherbank, unable to proceed down Channel, owing to the prevailing westerly gales. The following vessels of war are at present fitting for service at this port: The Samarang, 28, Captain Belcher, for the surveying service in China; the Proile, 16, Commander Willis, under orders for the Bahama Islands; the Thunderbolt, second-class war steamer, Commander G. N. Broke, destination unknown. The Britannia, 120 has been docked, and will be newly coppered. Admiral Sir Charles Rowley, Bart., outward-bound New York packet-ship, put back last night, and remains at Spithead, wind-bound. Upwards of fourteen sail of merchant ships have brought up at the Motherbank, unable to proceed down Channel, owing to the prevailing westerly gales. The following vessels of war are at present fitting for service at this port: The Samarang, 28, Captain Belcher, for the surveying service in China; the Proile, 16, Commander Willis, under orders for the Bahama Islands; the Thunderbolt, second-class war steamer, Commander G. N. Broke, destination unknown. The Britannia, 120 has been docked, and will be newly coppered. Admiral Sir Charles Rowley, Bart., the newly-appointed Commander-in-Chief at this port, will arrive tomorrow, hoisting his flag (white at the main) on board the St. Vincent, which ship at present bears the flag of Admiral Sir Edward Codrington, G.C.B.

We have been requested to contradict a paragraph which appeared some days since, to the effect that Captain W. Allen was about to re-commission the Wilberforce, and was anxious to proceed to the coast of Africa. The gallant officer to whom this unenviable task was thus ascribed has heard nothing of his being appointed to any such service, and has had, as might have been expected, quite enough of the Niger expedition.

It is confidently stated, and pretty generally believed, that there are at the present moment being built at Blackwall five large steam-frigates for the Russian Government, which are intended to be used in the Black Sea, for the prosecution of the war against the Circassians.

The appointment of Captain Superintendent of the Royal William Victualling Yard and Royal Hospital at Plymouth, lately held by Captain John Coode, R.N., C.B., is about to be conferred on Captain Richard Arthur, R.N., brother of Sir George Arthur.

Rear-Admiral Sir Lucius Curtis, Bart, C.B., will succeed Rear-Admiral Sir John Louis, Bart., whose term of service will shortly expire, as Admiral Superintendent at Malta.

We hear that it is in contemplation by the present Admiralty Board, in the ensuing spring, to make some considerable alteration in the present establishment of the different ordinary guard-ships, by endeavouring, if possible, to do away with the expense attending the sloops at each port—allowing the flag of the Rear-Admiral Superintendent to be hoisted on the Sheers in the Dockyard, as is the case with other nations. If this arrangement is acted on, we shall hear of a considerable saving and some idea of economy.

MOVEMENTS.—The Snake arrived from Syracuse on the 5th instant, and took her departure on the 8th for Corfu, conveying thither his Excellency the Right Hon. Stewart M'Kenzie, who arrived unexpectedly, inter alia, on the 7th, in the French steamer from Marseilles. The Dutch frigates Rhyne and Jason sailed for Smyrna on the 10th, calling at Athens. The Geyser steamer of war, bringing the Ionian mail, arrived from Patras, Zante, and Corfu on the 11th, after having been ashore outside the lighthouse of Cephalonia, thrown overboard her guns, and sustained serious damage.

SHIPS IN MALTA HARBOUR, Dec. 15.—The Hero, 110, bearing the flag of Vice-Admiral Sir E. W. C. F. Owen, Commander-in-Chief; Ceylon, receiving ship, bearing the flag of Rear-Admiral Sir J. Louis; Impregnable, 104; Hemrech, 84; Vanguard, 80; Belvidera, 28; Cyclops steam-frigate; Geyser war steamer; Magpie surveying cutter; Prometheus, Polyphemus, and Alecto steam-packets; and Rhadamanthus steamer, troop ship.

THE REST OF THE FLEET.—Rodney, 92; Hogue, 36, at Barcelona; the Formidable, 84, at Mahon; Savage, 10, and Owen Glendower, convict-ship, at Gibraltar; the Lizard steam tender, on her way to Malta from Gibraltar; the D'Aigule and Snake, at Corfu; the Hove, 120, bearing the flag of Rear-Admiral Sir F. Mason, second in command, and the Scout, 18, at the Piræus of Athens; the Magicienne, 24, and Devastation war steamer, at Smyrna; the Stromboli war steamer, at Constantinople; the Indus, 78, Vernon, 50, the Hecate and Vesuvius war steamers, at Beyrout; the Medea war steamer at Alexandria; and the Beacon, surveying vessel, at Suda, in Candia.

NAVAL OFFICERS DISTINGUISHED IN CHINA.—Captain Charles Richards, who lately distinguished himself in China, and was so honourably mentioned in Sir W. Parker's despatches, has returned home with serious illness in consequence of the hardships he endured. Captain Richards was in the Albion at the battle of Algiers. He was long stationed at Portsmouth in the Victory and Britannia, as flag lieutenant to Admiral Bouverie when superintendent of the dockyard.—Captain Peter Richards, of the Cornwallis, who was also honourably named in the Admiral's despatches, was first lieutenant of the Queen Charlotte at the battle of Algiers, and served on shore at the attack upon Chinhae and Segahon, as well as at Chin-keang foo.—Captain Bourchier, C.B., has been in all the affairs in China. He commanded a brigade of seamen at the capture of Canton, was engaged at Amoy and Chinhae, and at the attack upon the camp at Segahon, as well as at Chin-keang-foo. Commander R. B. Watson was first lieutenant of the Calliope at the capture of the forts of the Bogue and Canton; commander of the Blenheim, at Amoy, and of the Modeste, at Chinhae and Segahon. Commander W. Maitland, who killed two mandarins at Chinkeang foo, was first lieutenant of the Queen Charlotte at the attacks upon Tortosa, and the bombardment of St. Jean d'Acre.—Lieutenant W. T. Bate, who had the honour of capturing a mandarin single-handed, was mate of the Blenheim, and was wounded at Canton in 1841. He served at all the affairs in China. Mr. Bate was son of the late excellent Captain Bate, who died when governor of Ascension.

The Cyclops steam-frigate arrived from Barcelona and Mahon (whither she proceeded to escort the Formidable, considerably injured) on the 12th, and returns to Mahon, accompanied by the Vanguard, as soon as the weather permits of their getting to sea, assist the disabled vessel, which it is pretended is, if practicable, to go to Malta, where the captain and officers will stand their trial for getting her ashore, or rather for not keeping her off. The Great Liverpool arrived from England and Gibraltar on the 13th, and the Polyphemus, from Marseilles, on the 14th, bringing the overland mail of the 6th. The Magpie, surveying-cutter, arrived from Suda Bay on the same day; the Rhadamanthus, from Gibraltar, via Plymouth and Gibraltar; and the Belvidere frigate, from Barcelona, with the Bishop of Gibraltar, who seems to be doomed to be unfortunate at sea, having experienced a most awfully terrific squall in entering the harbour, which the vessel did under a mere jib. The Great Liverpool, owing to the bad weather prevailing, only got to sea, on her voyage to Alexandria, this morning. The Belvidere proceeds to Gibraltar on Monday next, to be at hand in case of fresh disturbances on the coast of Spain. On the 12th a French ship of the line passed Malta, steering to the westward. The French steamer, which arrived last night from Syra, brought on Smyrna or Constantinople mails, as these had not reached Syra when she left.

In consequence of arguments respecting the height for soldiers, some pains have been taken at various times to ascertain the relative height of English, Irish, and Scotch recruits. As far as the line regiments are concerned, the Irish have a decided advantage in height. It must be, however, taken into account, that the Guards, the Marines, and the majority of the Cavalry and Artillery, are English, and the recruits for these are all of superior standard. It may then be doubted, if an equal number of tall men were dedicated out of the total recruits raised in Ireland, whether any difference would exist. In weight the English recruit has the advantage, the heights being equal. A regiment of the line that consists wholly of English men will generally be found to average shorter than either the Irish, Scotch, or the mixed corps.

Returns of the number of Courts-martial, and the punishments awarded and inflicted, have been called for from every regiment and depot, with a view to give a comparative statement for the last five years. These returns are to be at the Horse Guards prior to the meeting of Parliament.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

COMMUNICATION BETWEEN INDIA AND TRIESTE.—The company of the Austrian Lloyd's, at Trieste, has published the following details relative to the communication between India and the Mediterranean by Suez and Alexandria:—"The Austrian brig Pylades, Captain Pecori, has just arrived from Alexandria with a large cargo of tea, rice, and indigo, brought directly from India to Suez by the Indian ship Bengalee, and thence to Cairo on camels' backs. The fact is interesting, inasmuch as it is the first cargo which has been conveyed directly from India to Trieste. We are assured that carriages on two wheels are now in progress of construction to convey merchandise from Suez to Cairo, which will effect a considerable saving in the price of the conveyance of those articles. In future, merchandise intended for consumption on the continent of Europe, instead of coming round the Cape, and remaining for months in the warehouses of England, can be conveyed to Trieste, Leghorn, or Marseilles, within two months, which must add considerably to the commercial advantages of those cities."

DEAL, Dec. 26.—Arrived, the Ludlow, Johnson, from Demerara; Great Northern (steamer), from Londonderry. Last night, and the whole of to-day, it has blown very hard. The Ludlow arrived in the Downs last night, with head of mainmast gone, and the following vessels have also arrived:—The two, p.m., the day the mainmast went by the board, and carried away the mizen. Four, p.m.: She is now riding with two anchors down. There is a large fleet in the Downs, and several of them have signalled for assistance. 5, p.m. It still continues to blow hard, with every appearance of a stormy night.

OFF MARGATE, Dec. 25.—The Prince George, Friend, from Halifax, with loss of bulwarks, &c. The Crown, Liverpool, for St. John's, N.B., was abandoned on the 8th instant, in lat. 42, long. 48, dismasted, with loss of rudder, &c.; crew, saved by the Prince George, arrived here.

COLLISION AND SINKING OF A VESSEL.—Accounts were, in the course of Monday last, received at Lloyd's of the total loss of the schooner Agnes, a Scotch trading vessel belonging to Perth, which happened on the evening of Thursday week, in consequence of coming into violent collision with another vessel, a few miles from the Dudgeon floating light, situated in the roads between Cromer and Flamborough Head, in Yorkshire. The Agnes, which was under the charge of Mr. Philbaldis and four seamen, was on her passage from Perth to London. Upon approaching the light in question, at about half-past seven o'clock in the evening, with the wind blowing strongly from the west-north-west, a brig appeared ahead, apparently bearing immediately upon her. They called out; but before there was time to alter the course, both vessels came in violent contact with each other. The brig proved to be the Jennett, on her voyage to South Shields from London, and was laden. Such was the force with which she struck, that the bows of the Agnes were driven completely in down to the water's edge, compelling the crew instantly to take to the long boat, so as to save their lives, for within a very few minutes afterwards she (the schooner) sunk in deep water. They luckily succeeded in reaching the Jennett in safety, and were conveyed on to South Shields, where they were landed on Sunday morning. The vessel is reported to be fully insured.

The Lord Russell, Alexander, which sailed from Dover harbour on the 6th instant, having repaired damage sustained on a voyage from Newcastle for Sligo, with coals, was totally lost on the night of the 10th, off the coast of Ireland, and, we are sorry to add, one man met a watery grave.

FALMOUTH, Dec. 27.—W.S.W., fresh gales and squally.—Arrived, the Isabella, from London for Demerara. Sailed, the Lady Mary Wood steamer, for Gibraltar. The Dew-drop, Furler, from Newfoundland, arrived here yesterday leaky, with part of cargo thrown overboard, and loss of sails, bulwarks, &c., having been pooped on the 13th instant, in lat. 46, long 38. The Hound, from Figuera to Newfound and, put in here yesterday with part of cargo thrown overboard, loss of fore and mainmasts, and bowsprit, shattered bulwarks, sails, &c., having been struck by a sea and thrown on her beam ends, 16th inst., lat. 44, long. 36.

SUNDERLAND, Dec. 25.—Arrived the Perseus, Fisher, from Miramichi.

PENZANCE, Dec. 19.—Arrived the Rattler, from Constantinople for Liverpool, with decks swept, loss of boats, bulwarks, &c. The Caledonia, from Bay Chaleur to the Clyde, got ashore on the 17th inst. in Rackwick Bay, Island of Kerry, and is expected to become a wreck—crew saved.

YARMOUTH, Dec. 27.—The John and Elizabeth, from Montrose to London, struck on the Barnard Sand yesterday evening, and was subsequently run on the beach, making a great deal of water—cargo discharging.

BURNING OF A VESSEL AT SEA.—Intelligence has been received at Lloyd's, of the destruction of a large ship by fire on the night of Thursday week, in lat. 49, long. 4, but how or by what description of vessel is not yet known; the crew supposed to have been saved by a vessel that was seen bearing away from the wreck. The information was received through the means of the Lucy, recently arrived at Liverpool from New Orleans, which came up with the unfortunate ship enveloped in a mass of flames, and continued within a short distance until she sunk, which took place early the following morning. The masts had gone overboard before the Lucy reached her, and the fire had many hours been raging, it having been observed many miles distant.

On the subject of the wreck of the Peruvian, the Journal du Havre states that all the endeavours of the Neptune steam-tug to tow her off the shore have failed, after breaking two hawsers, and adds, that this had caused a great sensation, the Peruvian having been with 1800 bales of cotton, which, with the ship, are estimated at 500,000f. at the least; the greater part of which amount is insured at Havre on a floating policy. The whole of the cargo may be easily removed, but there are great fears that the vessel will be lost.

INSULT TO THE BRITISH FLAG.—A communication from Central America mentions the removal of the blockade from San Juan de Nicaragua on the 19th of September, in consequence of a despatch from the Consul General Chatfield, stating that the British claims had been satisfied. The day before the news reached San Juan, her Britannic Majesty's brig Charybdis, then in charge of the blockade, which had been put in force since the 8th of July, had sailed for Boca del Toro, in consequence of a request from the inhabants for British protection, which they claimed as subjects of the King of Mosquito, against the pretensions of New Granada. Captain J. A. Macdonald had left his chief officer, Mr. W. S. L. Quinlan, with eight men and a boat, in charge, and this gentleman had fixed a flag on the side of a dwelling which he had selected as his station house. As soon as the port had been declared open, the administrador and commandant sent a letter to the British officer, desiring him instantly to strike his flag and leave the port. Five of the men in the boat were on the sick list; but Mr. Quinlan could put on his sword, and, going with his interpreter alone to the commandant's quarters, told him that the flag had been hoisted by his captain's orders, and that only by orders it should be struck; that his men, though few, were willing and able to defend its honour, and that probably on his captain's return the commandant would be made to eat his insolent words. On the return of the Charybdis, and before the entrance of the port, an officer went on shore to the administrador, demanding a written apology for his conduct. Quinlan. The administrador attempted to obtain an interview with the officer, but this was refused, and he was only allowed a few hours to write his apology, which at last arrived, and was as follows:—

"JOSE DE LA TIXERA."

"SIR,—In accordance with your demand, I hereby order to you my humble apology for the insult I have offered to the British flag by my letter addressed to the British officer commanding at this port, dated September 20, 1842, in which I improperly took it upon me to strike the British flag hoisted over the station-house, and to leave the port, &c. I also acknowledge this, by courtesy, and not of right, that I have hoisted a flag at the port, and as an administrador of the port, which I claimed as my right, claimed as part of the dominions of the King of the Mosquito nation.—I have the honour to subscribe myself, &c.,

"JOSE DE LA TIXERA."

This administrador came to the determination to leave Cape Gracias á Dios Lee; and while the above negociations were going on, Captain Macdonald received a letter from the supercargo, stating that in the absence of any vessel of war belonging to his own government, he was consequently forced from Captain M. that protection which powers in alliance with each other extend to their mutual subjects and ships when necessity obliges them to ask it. The truth of the above statement was confirmed by Captain Coun, of the American brig, Captain Macdonald asked an explanation or an apology from the so-called administrador, stating that he felt it his duty to protect the subjects of the United States and Great Britain, and that he would not leave the port until the supercargo was satisfied. After many negociations, he demanded an instant verbal apology, and a promise that the Henry Lee should receive no further annoyance. The authorities made the apologies and promises desired, and the Charybdis went to sea that evening.

SCOTLAND.

DUMFRIES.—On Monday evening the convalescent patients at the Crichton Royal Lunatic Asylum had their Christmas festivities—including music, dancing, &c. On Tuesday Night, a party of insane convalescents have obtained permission of the directors to perform the farce of "Raising the Wind," for the gratification of the other inmates.

MELANCHOLY AND DETERMINED SUICIDE.—A Mrs. Murray, in the town of Dysart, put a period to her existence on the afternoon of Sunday week, while her husband was in bed, by suspending herself with a rope in the garret of their house. She seemed to have evinced great firmness of purpose and deliberate resolve in the carrying her fatal purpose into execution, for, it is said, that while they were requiring to dress the body in the grave clothes, they found the articles of dress laid out and ready for use, besides other articles of dress she had put on previous to committing the fatal deed. The cause is as yet unknown to the public. She has left no family.

Another strike has taken place at the collieries of the Dundyvan Work, near Coatbridge, which 230 men, with their wives and dependents, become unemployed.

THE MURDER IN WARWICKSHIRE.—The following particulars of the murder committed at Studley on Christmas-day, which is mentioned in another part of our paper, have since been received:—"The inhabitants of the neighbourhood of Studley have had a ghastly close to their Christmas festivities. The customary carolling of their perambulating rustics was unheeded, the general attention being absorbed in the shocking news of a murder having been committed in open day, and under the view of many persons, in the rural dwelling of Mr. Crowley, farmer, of Spernal, a small agricultural village near the former place. The assassin, James Crowley, youngest son of the gentleman above-named, has, at many previous times, committed violent assaults and broke out more violent threats against various persons upon the premises, his ire being directed more bitterly towards his father than any one else; but on this particular day his violence arose to the fearful height of threatening to take the life of his own parent, for which avowed purpose he posted himself before the house, armed with a double-barrelled gun; a constable being at hand, he proceeded with two assistants to disarm the miscreant, for the purpose of taking him into custody. As they approached, he made some passionate exclamation as to their "taking" him, levelled the gun, and shot the unfortunate constable through the head, the whole or greater part of the charge of one barrel passing into his forehead, and killing him instantly. He then coolly said, looking down on his victim, "Now you'll do!" and dared the assistants to approach and receive the contents of the other barrel. His evident determination, and the appalling effects of it, paralyzed them, and they retreated. The murderer then went off to his lodgings, mounted his horse, and rode away, and, up to the present time, has not been captured. The inmates of his father's house declare their belief of hearing him prowling round the dwelling, but this must surely be raised by their own terrors. A reward of £40 has been offered for his apprehension.

HOLYWELL-STREET NUISANCE.—The man Patterson is at length driven from his lair in this street. It appears that he rented the shop from a person named Abrahams, who had tried all in his power to get rid of him, but to no effect; Abrahams, however, was behind in his rent to the head landlord, who immediately came down upon the premises, and bundled the boy who conducted the business, together with his prints and papers, into the street, to the great satisfaction of the residents.

THE MURDER IN WHITECROSS-STREET.—On Wednesday an inquiry into the above tragical event took place before the Coroner, Mr. Baker, and a respectable jury, at the Two Brewers Inn, corner of Playhouse-yard, which, after a number of witnesses had been examined, was adjourned until Thursday, when it was again resumed. A great number of additional witnesses were brought forward, but it is unnecessary to give the particulars of their evidence, as the facts are already intelligibly stated.—Police-serjeant Ellis, G 7, deposed to Michael Meagan coming to the station-house in Featherstone-street and giving himself up. He said that he had heard Tom Leary was dead, and that the police were after him, but he knew nothing about it. His wife had been previously brought in. Catherine Singleton was brought to the police-court in the morning.—John Clainbold, police-constable 160 G, said, whilst conveying Ellen Meagan to the station-house, she exclaimed, "Oh, Lord, what shall I do? If they split this will be a hanging job."—The Coroner then summed up at considerable length, citing the law with respect to murder and manslaughter. The Jury, after consulting together for about twenty minutes, returned a verdict of "Wilful Murder" against Michael Meagan, at the same time they thought Ellen Meagan and Catherine Singleton accessories after the fact. The Coroner said they could not return such a verdict, they must either find them participating in the crime or acquit them of it. The Jury again consulted, and returned a verdict of "Wilful Murder against Michael Meagan."

FIRE IN DRURY-LANE.—On Wednesday night an alarming fire broke out in the manufactory of Mr. Hover, a paper-stainer, opposite Brownlow-street, Drury-lane. It originated in the drying-room, and spread with great rapidity. Information was soon forwarded to the fire-stations, and very quickly afterwards the engines arrived, when the firemen, with their usual exertions, were soon enabled to arrest the progress of the flames, but not until a great portion of the stock was destroyed. Mr. Hover is insured in the County Fire-office.

THE THEATRES

THE PANTOMIMES.

Old Pantomime has come round once more with his heart-shaking, side-splitting recollections, his quirks and cranks, and wreathed smiles (his merry horse-laughs rather), and his bits and raps at the passing follies of the time. What boots it to go into an encyclopædiac research as to his origin, and to find out that he first saw the light in the neighbourhood of the Aeroceraunian Mountains; albeit, unmentioned in Professor Müller's History of the Dorians—perhaps—or, that he was a native of China long before the Tartar invasion; or, that he was one of the early Incas of South America; or, that he sprung from the mysteries of the middle ages, with the melancholy, long-drawn stupidity of which our ancestors fancied themselves pleased, introducing a better and heartier state of things at this auspicious season, for which we, their descendants, have to thank them. It is enough for us to know that Pantomime and his merry train shall ever hold no mean place in our own old English recollections, although he does not annihilate time and space to such practical advantage as rail and steam; and although he does turn now and then, in a style of most wicked waggery, "the religion of the imagination" into burlesque, changing kings to worse than commoners, nobles to nincpence; making Tell a Bartlemy Fair hero, and driving King John to "put his hand to a bill," as a parody on the signing of the Magna Charta of our liberties. It were well for mankind that more than these heroic subjects were subject to the searching test of ridicule by the Christmas genius of absurdity, in whose march, although grotesque, much more of social, moral, aye, and religious reform follows than some of our most solemn-faced friends have any idea of. And, as an authority for such a position, we shall quote a poet of the heart, and proceed to our history of the theatrical festivities of the week:—

"Oh! wad some power the gifte gie us
To see oursels as ithers see us;
It wad free monye a blunder free us
And foolish notion.
What airs in dress and trait wad lea' us
And e'en devotion."

DRURY LANE.

A real Christmas audience thronged to this theatre; the pit and galleries absolutely overflowed with the crowd, and numbers could not obtain admission.

The familiar tragedy of "Jane Shore" went rapidly off. Most of it was very well heard, notwithstanding the revelry and tumult that would break out occasionally in the upper regions.

Speedily, however, were the sorrows of "Jane Shore" forgotten. "The play's the thing" for other times than the first night after Christmas. On came old pantomime, in all his glory. "William Tell" was the hero of this inimitable, domestic, tragi-comic exhibition. In the realms of slavery, in the cavern of despair, a number of imps are forging fetters for mankind, and in chorus describe their work as the forging of Cha us and fetters, of all sorts and sizes;

Be they short, be they long,
We warrant 'em strong,
And amazingly cheap at the prices:
Rap a-tap, tap!

The Demon of Slavery, drawn upon a car, and dragged by harnessed niggers, examines their work, a chain which, though he scorns it, must hold a comet to its moorings. A slave ship heaves in sight, and after it a British cruiser, which captures it after a smart engagement.

From the regions of diablerie and the mythical world the scene shifts to the real West Indies, where Blackey is "all alive and kicking" to be "redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled by the Genius of Universal Emancipation!" The impersonation of Slavery is very angry at all this, and Liberty, who arrives with her pole and cap, aggravates him by shouting "Liberty and Tell." Presto! we are in Switzerland, and beautiful was the scenery of this portion of the capricious drama. The old story is then told in a new fashion. Young Tell (Mr. Hance) is the very hero of a schoolboy's heart. He can be tumbles into the well, running after a butterfly. How quickly he profits by his father's instructions in archery, to touch him in the back instead of the target. What an eater he is, in his little chair, shoving in his plate for double allowance. And when the bear is about to devour Gesler, in the mountains, how dexterously he bisects the beast with his hunting-knife, the two halves walking off discomfited, C.D. and P.S. He is a perfect Little Pickle of the heroic age of Switzerland.

Then came the usual transformations, "turn about and wheel about," and all that, with Harlequin (C. J. Smith), Columbine (Miss Fairbrother), Clown (T. Mathews), Pantaloon (Howell); and all certainly went off "to the mark," and swimmingly. Mr. Still was the perfect personification of a tectotum, with a strong infusion of quicksilver to keep up perpetual motion. He was, indeed, the most extraordinary twirlabout, realising, in a grotesque sense, Othello's idea of her who could "turn and turn, and still go round and turn again." Amongst the miraculous changes were Bell's Life into La Belle Assemblée; and there were scores of little bell-boys, and great bell-men, and Bow-bells, and alarm-bells, and St. Bride's bell, and the Old Bailey bell, and all bells town and country, of which the climax was the "Mighty Tom." Another good hit was the change of the Old Bailey into a new ballle, who, sound asleep, with his bottle of mountain dew, runs off too late to meet the Queen. Singing for nine million was done to the life. So, how the fingers extended and the notes sounded; and how well it shifted to the stage-full of teakettles, all singing, singing, yet with no sarcastic intimation that the hullabaloo is a bubble. Many more happy ebullitions of pantomime wit were there which we cannot attempt to recount, all ending in the (ica) Gardens of the Hesperides.

COVENT GARDEN.

In the multiplicity of counsel there is wisdom. It might be heretical to contradict this saying of the wise man, if experience, in these modern times, did not now and then show that a number of wits have put their heads together, and, if they did not altogether bring forth the mouse, they certainly did not produce the mountain. This, to some extent, may be said of the "Punch" pantomime of Covent Garden, which is the combined effort of some of the most approved literary and dramatic reputations of the day. It does not follow from what we think this premise that the pantomime was bad or middling, though in some parts it was the one, and in others scarcely the other; but that, taking it altogether, "considerable, considerandis," it might have been better. Neither does this speak against the spirit and liberality of the management, which are, beyond question, to be appreciated for obtaining the best talent for the public amusement.

When the curtain rose for "Punch's" commencement a hush as profound ensued as if some solemn spectacle were about to open. The audience seemed to expect a joke to begin with, and not exactly to understand certain fairy doings which were enacted before them by an ancient Oberon and his Titania. With the second scene, however, the hopes of the laughers began to revive, for they were introduced to the vault of the Black Diamond, vulgo the coalhole of the castle of Baron Fitzwalter, wherein the rebellious barons are plotting dire designs against their liege sovereign King John: and great amusement was created, not alone to the juveniles, but to their papas and mammas, by the remarkable fact of the nose of one of the barons being not only of preternatural dimensions in regard to longitude, but possessing within itself most extraordinary powers of distension and flexibility, thereby enabling the fortunate proprietor to express his feelings of scorn or suspicion with the greatest facility, without troubling himself to call in the aid of speech. The grotesque scenes and laughter-starring rows which ensue, in hall and the field, between the obstinate monarch and his refractory barons, were in a great measure well sustained, and afforded a fair share of amusement. Among the better ones were that in which King John endeavours to escape to Boulogne with his carpet-bag and hat-case, and that in which, being compelled to "put his hand to a bill," he signs Magna Charta. Amongst the usual squibs and hits at passing events, the best was the rap at the West Middlesex Assurance Company, the office of which was represented as a splendid building, with a huge polished brass knocker, and surmounted by a colossal statue of the celebrated Ikey Solomons. Clown and Pantaloon are the projectors, and, after engaging at short notice several gentlemen of dubious appearance as directors, and electing an individual manufactured out of straw, a barber's block, and an eighteen-shilling tuglioni, as their president, they are about making their exit in a magnificent carriage, the product of their honest industry, when, instantly the magic touch of Harlequin's wand transforms their gay vehicle into one of those dark-looking omnibuses that make periodical journeys in the service of government from Bow-street to the House of Correction. Then came a slight, by anticipation, of the expected ambassador from China—his celestial excellency being represented with three legs instead of two, the human tripod performing a very grave and dignified, although rather eccentric, pas de trois à la Chinoise, to the extreme surprise of all the spectators and the consternation of some. The last scene was very prettily arranged, and was much applauded. There was some degree of humour in the pantomime, but it was too long and wiredrawn; and the hits and tricks were thinly scattered over somewhat too much tumbling and gymnastics, which might with great advantage have been curtailed. Instead of some bad new jokes a few good old ones might have also been introduced. Still we are bound to say in conclusion, that, if applause be the test of success, Punch had no reason to be so dissatisfied, that he should go home and beat his wife.

THE HAYMARKET

It were difficult to say exactly whether the manager is right or wrong in excluding pantomime from the boards of this establishment, but this much we can say, that the Christmas folks who attended it during the week, and especially on Monday night, were as merry as those who favoured any other of the temporary temples of the theatrical Momus, under the hearty inspiration of the "Jolly, holly Christmas" and his imps. It is not necessary to dilate on the merits of Mr. Farren's performance of Grandfather Whitehead. It is perfect as it is powerful and affecting. In "Patter versus Clatter," Mr. C. Mathews was as valuable and laughter-exciting as usual: and of the "Bastile," which succeeded, it is saying, perhaps, enough, to intimate that its first representation was not more highly relished than its sixth. The fourth and last, or concluding piece of this evening was the grand, comical, allegorical, magical, musical, burlesque burletta, called "Punch and the Tuft." This was a revival of an old favourite, it was originally produced as a Christmas piece, a few years ago, at the Olympic, while under the management of Madame Vestris; it has, however, on this occasion been retouched a little, and several very smart political allusions have been interlined, very pertinently applied. Madame Vestris and Mr. Charles Mathews supported the original characters, and Madame introduced the parody of "Nix my Dolly Pals," with which she took the town by surprise while she was at Covent-Garden, and in which she introduced her favourite parrot on his elegant perch. The burletta was exceedingly well got up in the stage business, the dresses, scenery, machinery, and general appointments. Master Webster, who had attracted so much notice as Little Ned in "Grandfather Whitehead," in the little part exhibited great precocity in the profession in another line, in his personification of Mother Bunch. The evening's entertainments altogether were rapturously applauded throughout by a large audience.

OLYMPIC.

If boxes, pit, and gallery, filled too full for comfort, with boisterous good humour, be the pinnacle of managerial ambition, Mr. Wild had ample reason to be pleased with his Christmas cram-bamboli: and sooth to say his entertaining bumper was more to our British taste than that mawkish drinking stuff of the German students, although it is celebrated by William Howitt. Mr. Leman Rede's "Life's a Lottery." and the extravaganza of "The Coat," were succeeded by a new pantomime, under the prepossessing cognomen of "Harlequin and Old Cosey; or, Arithmetic Hall and the Rule of Three." We cannot contradict the bills of the day, which inform us that this is an "indisputably original" entertainment, albeit made up of a thousand scenes and songs and lying jokes wherewith most Londoners are familiar. The effect on the whole was most satisfactory. Notwithstanding that one or two of our morning contemporaries have treated the Olympic pantomime with something like an implied sneer, we think, on the contrary, that, excepting the scenery of the two great houses, it was, "taking it all in all," one of the best and most successful of "the compliments of the season." There was a never-ending supply of right good jokes, and the hits were acknowledged in roars of applause. Jews were victimised, Chinamen confounded, and rival "buss" cards painted blacker than they are. "Suma" are worked with wondrous expedition under the personal superintendence of the venerable Cocker, though not according to the letter of his well-thumbed rules, the result of the whole being that the total profit of 1842 is sevenpence the pound! A personation of the royal pair, with the infants, en costume, or so supposed to be, gave great delight to the uproarious loyalty of the audience. Mr. Jefferini as a very good Clown; "Young Bologna" as Harlequin, and Miss Wright as Columbine, were much applauded, as were several of the other performers.

SURREY.

The pantomime at this house was founded on the gambols of Puck and the loves of Oberon and Titania. The introduction of and the appearance of the fairies were well managed; the scenery was well painted, especially Netley Abbey by moon-light; and a beautiful collection of fairies there were to attend upon their Queen and upon Oberon, and a right good Jack-a-lantern headed the procession. On the transformation we had Mr. Harvey, from the Edinburgh theatre, as Harlequin, who acquitted himself throughout with spirit, activity, and complete success; in fact he is a first rate artist in his line: a neat dancer as Columbine, in the person of Miss M. R. Fairbrother, from the same theatre; Mr. C. Montgomery as a regular old-fashioned, laughter-moving furtive, amative, and mischevous Clown; and our old friend, Mr. Blanchard, the very ideal of the helpless, knocked-about, and forgiving Pantaloon. The hits at the current subjects of the day were generally good; of course the Income-tax and the Chinese museum, and the Centrifugal Railway, and the Royal babies, all came in for their share: the best, however, was the visit of the Queen and her Royal consort to the land of cakes, and a real land of cakes it was. All were on the look-out for the arrival from the tops of cakes of all sorts—that bearing the Royal Arms changes into the King and Queen of Hearts, and from them emerge the royal pair, not in the best humour after their voyage. They are accompanied by the Parliament cakes and heart cakes, and other children's cakes, as ladies attendant. The Lord Provost has administered to him a most royal "slap in the face" for his superiferous negligence; Highland loyalty puts kilts upon Clown and Pantaloon, initiates them into the mysteries of a "regular mull" and "Scotch nappee;" and at the leaving all Scotland masters its presents Scotch plaids, and Scotch cakes, and Scotch whisky, and Scotch snuff's are there; but the largest present, with true national pride, is an enormous Scotch fiddle, from which royalty is not free when it again reaches England. All this told well: the changes were rapid, and the jokes good. The pantomime, as a whole, was very favourably received. The last scene, of a well-painted diorama of the Isle of Wight, passed from Portsmouth harbour to the Hall of Dazzling Light, the abode of Oberon and Titania—and was magnificent and gorgeous in the extreme.

SADLER'S WELLS.

The new pantomime produced at this theatre is called "Harlequin and good King Arthur; or, the Enchanter Merlin." The harlequinade was quite worthy of the reputation of this house, for Clown, Pantaloon, and a sort of Assistant Clown, played by Mr. Smith, had all the fun and buffetings to themselves, and never permitted their gambols to flag for an instant. Several of the changes were hits: for instance, some English cement to put on a manufacturer's head, which changes into a mixture of cow-heel and sea-shells; and the new tariff at Charing-cross, which turns out to be the new tariff. "Good King Arthur," on the whole, was perfectly successful, and, no doubt, will have a long and prosperous career.

CITY OF LONDON.

"An entirely new grand supernatural, classical, and comic pantomime," under the name of "Harlequin and the One-eyed Blacksmith; or, the Genii of the Volcanic Isles and the Fiend of the Enchanted Forge," is the holiday present of the City Theatre. The design of the piece, in which were exhibited Jupiter, Vulcan, Neptune, Mercury, Venus, and other heathen deities, represents the fiend Despair as exhibiting a vindictive interference with Vulcan, the consequence of which is a complaint to Jupiter, and which is made in the presence of the gods, in their celestial dwelling. The decision is given in favour of Vulcan, when the transformations take place, and Vulcan is changed into Harlequin, Despair into Pantaloon, Venus into Columbine, and Discord into the Clown. After passing through many trials and difficulties, all matters are satisfactorily arranged, to the delight of Vulcan and Venus. The tricks were not very numerous. Several of the scenes were much applauded, and the holiday folks appeared delighted with the evening's entertainments.

It will be gratifying to our theatrical readers to learn that in consequence of the success which has attended the performances at Covent Garden Theatre, during the past month, the period which, it will be remembered, the Company undertook to keep the theatre open at their own risk, that the receipts have enabled the whole of the company to receive their respective salaries in full, leaving such a balance, that the Proprietors have been paid the extra £15 per cent which they consented to deduct from the £35 nightly rent.

The Promenade Concerts, which terminated on Friday the 23d, were so successful during the brief season of 20 nights, that M. Jullien has netted the sum of £1125, after the payment of all his liabilities in the theatre, including the amount of one fifth of the nightly receipts and Mr. C. Arnold the Proprietor's rent. This arrangement proved a fortunate one to the latter gentleman, who instead of receiving the sum of £10 nightly, the usual amount has obtained more than double the sum on several occasions, the receipts having frequently amounted to £170 nightly. Mons. Jullien entertained the principal members of his band with a sumptuous breakfast at Very's on Monday, previous to his departure for the Continent.

Mr. Charles Pitt, late of Covent Garden Theatre, has quitted that establishment and joined the Company of the Theatre Royal, Manchester.

Mrs. Fitzwilliam, since her sudden retirement from the Haymarket Theatre, has been playing with great success at the Liver Theatre, Liverpool.

The Royal Lyric, Liverpool. The business here has been so bad during the last few months of Mr. W. J. Hammond's management, that the Proprietors have, it is said, consented to a reduction of rent to the amount of £500 a year less.

On Monday night no less than fourteen theatres were open for the reception of the public, besides ten saloons, licensed for musical and dramatic entertainments. The sum of money received at the doors of each theatre for admission has amounted at round numbers for the whole to the large sum of £2000, paid for dramatic amusement alone.

Theatre Royal, Bath.—The theatrical season, in this once fashionable town, will commence on Saturday, the 7th of January. Mr. Hooper, the new Lessee, has engaged Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean for the first six nights, who will make their appearance in the characters of Benedick and Beatrice, in Shakspere's Comedy of "Much ado about Nothing."

CURIOUS BUT WHOLESOME REGULATIONS.

Among the laws of the Thebans, one prohibits the promotion of any citizen to the magistracy who has not quitted the retail trade for the space of ten years; and another inflicts a penalty on painters and sculptors who do not treat their subjects with proper decency.

VELOCITY OF SOUND.

Dr. Denham found, by many accurate experiments, that sound moves at the prodigious rate of eleven hundred and forty-two feet in one second of time.

THE ERUPTION OF MOUNT ETNA.

A correspondent who writes from Palermo, and dates his letter December the 1st, gives the following description of this wonderful phenomenon:—"The day before yesterday, passing along the Marina, or public walk that skirts the extremely beautiful bay of Palermo, and casting my eye over the range of the Madonian mountains, and beyond the picturesque hills of Termini, I saw resting above the snowy ridge of hoary-headed old Etna (which lies literally east of a straight line from here), a long line of feathery thrish cloud, which, from its peculiar tree-like shape, I knew at once to be smoke from the volcano. Accordingly, towards night, when the sun had dropped down into the bay of Mondello, a deep-red lurid glare became distinctly visible at the foot of the column of smoke, and all the world was then aware that the volcano was in active operation. This has continued ever since, dimly visible by day in a pillar of cloud of that peculiar form which an eye experienced in eruptions instantly perceives to be the vapour from a crater; and more conspicuous by night in a body of deep-red fire, of the apparent size of an ordinary haycock, but brightening and lessening fitfully with the swells and lulls of the blast of the fiery furnace. The present eruption (which is at this moment flaming away with undiminished brilliancy and power) is the first that has been visible at Palermo since 1832. The eruption began on Sunday night. The smoke that afternoon, and the drying up of the springs, betokened that Enceladus was getting fidgety; and in the dead of the night the mountain heaved and quivered like the midships of a three-decker when she pours her first broadside into the ribs of the enemy. A roar succeeded louder than a thousand train of artillery, and myriads of red-hot rocky fragments shot up to the heavens."

CURIOUS ASTRONOMICAL FACT

There is no new moon in the month of February, 1843, but there are two new moons in the month of March following. It is new moon on the 30th of January, again on the 1st of March, and also on the 30th of March.

RELIGIOUS CEREMONY.

The Vigie de l'Ouest of St. Malo says—"A religious ceremony of great interest has taken place here. It was that of giving the benediction by the clergy to the brig the Marie Joseph, bound with missionaries for the Marquesas Islands and other countries in the same latitudes. About eleven o'clock the Archbishop of Calicedonia and the Bishop of the Marquesas Islands, surrounded by the clergy of the neighbourhood, proceeded in procession from the cathedral to the vessel, in the midst of an immense crowd, and gave the benediction. This vessel is the first to the above-named destination on a religious mission, and carries out the Bishop of the Marquesas and twelve missionaries, to convert the inhabitants to Christianity. It also has on board twelve nuns, who are going to religious establishments in Peru, as well as a certain number of members belonging to the brotherhood of St. Joseph, who are going to labour at the civilization of the islands in the Pacific. The Marie Joseph displayed a red cross banner, like that of the Templars, and another bearing the pontifical tiara."

QUALITIES FOR MONEY GETTING.

In Britain that individual is fitted to be most successful in the career of wealth and its attendant advantages, who possesses vigorous health, industrious habits, great sedateness, a powerful intellect, and just so much of the moral feelings as to serve for the profitable direction of his animal powers. All else is the union of endowments would render self-gratification, and worldly minded prudence the leaning motives of his actions; would furnish intellect sufficient to give them effect, and morality adequate to restrain them from abuses, or from defeating their own gratification. A mind so constituted would feel his faculties to be in harmony with his external condition; he has no lofty aspirant ons after other goodness or enjoyment which he cannot realize; he is pleased to devote his undivided energies to active business of life, and he is generally successful. He acquires wealth and distinction, stands high in the estimation of society, transmits comfort and abundance to his family, and dies in a good old age.—Combe's Moral Philosophy.

EARLY VEGETATION AND HIGH TEMPERATURE.

Within the last few days Covent-garden market has displayed an exhibition of flowers unprecedented for the season. Tulips, narcissuses, rhododendrons, azalias, and camel lias, have been exhibited in full bloom, as well as pinks, wallflowers, with its delightful scent. Amongst other flowers violets in very great profusion, heaths, hyacinths, jonquils, and pomeslias, all in excellent variety. From a meteorological register kept at Lambeth during the last week the lowest point of the thermometer was 32 deg. F. on Friday night, and the highest, 56 deg. F. at noon on Thursday. From the meteorological register kept at the Horticultural Society's gardens, at Chiswick, during the last sixteen years, as compared with the present week, it appears that the highest temperature was the 30th December, 1833, when the thermometer was 56 deg. F.; and the lowest, the 25th December, 1832, when the temperature was 12 deg. F. From these observations it also appears that the night of the 25th December averages 27 deg. F., being the lowest temperature in the year.

It appears from a recent statistical return that there are in Austria and its dependencies, including its Italian territory, 25,500,000 Catholics, 3,500,000 members of the United Greek Church, 2,950,000 of the non-United, 1,250,000 Lutherans, 2,200,000 of the Reformed Church, 45,000 Socinians, and 600,000 Jews. The number of religious houses for men amounts to 760, comprising 10,354 persons, and including 27 religious orders. The Brothers of Mercy possess 34 houses and 349 inmates; the Benedictines, 37, and 1093 inmates; and the Capuchins, 38, and 1235 inmates. There are 157 convents, containing 3681 women.

A friend to Astro-Meteorology states his opinion, "that this winter will not only be much more severe than any we have had of late years, but that the cold weather will commence soon after the new moon, if not before. The year will pass out with sharp weather, whilst from the 1st to the 11th of January we are likely to experience the lowest temperature for the next year. About the 3rd and 7th days will be extremely rigorous, with much snow, and probably wind."

On opening a vase lately discovered in the ruins of Herculaneum, the learned Abbé Fiorelli found an orange preserved in vinegar. It appears the Romans pickled oranges as we do gherkins.

SCARCITY OF FUEL.

Firewood is said to be so scarce in some parts of the middle states of America that a man with a wooden leg is afraid to venture out after dark, for fear of being robbed of it.

PUBLIC WORSHIP.

The following days of the week are set apart for public worship in differnations:—Sunday, or the Lord's Day, by Christians; Monday, by the Greeks; Tuesday, by the Persians; Wednesday, by the Assyrians; Thursday, by the Egyptians; Friday, by the Turks; Saturday, by the Jews.

AMERICAN NEWSPAPER EDITORS

No editor capable of doing credit to his cloth and calling is dissatisfied with his profession. It is a life of fun, variety, wit, humour, sympathy, observation, devotion, honour, and learning. Indolence is in their constitution; pure intellectual enjoyment—from the play of the knitting needle, or the good frolics of childhood, to the clash of conflicting armies and the noble sagacity of gigantic genius in Congress or Parliament. The essence of all these entertaining, good, or beautiful in every other pursuit is concentrated in this. Every art and science; every shrub, tree, and flower; the bowels of the land and mountains, and rivers, lakes, and seas, with all that sport therein; the camp and the barroom; the race track and the pulpit; the writing-house and the dairy; the festival and funeral; the parlour and the kitchen; the store or the coal hole, the gay haunts of pleasure—all contribute their most precious mites to the rich treasury of editorial entertainment. These are the editor's wealth. His forte—a fortune more rich and rare than the gems of Golconda. The hours which the Fates have allotted up his life are more numerous than his moments—consisting for ever his mind from grave to gay, and giving him to feel more of mortal pleasure, to experience a greater diversity of human sensations in a day than others know in an age. His is emphatically a "harp of many strings." Those intermunable growlers at the profession would growl the same if in Paradise. In no condition on earth would they be content. They should lay down a tripod whose magic virtue they cannot comprehend, and abdicate their chair to some one more capable of appreciating its enjoyments.—Baton Rouge Gazette.

DISTINCTIONS

Mankind will never be, in an eminent degree, virtuous and happy, till each man possess that portion of distinction, and no more, to which he is entitled by his personal merits.

CLAREMONT.

Her Majesty having determined upon again honouring Claremont with her presence, we lose no time in presenting a view of this very delightful retreat. In our fifteenth number will be found some historical particulars of the place; but we think the facts there given may just now be again glanced over with interest. Claremont owed its origin to Sir John Vanbrugh, who bought some land here and built a house for his own accommodation. Pelham, Earl of Clare, afterwards Duke of Newcastle, bought the estate of Sir John, much improved the grounds, and added a banquetting-room for the entertainment of his colleagues and parliamentary supporters. Kent, the gardener, had the laying out of the grounds at Claremont, of whom Horace Walpole, in his tract on gardening, says, "that if his ideas were rarely great, it was owing to the novelty of his art. The features in his landscapes were seldom majestic; he aimed at immediate effect. His clumps were puny. A small lake, edged by a winding bank, with scattered trees that led to a seat at the end of the pond, was common at Claremont and others of his designs." The seat derives its name from a building erected on a mount in the park by Lord Clare, and called after his own name. Of the gardens at Claremont another writer says, rather pompously, "There you may wander with secure delight, and saunter with perpetual amusement." The grounds being thus improved, the original house was found no longer worthy so magnificent a demesne. The great Lord Clive, who purchased the estate from the Duke of Newcastle, gave Browne orders to erect a mansion regardless of expense, who is said to have performed the task very much to the satisfaction of his employer, although the expense was above one hundred thousand pounds. It is a noble mansion, forming an oblong square of forty-four yards by thirty-four. On the ground floor are eight spacious rooms, besides the hall of entrance and the grand staircase. In the principal front a flight of thirteen steps leads to the great entrance, under a pediment supported by columns of the Corinthian order. The general effect is grand without heaviness, and chastely elegant. On the death of Lord Clive, this estate was sold for little more than one third of what the mansion and improvements had cost, and was purchased by Lord Galway, by whom it was sold to the Earl of Tyrconnell, who disposed of it to Charles Rose Ellis, Esq; this gentleman resided at Claremont until 1816, when it was purchased by Government for £60,000 for the country residence of the Princess Charlotte and Prince Leopold, now King of Belgium.

The particulars were gleaned from a pleasant book upon a pleasant subject, "The Environs of London,"* from which we before extracted some engravings, quoted text, and half promised a return to the volume. What better opportunity than the present, when some of the scenes it describes are about to be the suburbs of the Court? Dipping, then, into the completed volume, we find near Claremont a sketch which calls up a mournful recollection. It is with its quiet rural graveyard, where slumbers William Maginn. In its neighbourhood he ended his career.

The church, dedicated to St. Peter and St. Mary, is built of flints and rough-hewn stones. It consists of a nave, with two aisles, and a chancel; the nave is divided from the aisles by pointed arches resting on pillars, of which those in the north side are round, with capitals adorned with volutes dead at her feet. This was thought sufficiently wonderful to be chronicled in his monument, and he is accordingly there portrayed in the act of stabbing the stag. A large black marble, at the entrance of the chancel, commemorates Lilly, the famous astrologer; being placed here, as the inscription informs us, out of love for the seer, by Elias Ashmole, founder of the museum bearing his name.

Of Walton-bridge we also give a sketch. It is built of brick, and above its rather handsome span we catch a glimpse of the woods at Oatlands. The Thames here runs only three miles an hour — the tide not reaching Walton by near ten miles.

Another object of interest near Claremont is Wolsey's Tower, at Esher.

Wolsey, on giving Hampton Court to the king, ordered the bishop's house here to be repaired, intending to reside, when the king should be at Richmond or Hampton Court. At this place he dismissed all his servants, and lived in much embarrassment of mind, body, and estate; now having his hopes excited, now desponding, or, as he subscribes himself, "most miserable." Hence he retired for a time to Richmond; and thence, all hope of his final restoration to royal favour having vanished, went to York.

the south side hexagons. At the west end is a square tower built with the same materials as the church, buttresses diminishing in stages, a small turret at each corner. The north aisle has a magnificent marble monument, executed by Roubiliac, to the memory of Lord Shannon, a distinguished military officer, and one of the lords justices of Ireland. In the chancel are monumental brasses, on one of which, being suspended by nail so that both sides may be examined, is the representation of a man sitting on the back of a stag, with his sword in the stag's throat; on the other side is a like device, with some trifling variations, commemorative of one John Selwyn, under-keeper of the park at Oatlands, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. This man, it would appear by popular tradition, was famous for his strength, agility, and skill in horsemanship, specimens of all which he exhibited before the queen, at a grand stag-hunt in that park, where, attending, as was his duty of office, he in the heat of the chase suddenly leaped from his horse upon the back of the stag, both running at that time with their utmost speed, and not only kept his seat gracefully in spite of every exertion of the affrighted beast, but, drawing his sword, with it guided him towards the queen, and coming near her plunged it in his throat, so that the animal fell the volume, what more agreeably suggestive than a quiet scene from old Thames?—one of those bits which wood is so capable of portraying, when under the hands of a skilful engraver.

Shepperton is one of the favourite resorts of London anglers; the deeps are proverbial among the "gentle craft" for piscatorial triumphs; in truth, the quantities of the finny tribe said to have been captured in Hadley's hole, where our brother anglers now appear busily engaged, surpass all bounds of calculation.

Closing the book, we do so admiring its subject and its illustrations, with a suggestion and a hope. We would suggest that when our readers seek to enjoy the rural beauties of the environs of London, they make this volume their companion. And we finish our notice of Claremont with the hope that its pleasant scenes and genial air will amuse and invigorate the youthful monarch who has chosen it for a passing abiding place.

LITERATURE.

THE NEW CHAPTER OF KINGS, OR THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND IN MINIATURE. Small 4to. pp. 48. London, 1842. C. KNIGHT and Co.

This useful little brochure for children should rather have been called the Chapter of "Sovereigns" than of "Kings," since its very last page enables us to present to our readers the portrait of one who is a good Sovereign though no King—our own fair and virtuous Victoria, who was born in 1819, began to reign in 1837, and is thus well-wished for by the poetical historian whose work we have in hand:—

> Victoria now reigns, and—by Providence bless'd
> May her fame and her virtues surpass all the rest—
> As great as the greatest—as good as the best!

The numerous portraits which this pretty and appropriate little trifle contains are really good and characteristic, being after the works of accredited painters of highest eminence in art, finely and clearly engraved on wood. The only purely fanciful picture is that of "Boadicea exciting the Britons against the Romans," which we here commend to the notice of our young readers.

We can, indeed, speak a good word of praise for the little volume altogether.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

HATFIELD BROAD OAK.

Hatfield Broad Oak is a village in Essex, about seven miles off the high road from London to Newmarket, east of Harlow. It stands on a gentle eminence rising from the banks of a streamlet, now honoured with a place amongst "the tributaries of the Thames." The parish is extensive, and is called by Morant "Hatfield Regis, or Broad-Oke." The "adjunct Regis," he says, "seems to have been given upon the conquest, because it was royal demesne;" and for a long series of years the manor was held by crown grants, and was successively in the hands of Robert Earl of Anandale, Humphrey Earl of Hereford and Essex and his wife, daughter of Edward I. Thomas of Woodstock also enjoyed possession of this manor; and it would seem that John of Gaunt had property here. Duke Humphrey, too, his son, held the manor, and Edward III. gave it to Lord Rache, of whom it came into the family of the Barringtons. On the dissolution of monasteries Hatfield Priory also came into the last named family, having been purchased of Thomas Noke, to whom it was given by Henry VIII. This priory was founded by Albesel de Vere, Earl of Oxford, for the order of Black Monks. After the dissolution it was for some time the residence of the Barringtons; they next lived at Barrington Hall, now a farm-house, about two miles north of the town; and subsequently a more fitting edifice was erected by them, as now standing in a park immediately behind the church.

The church is a noble structure, supposed of the date of Elizabeth or James. The chancel seems to stand on the site of the great (or centre) tower, or at the entrance of the choir of the ancient priory church, the choir of which is to be traced to a considerable extent westwardly. The present structure has every appearance of being built of the material of the still older church; indeed some of the walls would seem to have been part of the original building. The church was much beautified in 1623; again in the middle of the last century; and now it is once more undergoing a thorough course of repair and adornment, the money being furnished by trust funds for that purpose.

Hatfield Forest takes its range to the west and north-west, over about 1200 acres of land, and where once stood an oak of "extraordinary bigness," whence this place took its name of Broad Oak. This tree has long since perished, no doubt; but there is another in the forest,

> Survivor sole of all
> That once lived there;
> A shattered veteran, hollow-trunk'd and bare.

This old trunk is carefully fenced in, to save it from the spoiler, of whatever kind, as if held in great veneration; and, indeed,

> Could a mind imbued
> With truth from heaven created thing adore,
> He might with reverence kneel and worship there.
> It seems idolatry, with some excuse,
> When our forefather Druids in their oaks
> Imagined sanctity.

This is called the "Double Oak;" they say,

> Time made thee what thou wast—king of the woods;
> And time has made thee what thou art—a cave
> For owls to roost in.
> O could'st thou speak,
> As in Dodona once, thy kindred trees
> Oracular, we would not, curious, ask
> The future, best unknown; but at thy mouth,
> Inquisitive, the less ambiguous past.

The value of this forest to the royal larder would appear from this (Henry III.)—"It is commanded that Isab. de Bruse shall not cut down the wood in Hatfield, that the venison be not destroyed." Again, in the reign of Edward III. "Item est quædam foresta, called Hatfield Forest, the hunting whereof belongeth to the King." The quality of the venison indeed cannot be questioned, under the sign manual of Robert de Bruse (temp. Edward I.), granting to the Convent of Trenitate (a neighbouring priory) "a shoulder of every deer in my park at Hatfield." This grant is dated from Broomsboo-bury, in this parish, now the property of Earl Roden, and granted to his ancestor by Henry VIII. The residence is now a farm-house. There stands to the north-west of the church a solitary stack of chimnies to mark the site of Ryes, lately the residence of S. Chamberlayne, Esq.; a little further on is the Lee Hall, once a mansion, now a farm-house. Matchings Barns, once the property of Edward Duke of Buckingham, is also a farm-house. Hatfield Bury was also a fair mansion, standing near the church, and now in ruins. Barrington Hall is dismantled of its very furniture, and so all the importance of this place is gone, although its old associations are left. Down Hall is, however, an exception to this desolation; it is the residence of J. T. Selwyn, Esq., and stands beautifully on an eminence to the south-west. Here lived "one Matthew Prior," the poet, under favour of his friend and patron the Earl of Oxford, and it is quite a fit place for the Muses' haunt! On the death of Prior the Earl often retired to this beautiful spot, anciently designated "De la Doune," as it well deserves.

It would seem there was a justice seat held here, as at Chigwell and Waltham, to determine on forest affairs (temp. James and Chas I.); and it is probable the royal arms that are embazoned on the wall of a house in this place, towards the forest, would indicate that its sittings were held there. But whether so or not, it appears that the verderer of Hatfield did at times summon before him the rangers, verderers, and agisters of all the forests in Essex, as did Sir Nicolas de Banenton, holding then the offices of woodward and chief forester of Hatfield.

Our sketch is taken a little above the village, from the south-east.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XXV.

THOMAS MILNER GIBSON, M.P.

Mr. T. Milner Gibson is one of the representatives of the great manufacturing town of Manchester, for which place he was first returned in 1841. He first entered parliament, however, not as the member for Manchester, but as the member for Ipswich, in 1837; he sat for it for two years, then accepted that always unprofitable, but sometimes convenient, office, the stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds, stood a contest for the same borough, and lost the election. He contested Cambridge in 1839, but unsuccessfully. Perhaps the reader will ask how all this came to pass — and thereby hangs a tale which had considerable political interest at the time. Mr. Gibson presented in his person the phenomenon of a conversion to the principles of what then had every appearance of being the losing party—a strong proof, we think, that his conversion was sincere. He came out from among the party he at first espoused, and joined the ranks of the Liberals; and so ably did he advocate the new opinions he had adopted that he was returned for Manchester in the last general election.

Such cases almost always excite a controversy, too often of a very violent nature. The party left by the convert impute interested and selfish motives for the change: in the party gaining the recruit, there is joy as over a sinner who repenteth. We need scarcely say that the truth is generally missed on both sides; it is an unfortunate truth that men are far more likely to judge illiberally of the actions of their fellows than to give them credit for disinterestedness. Those who in no one action of their lives are uninfluenced by a motive cannot even imagine how very differently others may be constituted from themselves. Appearances, too, often operate against the nobler view of such things which we ought to encourage. To take a familiar instance in the case of the poet Dryden: it is well known that in his mature age he embraced the principles of the Roman Catholic church; his conversion was singularly ill-timed for his own reputation for sincerity; it was immediately on the accession of James II., when the tide of court patronage appeared to be turning strongly in favour of the church of Rome, Dryden was included in the herd of the self-seeking time-servers of the day; and, being the court poet, was accused of apostacy, deliberately committed for the purpose of keeping his place. Dryden might have asked, in the words of another poet yet greater than he—

> And who art thou that on the throne dost sit,
> To judge at distance of a thousand miles,
> With the short-sighted vision of a span?

The world had judged from appearances, and, as frequently happens when it so decides, it had greatly erred. The expulsion of James, the accession of William the Third, and the establishment of Protestant ascendancy followed. Had Dryden been a self-seeker, he would have now recanted, and renounced his new opinions; the road to place and profit would have been opened by it. But he did nothing of the kind; what he had become he remained, deaf to all persuasions, unshaken by all temptations of worldly advantage. The consequence was, that old age found him destitute of all his own energies, which he was compelled to use as a bookseller's hack, writing his fables and tales almost to provide for the day that was passing over him; building the lofty rhyme, and earning the title of "glorious John" in the midst of poverty and sickness, and forced by need to dedicate his productions to patrons whom he must have despised, in terms of such fulsome flattery, that remain to make us wonder how the genius that could rise so high could stoop so meanly, for in some of them he does in truth sound the very bass string of humility. May not others have been as honest and as unfortunate as Dryden, rightly estimated only when human praise and censure are alike unavailing. In mentioning this instance, we do not put political opinion and religious belief on the same level; nor wish to intimate that the contemporaries have judged as harshly of Mr. Gibson for changing the one, as the men of Dryden's day judged the poet for changing the other; all we wish to impress is the necessity of believing in the existence of all the good motives we can, and as few as possible of the sinister ones. The lesson may be conveyed in few words, and the one text, "who art thou that judgest thy brother," may save us the necessity of a sermon. Late events have taken much from the singularity that once attached to Mr. Gibson's change of opinion; on certain principles of commercial policy, conversions have of late been abundant. They are worth reflecting upon as signs of the times.

Out of these convertites
There is much matter to be heard and learnt.

Beyond this circumstance of general interest, the political career of the hon. member for Manchester does not present much material for remark. His personal appearance is prepossessing, and his manners are affable and courteous. He is the son of Major Gibson, of the 87th Regiment, and is now about thirty-five years of age. He is an able advocate of the principles he has espoused, and continues to possess the confidence of the constituency he represents in Parliament.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

The Hon. and Rev. Thomas Cavendish, brother of Lord Waterpark, has been appointed by the Bishop of Lichfield to the non-residentiary canonry or prebend of Hansacre or Freeford, vacant by the death of the Rev J. Newing, B.D. The hon. and reverend gentleman is vicar of Doveridge, Derbyshire

The Earl of Pembroke has presented the valuable living of Bishopstone, vacant by the lamented death of the Rev. G. Montgomery, to Archdeacon F. Lear, of Salisbury.

The Commissioners for Building New Churches have signified to the Rev. John Hatchard, vicar of Plymouth, in reply to his application, that they are willing to contribute the sum of £1000 towards the erection of another church in the parish of St. Andrew, Plymouth. The site upon which it is contemplated to erect the church is a portion of the road between Oxford street and Hook's-place, a neighbourhood inhabited almost exclusively by the poorer classes.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

WESTMINSTER SESSIONS.

The December Sessions for the City and Liberty of Westminster were held on Wednesday morning before a bench of magistrates. In the absence of Mr. Sergeant Adams, Mr. Walsby presided as chairman. The calendar was very light, it containing only the names of 18 prisoners for trial, and none of them for any aggravated offence.

Thomas Fisher, aged 23, was indicted for stealing one pair of leathern reins, value 12s., the property of her M. esty the Queen Dowager.—It was proved that the prisoner had obtained an entrance into the royal stables at Marlborough House; that short afterwards the articles were found in his possession, and her Majesty's state coachman identified them as property belonging to the Queen Dowager.—The jury returned a verdict of "Guilty," and the prisoner (who received a good character) was sentenced to be imprisoned one month in the House of Correction.

John Barnes, aged 38, was indicted for stealing four cloaks, value 19s. the property of William Leveson Gower, Esq. The prisoner appeared, was a well-known area sneak, and on the 3rd of the present month he sneaked down the area steps of No. 33, Lower Brook-street, where the prosecutor resides, and entering the housekeeper's room he carried off four cloaks that had been sent in to Mr. Gower, who is in the habit of distributing clothing to the children of a school attached to his estate in Surrey. The prisoner was met by Mrs. Brown, the housekeeper of Mr. Gower, on the stairs, and an alarm being raised the prisoner was pursued and taken into custody. The jury returned a verdict of guilty, and the court sentenced the prisoner to six months' imprisonment and hard labour, three weeks of the term solitary.

William Neeves, a well-dressed youth, aged 14, was indicted for stealing a purse, value 9d., the property of Mary Ann Ellis; one seal, value 3s. 6d.; the property of Mary Ann Horsey: and one card-case, value 1s. 6d., the property of Eliza Byham.—The prisoner was also indicted for stealing an ivory tablet, and one silver pincher, the property of Ellen Gilbert. The prisoner on being called upon to plead burst into tears, and said he had been drawn into the association of a bad boy, who had stolen several things, and he had been induced to do so too.—Mr Prendergast said he had been instructed to defend the prisoner, but after the straightforward manner in which he had acknowledged his guilt, he would not attempt to withdraw the plea. The case was truly an afflicting one. The prisoner's father was a music composer, and a man of extraordinary talent. Formerly he moved in a very respectable sphere, but misfortune succeeding misfortune and losses sustained great losses, and was reduced in circumstances. An attempt had been made to get the prisoner into the band of a horse regiment, but he was rejected on account of a defect in his hand, he having been born with his thumbs, and undergone an operation.—A witness, who had employed the prisoner for five months, gave him an excellent character.—The chairman said, however much the court pitied for the prisoner's parents and himself, it had a duty to perform, and but for the interposition of his brother magistrates he should have transported the prisoner. The court, however, would, on this occasion, sentence him (the prisoner) to three months' imprisonment and hard labour in the House of Correction, with the solemn assurance that if he did not forsake his bad companions, and ever appeared again in that court, he would be sentenced for life.—The prisoner was then removed, and a heart-rending scene followed, his parents and sister hanging about his neck, and kissing him affectionately, until the sturdy arm of the gaoler removed the lad from their grasp.

POLICE.

WORSHIP-STREET.—MYSTERIOUS MURDER IN WHITECROSS-STREET.—Michael Meagan, a shopkeeper and dealer in second-hand boots, in Whitecross-street, Ellen Regan, alias Meagan, his wife, Catherine Singleton, a sister of the latter, and Hannah Cotter, an elderly woman, living at Meagan's in the capacity of servant, were placed at the bar before Mr. Broughton, the sitting magistrate, on suspicion of having been concerned in the murder of Thomas Leary, a single man, a journeyman in Meagan's employ. The prisoners were brought to the court by a party of the G division of police, and the court and all the avenues to it were thronged by the residents of Whitecross-street and neighbourhood, amongst whom the occurrence had occasioned intense excitement.—Mr. William Richard Bland, the first witness, stated that he was a tobacconist, keeping a shop at 106, Whitecross-street, immediately opposite the prisoner Meagan's, and after ten o'clock on Sunday night was serving a customer, when a strange country and bustle on the opposite side of the street attracted his notice, and going to the door he saw the prisoner Meagan come out of his shop, and two of the females also, in a hurried and agitated manner. Meagan himself went off in one direction, and the females the opposite one, and soon afterwards the witness saw a man called "Jack," who worked for Meagan, and lived in the house, come out wringing his hair and his hands, and uttering exclamations as if he had witnessed something dreadful. The witness then went into the shop, and saw the woman Cotter, who, in answer to his question as to what was the matter, said she did not know; but, looking behind the counter, he saw the deceased Leary lying there. He at first thought the deceased was asleep, or insensibly drunk; but, looking again at him more particularly, he saw that he was bleeding profusely from a wound in the side, and just then the man they called Jack returned with Mr. Wright a surgeon, who sent for some strapping and dressed the wound. The deceased never spoke after the last stroke. Tom, tell me who did it before you die." While witness was reiterating his entreaties to know who had done it the deceased closed his eyes, and witness then hurried off for Mr. Wright's assistant, Mr. Frederick Wright, surgeon, described the wound as half an inch or three quarters in breadth. He had not probed it, but was of opinion that it had penetrated the lungs. The deceased died very soon after he arrived, and was in a state of syncope during the whole of the time till he died. The witness pointed up a knife, now produced, which he found by the side of the body, and he believed the wound had been made by a knife of that description. The knife was a shoemaker's knife, with square end and keen edge. The witness Bland identified it as belonging to Meagan.—The male prisoner said, in his defence, that he was quite innocent of the charge of murdering Leary, he said, had begun quarrelling, and insisted upon having money. The deceased, who was very drunk, threatened to strike him unless he gave the money. Prisoner then went out and took a glass of beer, and returning home he heard that his wife was in custody, and the occurrence in question had taken place in his absence. He knew nothing about it.—Hannah Cotter, the servant, was, for some time, unwilling to give evidence, and she went up stairs about that time to make the beds. When she had done that, and returned down stairs, she saw the deceased, Leary, stooping beside the counter, and heard him exclaim, "Tom, don't!" or "Oh, don't!" immediately after which he fell down behind the counter. Witness then went out to get assistance. There was nobody in the house but the deceased and herself when she went up to make the beds, and she heard no noise or quarrelling after which he fell down behind the counter. Witness then went out to get assistance. There was nobody in the house but the deceased and herself when she went up to make the beds, and she heard no noise or quarrelling whatever when she went up stairs, and there was no one there but the deceased when she went down again.—The magistrate, remanded the prisoners for a week.—It would be improper to give publicity to the various rumours current in the neighbourhood relative to the dreadful occurrence, but it may be stated that the general belief is that Meagan's suspicion of his wife's fidelity, coupled with her sudden absence from the house of his brother-in-law, induced him to follow her home, and that some circumstance at present hidden hastened the catastrophe.

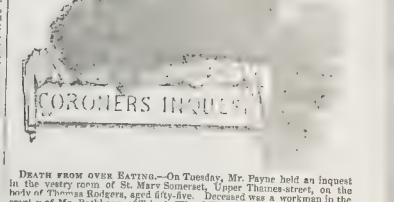
Thomas Finn, a carter, in the employ of Mrs. Weaty, a carrier, residing in Spitalfields, was charged at the bar, on suspicion of having stolen a quantity of indigo, said to be worth about £40. The prisoner had been employed to cart a chest of indigo from one of the East India warehouses to the premises of his master, and Mr. Kaltenbaugh, of Leadenhall-street, for shipment. Upon subsequent examination it was discovered that the indigo had been stolen out of the chest, and coals substituted.—A clerk from the East India warehouse proved that the chest contained the indigo when delivered there to the prisoner; and a witness from the docks proved that the chest, when examined there, and found to be filled with coals, was in the same state as received from the prisoner.—The prisoner was remanded for further evidence

CLERKENWELL.—DETERMINED ATTEMPT TO COMMIT SUICIDE. John Shamrock, aged 19, was charged with using violent on the previous night in Bagnigge Wells-road.—From the evidence it appeared that between seven and twelve o'clock the prisoner, by his cries and shouts, assembled a large mob of persons in the above-mentioned place. For so doing he was taken to the station-house, and, when in a cell, was locked up. He was in somewhat excited by liquor, but not drunk. He resides in Castle-street, Turnmill-street, Clerkenwell.—Inspector Penny, of the G division, deposed that he visited the cell about twenty minutes after the prisoner was locked up in it, and was shocked at finding him, to all appearance, dying. He was lying on the floor with a cord fastened as a noose round his neck, and tied to his right leg. He was foaming at the mouth. As there was no means of suspension in the cell, it was evident the prisoner had attempted to destroy himself by this contrivance. Witness at once loosed the cord, and after a lapse of five minutes the prisoner began to show signs of life. Restoring cordials were administered to him, and he gradually recovered. There was then a person left to watch him, but he slumbering for a few minutes, the prisoner made a rope of his neck and shocked handkerchiefs, and again tried to effect his purpose in the same manner: his struggles to do so aroused the watchman just in time to save his life. Two or three persons were left to take care of him for the remainder of the night. Mr. Combe asked the prisoner why he attempted to destroy himself?—The prisoner shook his head despondingly, and said he had nothing to say.—From further inquiries it was ascertained that the prisoner is the only son of a well-to-do parent; that he is a bookbinder by trade, and, generally speaking, well conducted. Some time ago a distress was made on his mother by a broker, which was the chief cause of his despondency. Mr. Combe sent for the lad's mother, who wept bitterly at the conduct of her hapless son. She spoke highly of him, and Mr. Combe discharged him, after cautioning his mother and friends to watch him closely.

ATTEMPTED HIGHWAY ROBBERY.—A gentleman, who gave his name and address in private to the magistrate, stated that, as he was returning to his home on the previous night between eleven and twelve o'clock, he was attacked by six men at the corner of Argyll-place and Brunswick-street, Bloomsbury. They first hustled him, then struck him, and one of them thrust his hand into his pocket, which was empty. He cried about for assistance, and darted into a chandler's shop, where he seized an iron bar and flourished it at the door; they retreated. He had been attacked by some of the same party before, and could identify two of them. Mr Combe said, as there was no person injured, his proper course was to apply to the Commissioners of Police. The gentleman said, from the repeated attacks he considered his life and property in danger, and would henceforth carry about his person a deadly weapon, which he would certainly make use of if again attacked. Police-sergeant Bryson, warrant officer of the E division, promise I to communicate with the inspectors of that district on the matter, and the applicant left the office.

QUEEN-SQUARE.—A young man, named William Trotter, was charged under the 22nd section of the Mutiny Act with being a deserter from the 58th Regiment. He had been apprehended by the military on Saturday, who had detained him, and now applied for his commitment to gaol, according to the ordinary form. A very considerable difficulty, however, arose. The defendant did not attempt to deny that he was a soldier, but declared that he was on leave of absence from his regiment.—Mr. Bond inquired whether it had been ascertained that defendant was not on furlough? —The military authorities who had brought the defendant in charge said that they had ascertained he was on leave, which would not expire until the 30th inst., but the furlough had been given for Woolwich, and, defendant having been found in London, he was necessarily a deserter.—Mr. Bond observed that precisely the same point had arisen in the case of Captain Douglas: he had leave from his regiment to go to a distant part of the continent of India, and had come to England instead. Defendant had leave for Woolwich and came to London, but it did not follow that he was a deserter. He (the magistrate) could not say so, as, for aught he knew, the man might join his regiment again before the term of absence expired. Taylor, a private in the 58th Regiment, said he had brought the defendant there by order of the Adjutant. He had not only come to London instead of going to Woolwich, but had been found in private clothing; he had besides enlisted in another regiment (the 90th).—Mr. Bond wished to know whether the time had expired in which he might pay the smart for the second enlistment.—The soldier (Taylor) replied the time had expired at twelve that day.—Defendant also complained of having been kept in custody. He said that had he been at large he should have recovered his uniform, which he had lost.—Mr. Bond said he could not interfere, as his commitment must state that the prisoner ought to be with his regiment, whereas it was quite clear he was absent on leave.—The parties then withdrew.

THAMES-OFFICE.—On Wednesday a well-dressed young woman, and of apparent respectability, named Susanna Elizabeth Dale, was brought before Mr. Broderip and placed in the felon's dock, on some charge which was not mentioned. A policeman named Hagar, 183 K, stated that on or about four o'clock on Tuesday afternoon, or "thereabouts that time," a person came to the station-house for a police constable, and he proceeded to No. 4, Charles-street, Stepney, where he found the prisoner contending with the proprietors of the shop about a pane of glass she had broken. The prisoner settled for the pane of glass, and refused to give any satisfactory account of herself, and so he locked her up.—Mr. Broderip: What for?—Policeman: She would give no satisfactory answers to my questions whatever, and would not give her address. There was a great mob in the street.—Mr. Broderip: Was she paid for the broken glass: what satisfaction did you want? Policeman: She would give no satisfaction at all.—Mr. Broderip: And because she would give no satisfaction you locked her up. Is that so?—Policeman: Yes, that's it. There is no one here to charge her.—Mr. Broderip: I think it is very likely she will bring an action against you for false imprisonment. The woman is discharged.



DEATH FROM OVER EATING.—On Tuesday, Mr. Payne held an inquest in the tap-room of St. Mary Somerset, Upper Thames-street, on the body of Thomas Rodgers, aged fifty-five. Deceased was a workman in the employ of Mr. Rathbone, of Trigg's Wharf, Thames-street. On Christmas-day all the men on the premises were, according to usual custom, regaled with a supper and a certain quantity of grog, and refused to give any satisfactory account of herself, and so he locked her up.—Mr. Broderip: What for?—Policeman: She would give no satisfactory answers to my questions whatever, and would not give her address. There was a great mob in the street.—Mr. Broderip: Was she paid for the broken glass: what satisfaction did you want? Policeman: She would give no satisfaction at all.—Mr. Broderip: And because she would give no satisfaction you locked her up. Is that so?—Policeman: Yes, that's it. There is no one here to charge her.—Mr. Broderip: I think it is very likely she will bring an action against you for false imprisonment. The woman is discharged.

He was predisposed to that affection, and had before suffered from fits of epilepsy.—Verdict, "Natural death."

LOSS OF LIFE AT PECKHAM.—On Tuesday an inquest was held before Mr. Gell, coroner for Westminster, at the George Tavern, Strand, on the body of Eliza Stonebank, aged eleven years, who was burnt to death. Agnes Diamond, a lodger in the same house, said that the deceased had been in the habit of going on errands for her during the last two years. On the day in question she left her in the room, with as she was cleaning, and, in her (witness's) opinion, the accident occurred while she was placing some Christmas on the mantel-piece.—Verdict, "Accidental death."

FATAL CART ACCIDENT.—On Wednesday evening Mr. Payne held an inquest at Bartholomew's Hospital, on view of the body of James Jeff, a youth aged five years. It appeared from the evidence that about one o'clock in the afternoon of Saturday the 17th inst., while deceased was passing along Glass-house-yard, Blackfriars, he inadvertently got into the way of a dust-cart, and in endeavouring to escape from being run over, was jammed between one of the wheels of the cart and a post at the side of the footway. He was immediately conveyed to Bartholomew's Hospital, where he gradually sank, and died on Tuesday last Verdict, "Accidental death."

AWFULLY SUDDEN DEATH.—On Wednesday Mr. Gell held an inquest at the Crown and Cushion, Red Lion-street, Drury-lane, on the body of Mary Westmoreland, aged 58. It appeared from the evidence of Mrs. Pinney, residing at 18, Crown-court, that the deceased had been in her service, and that on Friday she found her dead in the parlour, where deceased had been making the fire. Five minutes previously she appeared in full health and spirits. Verdict accordingly

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

Mr. James Bland, one of the few surviving professional turf speculators of the old school, died in Piccadilly on Sunday night.

GRAND BATTUES AT POWERSCOURT.—Last week the Earl and Countess of Kinnoull entertained a distinguished company of the nobility and gentry of the county at Dunpin Castle, including the Earl of Mansfield, Lord Kinnaird, Sir F. M. Threipland, Sir C. Monteaffe, &c. On four days there were grand battues held in the preserves, at which the noble earl and Lord Dunpin joined their sporting guests. The weather was unfortunately very unpropitious, yet the quantity of game killed was very great, consisting of 176 pheasants, 364 hares, 37 woodcocks, 275 rabbits—in all 852.

LORD HOWDEN'S STAG HOUNDS.—Owing to his lordship's late family affliction, he has declined upon giving up his hounds, and they have been purchased by the garrison of Dublin. A committee of gentlemen have been appointed to manage them, comprising the Hon. Captain Forester, Captain Jones, Major Meyrick, Captain King, and Lord William Hill. Their first day of meeting was on Tuesday, at half-past one o'clock, in the far-famed Ashbourn country, when a brilliant field was expected.

GRAND PIGEON SHOOTING MATCH.—The pigeon match between Devon and Somerset came off on Monday in a field near the Squirrel Inn, Wellington. The match was for £30 a-side, at twenty one birds each. The shooting commenced between Mr. Harris of Crediton and Mr. Bolt of Taunton, and, after some excellent shots, it was declared in favour of Mr. Harris, he killing two birds more than his opponent. The next match was between Messrs Scarlet and Watson: in this Mr. Scarlet was the victor by two birds, he being a Somerset shot. Then came the third match, between Messrs. Jarman and Scarlet: in this match Mr. Jarman was the conqueror by one bird, he being a Devonian. This decided the day in favour of the men of Devon.

OUTFITS TO CHINA AND ALL PARTS OF THE GLOBE. The recent Treaty with the Celestial Empire, and consequent extent of territory opened for British Trade and industry, will induce many to avail themselves of journeying on the high road to a speedy fortune. Outfits will be required to an extent never before known in this country, and as much of the Emigrant's comfort depends on the style and manner in which he is fitted out for a few words on that subject will not be misplaced at this moment. The preparations are generally made in excitement, and are supposed for, which are done in accordance to the money the party has to expend on the various articles priced, and as an instance, a gentleman is fitted out with [illegible] and valuables, in a case when they cannot be replaced—in fact, no article is considered too [illegible] for the sea-faring, as those of all others should be supplied with the very best. GINGER BRANDY.—This invaluable Liqueur continues to be manufactured by VINCENT and PUGH, the original Proprietors, at their Distillery, 16 New Park-street, Borough, and 5, Hood lane, City, and may be obtained of all the principal Wine Merchants in the metropolis. A bottle is carefully sealed and labelled.

TO CONNOISSEURS IN BRANDY.—They have also fully succeeded in bringing to public notice the most perfect article ever offered, possessing both the delicacy of character and richness of bouquet natural to Cognac, they being supported in the assertion by the opinion of both the French growers, and the keenest judges in the Eng[illegible] market.

The PALE BRANDY is particularly recommended as something extremely curious.

ROYAL COGNAC BRANDY.—Mr. GRIMBLE, who has been the managing partner in this concern, begs to acquaint the Public, that in consequence of the great improvements he has, by his unwearied exertions, been enabled to make in the [illegible] of the article, it will in future be known in connexion as GRIMBLE'S ROYAL COGNAC BRANDY. The strong recommendation it has received from the most eminent medical professors and surgical operators, and its use in many of the metropolitan hospitals, are a sufficient guarantee to the public for its purity and wholesome qualities, whilst the patronage conferred upon it by noblemen and gentlemen of high standing in society, and good taste and judgment, added to its extensive consumption in the metropolis world, are a sufficient evidence of its superior flavour and general excellence. Indeed Mr. Grimble is induced only by the full concurrence of his customers in stating, that the article has continually improved from its first production, to a pure brandy, and as such can be recommended in connexion with the most expensive productions of the Continent, and it requires an experienced judge to distinguish it in flavour from the veritable cognac. The price is as heretofore, 42s. per gallon, in quantities of not less than two gallons, and 30s. per dozen, hence two full imperial gallons, with the usual charge for bottles.—Distillery, Albany-street, Regent's Park

THE CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XXI.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW THE GREAT, SMITHFIELD.

In our last we gave a view of a new church: we now, by way of contrast, occupy the allotted space with a sketch of an old one. St. Bartholomew's was founded as long since as 1123, by a pious monk, Rahere, who, although of humble origin and without wealth, position, or assistance, yet by devoteduess of purpose succeeded in founding the priory of St. Bartholomew—ultimately one of the most extensive which London could boast. Rahere found Smithfield, the ground he had chosen for his future edifice, a morass—he left great part of it laid out in gardens and decorated with stately buildings. The present church is a portion of the old monastery, and formed the choir of the original structure. The brick tower is of much later date than the nave, and the interior of the building must be seen to afford those evidences of antiquity which invest St. Bartholomew the Great with the interest surrounding it. In the Cottonian Collection there is a rare and curious MS. written by one of the old monks, and giving a history of Rahere and of the priory which has made him famous. This chronicle is studded with miraculous stories as to the assistance afforded to the holy work by the saint to whom the buildings were dedicated. All these tales are told with such evident sincerity on the part of the writer that he evidently believed what he relates; and, did space allow, some of the narrative would well repay quotation, as a curious example of the taste and feelings of a bygone generation. After the foundation of the priory the neighbourhood began to improve, and Henry the First made several munificent grants to the poor of the hospital which Rahere had attached to his religious foundation. Henry the Second still further aided the good work, and the fair of St. Bartholomew, which has lasted even to our day—although now on point of extinction—was established to benefit the revenues of the priory. Of the privileges thus granted, some remain in full force at the present time in favour of the inhabitants of the parish—who, for instance, may exercise their business without taking up the freedom of the city. Henry the Eighth, upon the dissolution of the religious establishments, granted, in 1544, to Lord Rich the priory of St. Bartholomew, except the portion of the church now standing, which he gave for a parish church. The brick tower was raised in 1628, and is but a poor successor to that of stone which preceded it. A fine peal of bells, formerly belonging to this church, were sold to St. Sepulchre's, where they often fulfilled the solemn duty of tolling the death-hour of criminals sentenced to execution. Of Rahere's institutions those portions which the progress of events rendered useless have passed away. Of his splendid priory only a trifling portion remains, devoted to that simpler form of worship which now prevails; but the noble hospital, enriched by successive benefactions, flourishes in its career of beneficent usefulness, and stands an enduring memorial of the fame of its founder, and the munificence of charity in England.

MALIBRAN'S STATUE.—A white marble statue of Madame Malibran has just been placed in the mausoleum which M. de Bériot had erected, in the cemetery of Lacken, to the memory of the celebrated cantatrice. The monument itself is about ten feet long, and nearly as many wide. The interior is circular, and is crowned with a cupola. The door is composed of open-work, which allows the statue to be seen towards the other end. The white marble is thrown out from a brownish ground, so that Malibran appears quitting the tomb, and rising towards heaven, where she is about to be received by angels painted on the cupola. In the centre of the cupola a lamp is placed, which sheds a subdued light over the whole statue. On the front of the pedestal is to be placed a basso relievo, representing the Genius of Music bewailing the loss of this celebrated singer.

FORGED ANCIENT COINS.—A gang of forgers of antique coins and medals have, for some time past, successfully carried on a very extensive trade with antiquarians. Emissaries occasionally visit the chief towns throughout the United Kingdom, where they seldom fail in disposing of some of these spurious wares, which, it must be owned, are admirably executed. One of them lately made a tour of Essex and Suffolk, with considerable profit to himself. The last forgeries are imitations of the Anglo-Saxon coins found about two years since at Cuerdale, in Lancashire.

Mr. Penleaux, the English Consul at Barcelona, whose conduct has been so traduced by the French journalists, and so applauded by all the English newspapers that have commented on the miserable insurrection in Barcelona, was for many years a Liberal member of the House of Commons, as representative for Southampton.

MAIDSTONE.—DISCOVERY OF A SKELETON.—As some men were lately engaged digging earth in Messrs. Tassell and Co.'s brickfields, Thornhills, they were much surprised at finding the skeleton of a human body, supposed to be that of a female, which had been buried in a hole at about six feet from the surface, also a clasp knife with the blade open, and a whetstone (which were probably the instruments used by some murderer) lying by its side. The field was formerly a hop garden, and no doubt the parties who put the body there little thought of its ever being moved, nor would it at the present time had it not been discovered that the earth was valuable for making bricks. It is evident, from the decayed state of the skeleton, that it must have been there many years.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—The arrivals of English wheat fresh up to Mark-lane having been on a very limited scale since our last report, and the attendance of buyers on each market day tolerably numerous, the demand for the fine qualities of both red and white has ruled firm, at, in some instances, an advance of 1s per quarter; while a steady business has been doing in the middling and inferior kinds, at full rates of currency. Very little wheat has come to hand this week, and a large quantity of both free and bonded sorts has changed hands, at rather improved quotations. Although the receipts of both barley and malt have been large, fair clearances have been effected by the factors, at full prices. The oat trade has ruled firm; but in beans, peas, and flour scarcely anything has been doing.

ARRIVALS.—English: Wheat, 1930; barley, 8840; oats, 6150; malt, 3010 quarters; flour, 1310 sacks. Irish: oats, 13,060 quarters. Foreign: wheat, 1030; and barley, 380 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 46s to 55s; ditto white, 57s to 59s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 49s to 57s; do. white, 51s to 58; rye, 34s to 38s; grinding barley, 27s to 29s; malting do., 30s to 32s; Chevalier, 32s to 34s; Suffolk and Norfolk malt, 56s to 62s; brown do., 50s to 54s; Kingston and Ware, 56s to 62s; Chevalier, 62s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 23s to 24s; potato do., 25s to 26s; Youghal and Cork, black, 17s to 18s; do. white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, new, 34s to 36s; do. old, 34s to 38s; grey peas, 36s to 38s; maple, 33s to 34s; white, 30s to 35s; boilers, 32s to 37s; per quarter. Town-made flour, 44s to 45s; Suffolk, 38s to 40s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 36s to 38s; per 280 lbs. Foreign.—Free wheat, 50s to 58s. In Bond.—Barley, 20s; oats, new, 13s to 17s; do. feed, 14s to 16s; beans, 29s to 26s; peas, 28s to 27s; per quarter. Flour, America, 22s to 24s; Baltic, 22s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—So little has been doing in this market that the following quotations are almost nominal:—Linseed, English, sowing, 48s to 57s Baltic, crushing, 42s to 46s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 45s to 46s; hempseed, 35s to 46s; per quarter. Coriander, 10s to 13s per cwt. Brown mustard seed, 10s to 11s; white do., 10s to 10s 6d; tares, 5s 0d to 5s 9d per bushel; English rapeseed, new, 30l to 32l per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, 10l to 10l 10s; do. foreign, 7l to 7l 10s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, 57s. to 6l per ton.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 47s 2d; barley, 26s 5d; Oats, 17s 4d; rye, 28s 5d; beans, 28s 11d; peas, 31s 2d.

Imperial Averages of Six Weeks which govern Duty.—Wheat, 48s 2d; Barley, 27s 4d; Oats, 17s 6d; Rye, 29s 9d; Beans, 30s 5d; Peas, 32s 10d per quarter.

Duty on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s 6d; Barley, 9s 0d; Oats, 8s 0d; Rye, 11s 6d; Beans, 10s 6d; Peas, 10s 6d.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5d to 6½d for the 4lb loaf.

Colonial Markets.—These markets being all closed for the holidays, we have very little to report in them. The few parcels of tea, sugar, &c., which have changed hands by private contract have with difficulty supported late prices.

Coals.—Adair's, 17s; Holywell Main, 19s 3d; Stewart's, 23s 3d; Hetton, 19s 9d per ton.

Wool.—About 2200 packages of colonial and foreign wool have been received this week. By private contract we have a fair but by no means extensive inquiry, while previous quotations are generally supported.

Potatoes.—The supplies of potatoes continuing abundant, and those of green vegetables large, the demand for the former is extremely dull for the time of year, at from 80s to 90s per ton.

Hops.—The market has ruled inactive, with a full average supply on offer. The highest price of the best new Kent pockets is 6l 10s per cwt.

Oils.—This market is unusually inactive, and the prices are somewhat lower.

Tallow.—Very little is doing in tallow, both on the spot and for the spring. Fine Y. C. in small parcels may now be had at 48s, and the speculative price for the spring months is not above 47s 6d. The stock next Monday will be about 35,000 casks. Town tallow is 45s per cwt.

Spirits.—For fine Jamaica rum full rates have been obtained, but for all other sorts rather lower prices have been taken, with a dull market. East India, with 20 per cent, is 1s 8d to 1s 8½d; ditto, 10 per cent, 1s 6d with, and 1s 1d to 1s 2d without, certificate. The low descriptions of Cognac brandy have been in brisk request, at 2s 1d to 2s 3d per gallon; but in other spirits scarcely anything is passing.

Smithfield.—For the present period of the year, our supplies have been fair, while the demand has ruled active, at full rates of currency. Beef, from 3s 2d to 4s 6d; mutton, 3s 4d to 4s 6d; veal, 3s 8d to 4s 4d; and pork, 3s 8d to 4s 8d per 8lbs., by the carcase.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—We have had a slow inquiry for each kind of meat in these markets, and late rates have been with difficulty supported. Beef, from 3s 0d to 3s 8d; mutton, 3s 4d to 4s 2d; veal, 3s 8d to 4s 4d; and pork, 3s 8d to 4s 4d per 8lbs., by the carcase.

ROBERT HERBERT.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

The Christmas holidays, during this week, have, in some measure, interrupted that activity in the manufacturing districts, to which we have latterly had the satisfaction so frequently to allude. Still, the accounts received from all parts are favourable, and appear with the cause in which it has originated. In the meantime the prospect of a much improved trade, in all its departments, for the year 1840, although not so sanguine as possible, and confidence is considerably increased already amongst merchants by the favourable turn which it is expected will soon occur in mercantile transactions. The continuation in the home market of many articles of British manufacture has not, however, been interfered with by the season of the year, and this fact is a strong presumption in favour of returning prosperity. Fair general retail sales have been effected in the manufactured goods suitable to the home market, by the principal wholesale dealers throughout the metropolis; and from our country towns our information is equally favourable.

Very large sales of cotton wool have been effected during this week, the purchases being made, not by speculators, but by spinning and manufacturing parties, principally, little alteration has occurred there, except in those of Texas, which have declined again from 1d. to 3d. per lb., according to quality, and even at this reduction in value sales to no great extent can be effected, a further decline being still anticipated.

The attention of the money interest, during this week, has been attracted in a special manner by the present internal state of Spain, and by the probability that a great alteration in her internal policy is at hand. It is perfectly well ascertained that Spain produces within herself everything necessary to make her, for the first rank amongst nations, and that smuggling is the only obstacle to her future prosperity. The Spanish Regent is sensible that a commercial arrangement with England is the only way for restoring the coin of his country, and as he is known to have the will, so the suppression of the revolution in Barcelona has now given him the power to suppress smuggling by the reduction of the duties now charged on all British articles when imported into Spain. The revenue of Spain will be much increased by moderate duties, and her public credit will be strengthened by the same cause. In Spanish bonds, consequently, large transactions occurred during the week, and in prices a considerable improvement must be noted.

The credit of the United States of North America has not been improved in the opinion of the British monied interest by the set-off-ing and long-winded speech of Dour Preverett. Future acts is the cause of honesty, and not verbose professions of future morality, are necessary to place that republic again, we may say, amongst the civilised communities of the earth. A long probation in correct mercantile principles must be undergone by our American brethren before their restoration to the good opinion of mankind in general can be allowed. To perceive the virtue for the future can alone obtain for them general forgiveness for their past conduct in their money transactions with foreign nations; and for their own interest in future, therefore, we recommend to them the practice of just dealing for some time, at all events, to come. In the shares of all the leading railway companies, a good deal of business has been again transacted, although no material variation in the value of any of them has occurred in the course of this week. In many of the lines throughout the United Kingdom, money may still be invested both profitably and safely, but in the solidity of foreign railways, particularly those in France, British capitalists do not at present repose much confidence, for they have latterly been taught a never-to-be-forgotten lesson by the Americans as all the pecuniary transactions which they have entered into with them during the last twelve or fifteen years, further regulation of their money transactions with all foreign nations in future, and in this, no doubt, has originated the reluctance now shown to operate in French railway shares

On the Stock Exchange the transactions, since our last publication, have neither been extensive nor interesting; and for the January account are one-half per cent. higher than they were in the middle of last week, but still confidence is not generally restored in their maintaining their present high value, nor will any large operations be entered into by the Bulls until the quarterly statement of the revenue be published, in the end of next week. In the meantime, money is plentiful in the hands of bankers and capitalists, and loans at 4 per cent and available securities, can consequently be obtained on very reasonable terms. For increasing our foreign commerce, therefore, the want of money cannot be any obstacle now where credit is good, and this is an advantage of inconceivable value.

We are glad to confirm the favourable change which is gradually occurring in the shipping interest; and as the spring season for commencing operations, it is a not unfrequent circumstance that freights will improve, and that British sailors will again obtain full employment, which, latterly, has not been generally the case. On the whole, prospects continue to brighten weekly in commerce.

LONDON AND THE COLOSSEUM PRINT

The great task we assumed is at length finished, and with feelings of mingled pleasure and exultation we present to the readers of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS the Colosseum Print—As a work of art it is altogether unrivalled by anything heretofore produced by this mode of Engraving, and calculated to excite in all who behold it feelings of surprise at the magnitude of its proportions—interest in the novelty of the aspect in which the Great City is exhibited and wonder and national pride upon contemplation of the great extent, the bold stateliness, the architectural glories—and the myriad of houses which evidence the mercantile wealth and political greatness—of London in 1842. Here we give the Queen of Cities as she now is, without exaggeration, or flattery. The perfect likeness cannot be disputed, for the Sun never flatters, and that great luminary, through the medium of the Daguerreotype, is our artist in this instance. Here are delineated her churches, her warehouses, her mansions—the stately streets of the West-end, and the densely packed houses of the city—the hundred spires, domes, and bell-towers of places devoted to worship—the palaces of the Queen and the nobility, and the prisons of the debtor and the felon—the broad proportions and high roofs of her theatres—her ample squares, sweeping cresents, and well-kept parks—her bridges, spanning with ample stretch the noble river where far down floats that forest of masts to tell the history of Britain's far-spread commerce,—gathering to her the products of all climes, and garnering for her benefit the choicest productions of the globe. Here are these great features placed before the eye at one glance, as perfectly, truly, and completely, as if the gazer had he flight of an eagle and could pause over the mighty congregation of buildings which forms the modern Babylon.

In thus heralding the successful result of our labours, and in congratulating alike our readers and ourselves upon the full performance of all promises, it may be well to state a few facts in connection with the Colosseum Print, showing the process by which this pictorial giant has been produced. The first step was to obtain permission of free access to the York Column and leave to fix the necessary apparatus for taking the Daguerreotype view. This obtained, M. Claudet made the necessary arrangements and Daguerre's discovery enabled him to obtain upon silver plates an exact fac-simile of the view from that eminence. This being done, another task presented itself. The picture was not one complete whole, as it now appears upon the paper, but was divided upon a very great number of small silver plates. These had to be copied, and arranged each in its exact position,—any small deficiences being filled in from nature. This labour required a talented artist, and occupied at the top of the column during many days, the pencil of Mr. H. Anelay. At length completed; the next process was to have it drawn upon wood and engraved. And here it is necessary to acquaint the reader with another difficulty, boldly met and completely overcome. The wood used by engravers is box,—no other being sufficiently hard without brittleness. That grown in this country is too small for the purpose, and Turkey is resorted to for a supply. Although the finest in the world, the Turkish wood is seldom more than six or seven inches in diameter, and is cut in slices (so to speak), across the grain—that mode alone affording a surface fit for the graver. Thus the best and largest wood does not afford a square block of more than four or five inches each way; and it becomes necessary to join blocks together when a larger surface is required. This process is often employed on a small scale, but the Colosseum Print required upwards of sixty distinct blocks, to be consolidated into one perfect surface, without line, speck or flaw. This was done by Mr. Wells, of Lambeth, and the next point was to make the drawing upon the wood, a task performed by Mr. Sargeant, a gentleman deservedly celebrated as a draughtsman. Now came the engraving; the superintendence of which was entrusted to Mr. E. Landells, and was by him completed, with the assistance of eighteen other engravers, all eminent in their particular departments; one for instance engraving buildings, another foliage, a third tints, and so on. It required two months of incessant labour, the work never stopping night or day. But for the size of the work it would now have been ready for the printer; its enormous proportions, however, forbad the experiment of placing it upon the printing machine, where the combined influences of moisture coming from the wet paper, and heat from the engine which drives the steam press, would have rendered it liable to warp or split before the great number required could be worked off. To electrotype it was the first intention, but that was found too slow a process, as, when the metallic deposit is hastened beyond a given point, the result is a rotten or imperfect plate: stereotyping was therefore resorted to, and to Messrs. Knight and Hawkes was entrusted this step in the rapidly advancing progress of the Colosseum Print. The plates mounted upon blocks, then passed the final inspection and retouchings of the artists, and reached their ultimate destination—the steam press.

If any one of our many thousand readers has felt impatience for the earlier appearance of the Print, we are quite sure that when he learns the tedious processes necessary, each to be carefully completed for ensuring the perfection, of the whole—when he considers the novelty of the design, and the success of the execution,—he will at once admit the magnitude of the work as an all-sufficient excuse for any slight delay.

Having said thus much upon the mode of production the Print, let us turn once more to the subject it pourtrays—London, mighty London!

Rome was called the Mistress of the World, yet in its palmiest day was not equal to Britain in power or dominion; nor can any of the boasted cities of antiquity,—Carthage, Tyre, or Alexandria; or in later times, Venice or Genoa—when their maritime greatness was in its glory, and their trade the wonder and admiration of their respective ages—not one can bear a moment's comparison with London. Britain's trade claims the whole habitable globe for its operations. Her colonies are placed in every direction where man can exist. Upon her dominion the sun never sets;—her flag waves upon every sea, and a volume would be required to detail the results of her maritime enterprize and internal trade upon the aspect of the city which forms the centre of these mighty operations. In population London is a nation in herself; the number of inhabitants has doubled in forty years, and now amounts to one million nine hundred thousand. In 1845 it will contain two millions! In length from East to West the houses extend in one line between five and six miles, and in breadth from North to South nearly four. But if we include Chelsea at one extreme, and Blackwall at the other, and take the breadth from Walworth to Holloway—and these are now certainly portions of the Great City,—we shall have London covering above thirty square miles of ground! And then her river, bearing upon its surface the ships of every nation; and her docks—the East and West India docks, the London docks, the Commercial docks, and the St. Katherine's docks, together covering more than five hundred acres, teeming with valuable commodities; and one of them, the West India docks, capable of accommodating 500 large ships. To the port of London alone, in 1840, there belonged 2,950 ships of 581,000 tons burden, and manned by 32,000 seamen; in the same year there entered the port from British colonies, 1,683 ships; from her own coasts, including colliers, 20,205 ships; from Ireland, 907 ships; from Foreign countries, 2,355; which with 3,166 British vessels formed one year's trade. What can compare with this?

London contains one hundred thousand inhabited houses, one half of them having shops attached. The yearly consumption of porter and ale is 2,000,000 of barrels, all brewed in the place; of sheep, 1,403,486 have been sold in Smithfield in one year, together with 183,000 head of cattle. Many miles of ground in the vicinity are occupied as market gardens, and have spread over them many hundred acres of glass. 70,000,000 of foreign eggs are imported, to say nothing of the millions produced at home; 12,000 cows afford an insufficient supply of milk; the Irish and Dutch send immense quantities of butter; Ireland also supplies bacon and pork. The water companies send into the houses 237,000,000 of hogsheads of water in a year; the gas companies produce 10,000,000 cubic feet of gas, daily, which feeds 100,000 lights; the paving for a year costs above £200,000, the sewer rates £400,000. There are six thousand hotels, taverns, and coffee-houses, and twenty theatres, besides concert-rooms and exhibitions of various kinds. London issues yearly 30,000,000 of newspapers; has steam-boat accommodation for 10,000 passengers daily; from London extends 1,000 miles of railway, laid down at an expense of £47,000,000; with fifty-nine canals dug at a cost of £14,000,000. Through the post-office passes 70,000,000 of letters in a year, whilst the amount of cash paid by the London bankers through the clearing house in 1841, averaged £75,000,000 monthly. Will not these few facts assist in giving some idea of the immense scale upon which all that relates to London must be considered before a correct knowledge of its state can be arrived at?

The present aspect of London is given in the Colosseum Print, and in order that those less familiar with the chief buildings represented may trace them out, we give two keys of reference, thus avoiding those figures which would have lessened the beauty and value of the engraving as a work of art. To those indices of reference we direct the attention of such as require them, and after the modern Babylon has been scanned well over, and the thousand reflections have been indulged in which must ever arise from a consideration of the riches, the poverty, the sufferings, the crime enclosed within its compass—what better or more interesting illustration can be afforded than may we gather from a volume now lying upon our table for review. It is entitled "London,"* and contains matter both curious and pictorial, likely to excite interest as giving glimpses of the long by-gone aspects of the great city, whose present portraiture now accompanies our pages.

In noticing the illustrations of "London," offered to the public by Mr. Knight, we regret that space forbids that amount of amplification or extract which our own inclination, or the graphic style of his volumes would otherwise prompt. He has a mind and feelings well fitted to deal with the subject, that being, as he justly, though glowingly declares, subject "the largest city in the world,—whose inhabitants are in intercourse, commercial, political, or religious, with almost the whole human race,—which has been the scene of the most stirring events of history,—which has been a city of progress from its first foundation,—which has sent forth its literature through four centuries to the uttermost ends of the earth,—and which is full, therefore, not only of mathrial monuments of the past, but of he more abiding memorials which exist in imperishable books." Then reverting to those places which history or literature has invested with interest, "If the Tabard Inn at Southwark is now but a waggoner's yard, with its accompanying liquor-shop and tap-room, we have Chaucer's immortal picture of 'that hostelrie,' and its guests—

'Well nine-and-twenty in a compagnie
Of sundry folk;'—

and he will tell us

'The chambres and the stables weren wide.

If East Cheap has lost all its ancient characteristics in the improvements of London Bridge, Lydgate will show us that there

'Pewter pots they clattered on a heap;
There was harp, pipe, and minstrelsy.'

If Finsbury and Islington are covered with interminable rows of houses, Ben Johnson shall call to mind 'the archers of Finsbury, or the citizens that come a-ducking to Islington ponds.' If Spring Garden be no longer green, Garrard, the gossiping correspondent of the great Lord Strafford, shall inform us of its 'Bowling,' its 'Ordinary of six shillings a-meal, continual bibbing and drinking, wine all day long under the trees, and two or three quarrels every week.' If the Devil Tavern, with its Apollo Club, has perished, Squire Western's favorite song of 'Old Sir Simon the King,' shall bring back the memory of Simon Wadloe, its landlord, with Johnson's verses over the door of the Apollo Room. If the River Fleet no longer runs across Holborn, Pope shall recall that polluted stream,—

'Thau whom no sluice of mud
With deeper sable blots the silver flood'

If the glories of White's, and Wills, and the Grecian and the St. James's, have passed away, in the fall of Coffeehouses and the rise of Clubs,—if the stranger can no longer expect to walk without obstruction into a common room where wit is as current as tea and muffins, and a Dryden stands by the fire with a young Pope gazing upon him,—he may yet live in the social life of the days of Anne, and people the solitary Coffeehouses with imaginary Swifts, and Addison's and Steeles. Such, and so various, are the literary 'memorials' of London, and these literary memorials are, in truth, amongst her best antiquities. As a city of progress, her material remains of the past are comparatively few; but the mightiest of the earth—those who have made our language immortal and universal—have dwelt within her walls, and their records have outlived brick and stone." Yet have we of those old times some striking memorials in the sketches still existing of London in her earlier days; and what could offer a more startling contrast to her present condition, or more convincing proof of her great increase than the accompanying drawing from Mr. Knight's first volume, which gives a view of Old London, looking eastward from the Strand. On the left foreground is the entrance to Covent Garden; on the right the rookery of Durham House; onward the Palace of the Savoy; the Strand Inn; the Temple; to Blackfriars; Castle Baynard; Old St. Paul's, London Bridge. On the Surreyside, St. Mary Overies; Bishop of Winchester's Palace, &c.

How strangely things have altered since that time the Colosseum Print will show.—Changes equally great have taken place in London Bridge. See what it once was, and compare it with the bridges which now span Father Thames.

"In the annals of the metropolis, a least, if not of the kingdom, London Bridge has been one of the most famous of our public monuments for not much short of a thousand years. The Thames at London is now crossed by no fewer than six magnificent bridges; but it is not yet quite a century ago since London Bridge afforded the only passage from the one bank of the river to the other, and the only entrance into the town from the south, as it had done for eight centuries previous. Whoever, therefore, went out or came in, to or from the wealthiest, the most populous, and in every sense the most important parts of the country, or to or from almost any one of the ports of communication with other countries, passed, from the days of the Saxons to near the end of the reign of George II., either over this great thoroughfare or under it. There it stood, looking down upon the ever-flowing river, and coursed itself by almost as unresting a living tide, of the multitudes of one generation pursuing those of another, amid "the masques and mummeries and triumphs" wherewith each successively sought to gild its mortality. But the bridge itself also underwent various transformations in this long course of ages.

"In a patent roll of the 9th year of Edward I., A.D. 1280, mention is made of 'innumerable people dwelling upon' the bridge; and as this was only about seventy years after it had been finished, it seems most probable that there were some houses upon it from the first. In course of time it became a continued street built on both sides, with the exception of only three openings at unequal distances, from which there was a view of the river in each direction. Besides the private houses, however, there were some other erections which might be considered as forming properly a part of the bridge. Of these the most famous was the chapel, dedicated to St. Thomas à Becket, which stood upon the east side of the street, over the tenth or central pier, which on that account was carried a long way farther out towards the east than the other piers. The chapel continued to be used for divine worship down to the Reformation. Between the chapel and the Southwark end of the bridge, over the arches, or junctions of the piers (the eleventh from the Southwark end), was fixed a drawbridge; and at the north end of it there long was a tower which, how early in its history it was begun to be built as it stood in his time in the year 1426. But probably a similar building had stood there from the first erection of the bridge. On the top of the front of this tower the heads of persons executed for high treason used to be stuck, till it was replaced in the latter part of the sixteenth century by a very singular edifice of wood, called Nonsuch House, which is said to have been constructed in Holland, and brought over in pieces, when it was set up here without the assistance of either mortar or iron, only wooden pegs being used to hold it together. It extended across the bridge by means of an archway, and was a very gay and fantastic structure, elaborately carved both on its principal front towards South wark, and on its east and west gables, which protruded a considerable way beyond the line of the bridge, while the square towers at each of its four corners, crowned by short domes, or Kremlin spires, and their gilded vanes, were seen from all directions according above all the surrounding buildings. When the old tower which had occupied this site was taken down in 1577, the exposed heads were removed to the tower over the gate at the Southwark end, or the foot of the bridge, as it was commonly called; and that gate now received the name of Traitors' Gate. The tower here was also rebuilt about the same time, and with its four circular turrets, connected by curtains and surmounted by battlements, all likewise carved in wood, formed another conspicuous and imposing ornament of this great highway reared on the bosom of the Thames."

OLD LONDON BRIDGE, 1660.

* "London." Edited by Charles Knight. 3 vols., royal 8vo. London: C. Knight and Co.

Leaving Old London Bridge, let us go westward, and see what St. James's Park looked like in the time of Charles II., contrasting it with the park of our day, as displayed in the foreground of the Colosseum Print.

All the representations of the park in this reign give us the long rows of young elms, surrounded by palings.

"We are able, from various sources, plans, engravings, and incidental notices in books, to form a tolerably accurate notion of the aspect which the Park assumed in the course of these operations. At the end nearest Whitehall was a line of buildings occupying nearly the site of the present range of Government offices. Wallingford House stood on the site of the Admiralty; the old Horse Guards, the Tennis-yard, Cock-pit, and other appendages of Whitehall, on the sites of the present Horse Guards, Treasury, and offices of the Secretaries of State. The buildings then occupied by the Admiralty stood where the gate entering from Great George Street now is. From Wallingford House towards Pall Mall were the Spring Gardens, opening as we have seen into the Park."

St. James's Palace may not unaptly find place here, and afford another opportunity of contrasting things past and present.

Not far from St. James's, we have Whitehall; of which "London" affords us a view, as it appeared before the fire which destroyed it.

This old palace was the residence of Cromwell and his family, and subsequently the scene of the dissipations of Charles II. The choir of the chapel royal was celebrated for its music, and produced, amongst other composers, Henry Purcell. Evelyn, speaking of Whitehall just before its destruction, says:—"I can never forget the inexpressible luxury and profaneness, gaming and all dissoluteness, and, as it were, total forgetfulness of God (it being Sunday evening), which this day se'nnight I was witness of; the King sitting and toying with his concubines, Portsmouth, Cleaveland, and Mazarine, &c.; a French boy singing love songs in that glorious gallery, whilst about twenty of the great courtiers and other dissolute persons were at basset round a large table, a bank of at least £2000 in gold before them; upon which two gentlemen who were with me made reflections with astonishment. Six days after all was in the dust."

Few places are richer in historical associations than Westminster, and still fewer portions of the metropolis have preserved to themselves uninjured their ancient monuments. The great fire destroyed the cathedral of London, together with the majority of relics which time had spared to the city; and thus in the heart of London we have few buildings of an earlier date than 1666; while of those left to us none are of very great importance. At the extreme east, however, we still find the Tower raising its battlements amid the altered aspects of the city over which it once reigned paramount; and at the west we have Westminster Abbey, and the Hall of Rufus, to bear evidence to the magnificence with which our earlier ancestors could conceive and create. Even here, however, the destroyer, fire, had almost succeeded in making another blank, and the chapel of St. Stephen's has now to be spoken of as a place that has been. Mr. Knight's volumes contain a paper upon the House of Commons, where for three centuries previously to its destruction in 1834, the knights and burgesses in parliament assembled, were wont to deliberate. The site of St. Stephen's is henceforth to boast a more extensive structure, and our space may be well occupied by a sketch of the Houses of Parliament from the river, in the time of Charles II. The stirring events of which those old buildings were the scene, are now matters of history; not the least remarkable being the memorable struggles in which Cromwell and the Parliament, and Charles I. were actors.

The building which here appears most prominent, standing upon the verge of the stream, is St. Stephen's chapel, erected, as all readers know, by King Stephen, and dedicated to a saint of his own name. Turn we, however, to another sketch.

"Let us imagine ourselves following some foreign visitor from the City to Westminster a century ago. As soon as he turned the corner at Charing Cross he entered a narrow street occupying the right side only of the space now forming Whitehall and Parliament Street, and which, nowhere very broad, measured in some parts scarce eighteen feet. Continuing his route between the walls of Whitehall on the left and the Park on the right, near the Horse Guards he stopped to admire the stately proportions of the Banqueting House, almost the only part of the famous Palace which the fire of 1697 had left entire, or to take a last look of Holbein's beautiful gate, which he would hear was likely before long to be removed—the one loss among all the buildings and places to be swept away. Thinking of this gate, he would care little for the absence of the other, also belonging to Whitehall, which had stood but a few years before at the corner of King Street and Downing Street, and over which Henry VIII. had been accustomed to pass from the chambers of the Palace to regale himself with the pleasures of his tennis court, his bowling green, his cock-pit, or his tilt-yard, or merely with a sumptuous walk in the Park. As the stranger passed along King Street (presenting here and there to this day the same aspect as of old) he had reason to be thankful if he got safely through without injury to person or apparel from the confused throng of pedestrians, horsemen, carts, and coaches jammed together in that narrow space; still more fortunate was he if some occasion of public ceremony, such as the King going to open parliament, had not drawn him thither. It makes one's sides ache to think of being borne along with such a procession, through such a place. Forgetting for a moment the disagreeables of the way and astonishment they bred in him, he would find the neighbourhood an interesting one. Near the end of King Street (which then extended to some little distance on the other side of the present Great George Street, which was not yet in existence) he beheld the place resounding in the name of Thieving Lane, through which felons had been formerly conducted (somewhat circuitously, in order to avoid touching the Sanctuary of the Abbey, where they must have been freed) to the Gate-house or Prison of the Abbot of Westminster, standing just by the beginning of Totnill Street; and close by was the famous Sanctuary itself, occupying the space where now stands the Sessions House. From King Street the road to the Abbey and the houses of Parliament diverged to the left towards the Thames; but then, again turning to the right, passed between the New Palace Yard and the old decaying houses which stood on that pleasant green sward we now see opposite the former, with the statue of Canning conspicuous in front. This part was called St. Margaret's Lane and a lane truly it was, hemmed in closely by the old "Fish yard" and by parts of the ancient palace of Westminster, where, among other curiosities about shortly to disappear, our visitor would see two old prisons of the regal habitation, known respectively as Heaven and Purgatory, in the last of which "was preserved the ducking stool which was employed by the burgesses of Westminster for the punishment of scolds." The different buildings we have mentioned rendered St. Margaret's Lane so narrow that it has been thought worthy of note that palisades became absolutely necessary between the footpath and the roadway for the safety of passengers. And when—strange contrast of magnificence and meanness!—the royal vehicle with its sight gorgeously caparisoned horses floundered along this miserable road, it had, after setting down the king at the entrance to the House of Lords, to drive into the court-yard of Lindsey or Abingdon House, then standing at the west corner of Dirty Lane (now Abingdon Street), in order to be able to turn. Wherever the visitor looked it was the same. The beautiful architecture of Henry VII.'s Chapel required an effort in order to get to see it; and Westminster Hall was in a still worse condition, some of the coffee houses, which were propped up by it, and which but for its support would have spared all trouble of taking down."

The two public houses which concealed some portion of the Hall were only removed in the beginning of the present century, when the fragments of eight figures, in niches of exquisite workmanship, were discovered

Turning eastward, we may pause awhile over a building of which now little beyond the name is left. A narrow street running from the Strand to the river bank still bears the name of a sumptous palace once standing there.

"The founder of the Savoy was Peter de Savoy. This Peter, coming over to England on a visit to his niece, was created Earl of Savoy and Richmond, and solemnly knighted in Westminster Abbey. The date of 1246 is ascribed to the original erection. From the Earl of Savoy, the palace passed, most probably by gift, to the Friars of Mountjoy, and then again returned into the possession of the family by Eleanor's purchasing it for her son Edmund, afterwards Earl of Lancaster. His son Thomas, Earl of Lancaster, was beheaded during the reign of Edward II., and the Savoy then became the property of his brother Henry, who enlarged it, and made it so magnificent in 1328, at an expense of 52,000 marks [which, money, says Stow, 'he had gathered together at the town of Bridgenike,'] that there was, according to Knighton, no mansion in the realm to be compared with it in beauty and stateliness. After the decease of the Earl a son of the first Duke of Lancaster in law, one of the daughters of the latter married the Earl of John of Gaunt, who became in consequence the possessor of the Savoy. Six years later occured an event which has bequeathed to the locality one of its most interesting memories, namely, the residence of the captive King John of France. The battle of Poictiers took place on the 19th of September 1356, and on the 24th

TWELFTH-DAY,

In the times of chivalry, was observed at the court of England by grand entertainments and tournaments. The justings were continued till a period little favourable to such sports.

In the reign of James I., when his son prince Henry was in the 16th year of his age, and therefore arrived to the period for claiming the principality of Wales and the duchy of Cornwall, it was granted to him by the king and the high court of parliament, and the 4th of June following appointed for his investiture: "the Christmas before which," sir Charles Cornwallis says, "his highnesse, not onely for his owne recreation, but also that the world might know what a brave prince they were likely to enjoy, under the name of Meliades, lord of the isles, (an ancient title due to the first borne of Scotland,) did, in his name, by some appointed for the same purpose, strangely attired, accompanied with drummes and trumpets, in the presence, before the king and queene, and in the presence of the whole court, deliver a challenge to all knights of Great Britaine." The challenge was to this effect, "That Meliades, their noble master, burning with an earnest desire to trie the valour of his young yeares in forraigne countryes, and to know where vertue triumphed most, had sent them abroad to say the same, who, after their long travailes in all countryes, and returne," had nowhere discovered it, "save in the fortunate isle of Great Britaine: which ministring matter of exceeding joy to their young Meliades, who (as they said) could lineally derive his pedegree from the famous knights of this ilse, was the cause that he had now sent to present the first fruits of his chivalrie at his majesties' feete; then after returning with a short speech to her majestie, next to the earles, lords, and knights, excusing their lord in this their so sudden and short warning, and lastly, to the ladies, they, after humble delivery of their chartle concerning time, place, conditions, number of weapons and assailants, tooke their leave, departing solemnly as they entered."

Then preparations began to be made for this great fight, and each was happy who found himself admitted for a defendant, much more an assailant. "At last to encounter his highness, six assailants, and fifty-eight defendants, consisting of earles, barons, knights, and esquires, were appointed and chosen; eight defendants to one assailant, every assailant being to fight by turnes eight severall times fighting, two every time with push and pike of sword, twelve strokes at a time; after which, the barre for separation was to be let downe until a fresh onset." The summons ran in these words

"To our verie loving good ffreind sir Gilbert Houghton, knight, geave theis with speed:

"After our hartie commendacions unto you. The prince, his highness, hath commanded us to signifie to you that whereas he doth intend to make a challenge in his owne person at the Barriers, with sixe other assistants, to bee performed some tyme this Christmas; and that he hath made choice of you for one of the defendants (whereof wee have commandement to give you knowledge), that theruppon you may so repaire hither to prepare yourselfe, as you may bee fitt to attend him. Hereunto expecting your speedie answer wee rest, from Whitehall this 25th of December, 1609. Your very loving freindes,

Notingham. | T. Suffolke. | E. Worcester."

On New-year's Day, 1610, or the day after, the prince's challenge was proclaimed at court, and "his highnesse, in his own lodging, in the Christmas, did feast the earles, barons, and knights, assailants and defendants, untill the great Twelfth appointed night, on which this great fight was to be performed."

On the 6th of January, in the evening, "the barriers" were held at the palace of Whitehall, in the presence of the king and queen, the ambassadors of Spain and Venice, and the peers and ladies of the land, with a multitude of others assembled in the banquetinge house: at the upper end whereof was the king's chair of state, and on the right hand a sumptuous pavilion for the prince and his associates, from whence, "with great bravery and ingenious devices, they descended into the middell of the roome, and there the prince performed his first feats of armes, that is to say, at Barriers, against all commers, being assisted onlie with six others, viz. the duke of Lenox, the earle of Arundell, the earle of Southampton, the lord Hay, sir Thomas Somerset, and sir Richard Preston, who was shortly after created lord Dingwell."

To answer these challengers came fifty-six earles, barons, knights, and esquiers. They were at the lower end of the roome, where was erected "a very delicat and pleasant place, where in privat manner they and their traine remained, which was so very great that no man imagined that the place could have concealed halfe so many." From thence they issued, in comely order, to the middell of the roome, where sate the king and the queene, and the court, "to behold the barriers, with the several showes and devices of each combatant." Every challenger tought with eight several defendants two several combats at two several weapons, viz. at push of pike, and with single sword. "The prince performed this challenge with wonderous skill and courage, to the great joy and admiration of the beholders," he "not being full sixteene yeeres of age untill the 19th of February." These feats, and other "triumphant shewes," began before ten o'clock at night, and continued until three o'clock the next morning, "being Sonday." The speeches at "the barriers" were written by Ben Jonson. The next day (Sunday) the prince rode in great pomp to convoy the king to St. James', whither he had invited him and all the court to supper, whereof the queen alone was absent; and then the prince bestowed prizes to the three combatants best deserving; namely, the earl of Montgomery, sir Thomas Darey (son to lord Darey), and sir Robert Gourdon. In this way the court spent Twelfth-night in 1610

On TWELFTH-NIGHT, 1753, George II. played at hazard for the benefit of the groom-porter. All the royal family who played were winners, particularly the duke of York, who won 3000*l*. The most considerable losers were the duke of Grafton, the marquis of Hartington, the earl of Holderness, earl of Ashburnham, and the earl of Hertford. The prince of Wales (father of George III.) with prince Edward and a select company, danced in the little drawing-room till eleven o'clock, and then withdrew.

OLD CHRISTMAS-DAY.—According to the alteration of the style, OLD Christmas-day falls on Twelfth-day, and in distant parts is even kept in our time as the festival of the nativity. In 1753, Old Christmas-day was observed in the neighbourhood of Worcester by the Anti-Gregorians, full as sociably, if not so religiously, as formerly. In several villages, the parishioners so strongly insisted upon having an Old-style nativity sermon, as they term it, that their ministers could not well avoid preaching to them: and, at some towns, where the markets are held on Friday, not a butter basket, nor even a goose, was to be seen in the market-place the whole day.—Hones' "Every-day book."

THE QUEEN.

At the Star and Garter, cook was I
Of the round twelfth-cake and the rich mince pie:
Old Christmas crowned me very soon arter,
And now I am Queen with a Star and Garter!

THE KING'S FOOL.

I am a most accredited fool,
Joking by science, and jesting by rule;
But my lord and lady, who there you see,
Are very much greater fools than me!

SIR KILL-'EM-AND-EAT-'EM.

"Kill 'em and eat 'em's" the motto—my face
In its beauty reads to the whole human race;
With my big club I knock them down like skittles,
Then bowl off their heads and consume 'em for wittles!

THE KING.

"I am monarch of all I survey,"—that's a cake;
"My right there is none to dispute,"—no mistake!
My sweetmeat subjects were gathered around;
I said but the word, and tout sweet I was crowned!

MISS PASSE VERJUICE.

I am a spinster of high degree,
Virgin Verjuice they nick name me;
And they bid me not stew, as they carry their noses,
Because, in a stew, they say verjuice is poison!

DOCTOR LANCE'EM.

LORD BOWATALL.

My Grandmother told me, one Saturday night,
"You never lose nothing by being polite;"
Then I made her a bow, and she gave me a kiss,
So I've never stopped bowing from that day to this.

LADY SMILINGTON.

I always smile with a leer in my eye,
Whether my friends grow pretty or die;
Whether they eat or whether they drink,
I always smile, and I always wink!

LORD OF MISRULE.

The Lord of Misrule!—in the midst of your sports,
I'm one of the sort to put all out of sorts;
I'll swallow you whole when you're all most risible,
And afterwards bring up the party invisible!

MISS MISLETOE.

I am Miss Mistletoe—ha! what now!
Do you come and kiss me under the bough!
If thus my lips of their dew you chizzle,
Why Miss Misletoe on her toe must mizzle!

HONEST PLUM PUDDING.

Because I'm a simple plum-pudding, I see
You are making a current joke of me;
For my ruin you send me to pot in your fun,
And eat me as soon as I'm thoroughly done!

NIBBLE'EM, THE DRAGON.

Sir Nibblem, oh! with his ale so hot!
He drinks it gindered and swallows the pot;
With his inside filled with a pewter flagon,
Oh, what a life must Sir Nibblem drag on!

EVERYBODY'S COLUMN.

At the annual meeting of the directors forming the committee of the London Fire Establishment Mr. Braidwood made his report of the conflagrations that have occurred during the past year, 1843, in and around the metropolis. The report, which is rather voluminous, commences by stating that fires were on the increase in London, the number of last year exceeding by 73 over those of the preceding twelvemonth and 213 over the average of the last nine years, though happily not so extensive in magnitude. The following are the number of fires that have taken place since the fire brigade was formed in the year 1833, together with the number of houses totally destroyed, those seriously and slightly damaged.—In 1833 there were 458, destroying 31 houses totally, and damaging 427 other buildings; 1834, 462 fires; houses burned down 28, and 454 injured. In 1835, 471 fires, 31 houses burned down, and 440 damaged seriously and slightly. In 1836, 564 fires, 33 houses totally destroyed, and 531 more or less damaged. In 1837, 501 fires, 32 houses consumed, and 479 damaged. In 1838, 568 fires, 34 houses destroyed, and 535 injured. In 1839, 584 fires, 17 houses consumed, and 567 damaged. In 1840, 681 fires, 25 houses burned down, and 655 damaged. In 1841, 686 fires, 24 houses totally consumed, 672 injured, and last year, 1842, 769 fires, 24 houses destroyed, and 744 more or less injured. From the report it appears the chief number of the fires takes place in private and lodging houses, and carpenters' workshops. Public houses and drapers' shops follow next. Upwards of 20 persons have lost their lives at fires in the course of the year.

The old age of Mrs. Inchbald was one of melancholy seclusion, and decrease ment. She thus describes an interview with Madame de Staël:

"I admired Madame de Staël much; she talked to me the whole time, so did Miss Edgeworth, whenever I met her in company. These authoresses suppose me dead, and seem to pay a tribute to my memory; but with Madame de Staël it seemed no passing compliment; she was inquisitive as well as attentive, and entreated me to tell her why I shunned society. 'Because' I replied, 'I dread the loneliness that will follow'—' What! will you feel your solitude more when you return from this country than you did before you came hither?'—'Yes.' 'I should think it would elevate your spirit. why will you feel your loneliness more?'—'Because I have none to tell that I have seen YOU; no one to describe your presents; no one to whom I can repeat the many encomiums you have passed on my 'Simple Story;' no one to enjoy any of your praises but myself'—'Ah! ah! you have no children; and she turned to an elegant young woman, her daughter, with pathetic tenderness. She then so fervently deplored a mother's joys, that she sent me home more melancholy at the comparison of our situations in life than could have arisen from the consequences of riches or poverty."

"Two days afterwards, Mrs. Inchbald called by appointment on Madame de Staël, and was told she was ILL'—Her only son had just been killed in a duel.—Memoirs of the Literary Ladies of England.

TRANSLATION OF MAHOMETAN'S FOUR BOOKS.

The followers of Mahomet dare not so much as touch the venerable Koran without being first washed or legally purified; and, lest they should do it irreverently, they write on the cover in large, "Let no one touch it but they who are clean." They read it with great reverence, and never call it by any of their titles. They swear by it; consult it on all important occasions; carry it with them to war, write sentences of it on their banners; adorn it with gold and precious stones, and, if possible, prevent its ever being in the possession of persons of a different persuasion, though they have it translated into the Persian, Javanese Malayan and other languages, but do not respect those versions, as they have not the genuine divine stamp.

A SCENE AFTER SHAVING.

Some years ago, a certain [illegible] was in the habit of [illegible] Prince Henry, [illegible] and [illegible] his wife. The King and all his courtiers were so much affected, that they ordered their wigs to be powdered, which they had been wanting. The [illegible] prelate gave them no time to change their habits, but immediately rolled up part of his sleeve, and performed the operation with his own hand.

BEGINNING OF THE YEAR IN VARIOUS NATIONS.

The Chaldeans' and Egyptians' years were dated from the autumnal equinox. The ecclesiastical year of the Jews began in the spring; but in civil affairs they retain the epoch of the Egyptian year. The ancient Chinese reckoned from the new moon nearest the middle of Aquarius. The year of Romulus commenced in March, and that of Numa in January. The Turks and Arabs date the year from the 16th of July. Dremschid, or Gemschid, King of Persia, observed, on the day of his public entry into Persepolis, that the sun entered into Aries; and in commemoration of this fortunate event he ordained the beginning of the year to be removed from the autumnal to the vernal equinox. The Brachmen begin their year with the new moon in April. The Mexicans begin it in February, when the leaves begin to grow green. Their year consists of eighteen months, having twenty days each; the last five days are spent in mirth, and no business is suffered to be done, nor even any service at the temples. The Abyssinians have five idle days at the end of their year, which commences on the 26th of August. The American Indians reckon from the first appearance of the new moon at the vernal equinox. The Mahomedans begin their year the minute in which the sun enters Aries. The Venetians, Florentines, and the Pisans in Italy, began the year at the vernal equinox. The French year, during the reign of the Merovingian race, began on the day on which the troops were reviewed, which was the first day of march. Under the Carlovingians it began on Christmas-day, and under the Capetians on Easter-day. The ecclesiastical year begins on the first Sunday in Advent. Charles IX. appointed, in 1564, that for the future the civil year should commence on the first of January. The Julian calendar when was so called from Julius Cæsar, and is the old account of the year, was reformed by Pope Gregory in 1582, which plan was suggested by Lewis Lilio, a Calabrian astronomer. The Dutch and the Protestants in Germany introduced the new style in 1700. The ancient clergy reckoned from the 25th of March, and the method was observed in Britain until the introduction of the new style A.D 1752; after which our year commenced on the first of January.

MAGNETISM IN CHINA.

We learn from a work ("La Chine et les Chinois") recently published in Paris by M. A. Borget, that magnetism is understood in the celestial empire, and turned to good account, being practised by the barbers of Canton. "I observed," says M. Borget, "that the greater part of the patients slept while they were being shaved, and I could not account for this singularity. But one morning I observed a man seat himself on a stool a little apart from the rest. I began my task of sketching, when the barber, instead of commencing his operations, placed himself before his customer, and, first of all, took hold of his hands, then passed his own several times over the shoulders and before the face of the sitter, who shortly fell into a state of quiet drowsiness, if he did not actually go to sleep. He then moved his customer's head about in every direction he pleased, to facilitate the operation of shaving. When he had finished he shook the sleeper gently and awoke him. I frequently saw the same thing practised afterwards."

CHINESE PUNISHMENTS.

Dr. M'Pherson has just published an account of his visit to China in the present expedition. We learn that one of their methods of detaining their prisoners is the excess of cruelty. When Captain Anstruther was caught they hammered his knees just over the knee-cap with a large bamboo, to prevent any possibility of escape; and then, having been marched to Ningpoo, he says, "I was now sent to gaol, and forced into a cage one yard long, one yard high, and two feet wide. In this cage heavy irons were placed on my hands and feet, an iron ring attached to the roof the cage was put round my neck, to which my handcuffs were also locked. At night a chain was also locked to my leg irons, and the gaoler, with a light, slept close to me. These irons weighed, I suppose, about eighteen pounds, and were worn by me for four weeks." Mrs. Noble, too, after being dragged about with an immense chain round her neck, to be gazed at by the crowd, and when all appeared satisfied, found a place in a similar cage. "A long bamboo was passed through the middle of the cage, at either end of which a man was placed. For two days and nights was she carried about in this cage, nor was she permitted to get out on any account whatever." The cruelty of the mob was exemplified on another occasion, when some mandarins having fallen into their hands, "the chief they boiled alive in oil, and the five others, bound hand and foot, were chained in a boat, and, drifting out to sea with the tide, suffered a fearful and awful death." At Amoy some confirmation was given to the report that the natives kill their female offspring, to prevent the encumbrance of their education, for not far from the foundling-house, "in a tank covered with weed, a number of new-born babes were found sewed up in mats." These apparently had been drowned.

ff

A Spirit from a fairy world
Tracked through the realms of light,
And saw the cities of the earth
Spread far beneath her flight!
And once her white wings furled awhile
O'er London's mighty home,
And gave their dew-starred beauty rest
On yon cathedral dome!

Fair curling clouds of silver rose
Soft through the morning air,
And London's eye of pride looked up
To catch the sun-glow there!
Then as the spirit gazed below,
Through all the misty light,
No dreamy grandeur of old worlds
Seemed half so vast and bright!

Proud, lusty Commerce burst alive
From out the bands of sleep!
The giant arms of shining Thames
Clasped forests to his deep!
The gold of empires seemed to find
Its wond'rous storehouse there!—
A lion symbolizing wealth—
With London for his lair!

The kingly palace looking up
In regal grandeur now!
And the fair park—like Nature's kiss
Upon the city's brow!
And lo! though Misery's hovels near Prove life with Sorrow's leaven,
God's temples send their spiral tow'rs
To point the way to Heaven!

The Spirit felt within her heart
The glow of wild amaze,
And her sweet fairy eyes looked down
Blind-dazzled by their gaze!
"Farewell, bright view—for elfin land
My wing is now unfurled,
But, wondes-struck, I leave behind
The City of the World!"

PRESENTIMENT.

A SCENE FROM A MS. TRAGEDY, BY J. A. WADE.

Look! how the world's poor people are amaz'd
At apparitions, signs and prodigies;
Whereon with fearful eyes they long have gaz'd,
Infusing them with dreadful prophecies!
Shakspere.

Scene, a Garden—Moonlight. Carlos and Maria.

Maria. How I do like the passing cloud to hide
The gazing moon!—Oh! what a lovely hour!
The spiders now are busy weaving threads,
Spun from the dew-drops, 'round the closing flow'rs!
When next the blossoms open all their webs
Will be undone—e'en like some other ties!—

Carlos. Whence is this gloom, Maria?
A scene like this should give no other care
But the dear sadness that a lover feels!
Look 'round thee, sweet! How stilly is the night!
Awake to peace, and leave the vision'd woes
Of sensibility asleep!—Look up!—
See!—what a heav'nly night!—

Maria. Indeed 'tis so:—
I never saw that orb so fair as now;—
Emerging, like a dream of Hope from out
The sickly slumber of Misfortune, flows
Its streamy lustre o'er that sable cloud!
Oh! if we could from some green alley view
The fairy elves in all their midnight mirth,
What dance and revelry they now must hold!
Methinks I see them, Carlos!—Some in chace
Of moonbeams broken on a streamlet's wave,
And others rolling swift a dew-drop down
The mouth of some bright shell!—But now, I'm sure,
This seems the folly of an idiot brain,
To picture in the semblance of reality,
What never yet had being save within
The regions of our Fancy!

Carlos. No!—go on—
For the sweet mixture that thy tongue has found,
Of seriousness and playful levity,
So well accords with this sweet time of night,
Oh!—I could listen 'till the morning dawn'd!
Go on, my nightingale!

Maria. I wish that I were like such fancied beings!
No thoughts save plans of wild divertisement—
No sorrow but what foggy night would give
In marring our wild waltz—all mem'ries lost
In Hope's anticipated joys—no foe
But the red blight that would perchance destroy
Some flow'r we lov'd, or dew-berries on which
We purpos'd holding our sweet midnight feast—
Oh! what a life! How different—how blest!

Carlos. How's this, Maria?—ha! in tears!
Some trouble weighs upon thy heart—
Art thou unhappy, sweet?

Maria. Oh! heed it not.—
'Tis but th' indulgence of a gloomy thought!
I've heard of some who'll sit within the walls
Of an old ruin merely to give way
To melancholy tho' they like it not!—
'Tis so with mé—I love not to be sad;
Yet when a pensive mood winds 'round my heart,
Wishing to free me from it, I sometime
Submit and feel a half-acknowledg'd bliss!

Carlos. Down on the river by this garden lies
A little barque if love remember well.—
Many a night, Maria, we have walk'd
The stilly sleeping of the moonlit wave
And chim'd a rippling music with the oar!
Thou hast enjoy'd those midnight roamings, love!
Let's to them now;—the happy stars above
Will shed their magic peacefulness upon thee,
And quiet all thy trembling fancies! Come,
'Twill calm thee, sweet!

Maria. I fear it will not now!
But yet I'll try——Oh! God! what is it thus Weighs down my heart? dear life, my only life,
My Carlos let us in—my head grows sick!
[Weeps aloud.

Carlos. The dews have chill'd thee, love! Let us return.
(As they are going out enter an Officer with guards.)
Officer. Is thy name Carlos?
Carlos. Yes—what wouldst thou have?
Officer. Thy person!
Maria. (Shrieks hysterically.) Ah! I..I..I knew it well!
[Swoons.

MEMORY!

BY J. A. WADE, ESQ.

Where the waterfall raineth
Its mist in the glen,
And the wild-bird complaineth
Of wandering men
That break on its calm solitude—
There often reclining
Within my deep bow'r,
When evening's declining,
(My favourite hour)
I rave in a fanciful mood!

There I watch the light slumber
That steals o'er the skies,
And I reckon the number
Of stars as they rise
To hang out their blue lamps above:—
And I know by the glancing
Of light o'er the hill,
That the moon is advancing,
How solemn and still,
Like a Queen that we fear and we love!

'Tis there in the quiet
Of solitude's reign,
I escape from the riot,
The dullness—the pain
That the world in its livery wears:—
The brook slowly creeping
Along the green glade,
Just wakes me from sleeping,
While thoughtful I'm laid
Bedew'd in my memory's tears
And oh! the sad pleasure,

Far, far through time's wave,
To see some heart-treasure
Long sunk in the grave,
Like a spirit of joy back return!—
But then, and for ever,
To know 'tis the shade
Of some flow'r that will never Again bloom or fade,—
Oh! memory! then do we mourn!

SONNET.

To ——

Dost thou remember a calm evening, when
We wander'd through an unfrequented way,
And all unconscious of our love (which then
Was in its promise, like a break of day)
We talk'd sweet things though sad!—Then first I knew
The thrilling pressure of thy gentle arm,
And gaz'd more fondly on the blessed blue
Of those dear eyes, round which the heav'nly charm
Of beauty shed such lustre, that I deem'd
Myself enchanted with some fairy one,
Some sylph or flow'r-child of which I had dream'd!
But soon, alas! the magic it was done—
For evening clos'd, and foot should homeward fall
To mix with fools and be — unnatural!

of April following the King with his illustrious conqueror, the Black Prince, the darling of our old historians, entered London. With the same touching delicacy of feeling which characterized all the proceedings of the Prince towards his prisoner, from their first supper after the battle, when he served the French monarch kneeling, and refused to sit at table with him, John was now mounted on a richly caparisoned cream coloured charger, while the Prince rode by his side on a little black palfrey. The accompanying procession was most magnificent. The Savoy was appropriated to the use of the King during the period of his stay. 'And thither,' says Froissart, 'came to see him the King and Queen oftentimes, and made him great feast and cheer.' The negotiations as to John's ransom were long protracted, and it was not till October, 1360, that the terms were settled; when, all the parties being at Calais, the French King and twenty-four of his barons on the one side, and Edward with twenty-seven of his barons on the other, swore to observe the conditions, and John was liberated on the following day. We must rapidly follow his history to its conclusion. He returned to France; was unable to fulfil his portion of the treaty; and to add to his mortification, his son, the Duke of Anjou, entered Paris from Calais, where he had been permitted by the English, whose prisoner he was, to reside, and which he had only been enabled to leave by breaking his parole. These, and it is said various other (and more doubtful) circumstances, made him resolve upon a line of conduct which his courtiers vainly strove to drive him from by ridicule; and to the astonishment, no doubt, more or less, of all parties, he suddenly returned to London, where he was received with open arms by Edward, and took up his final residence at the Savoy. Under the date 1364, we find in Stow's Chronicles the following passage:—'The 9th day of April, died John King of France, at the Savoy, beside Westminster, his corpse was honourably conveyed to St. Denis in France.'

THE TOWER IN THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY.

Continuing eastward, and passing through the city—the city in its old days, before gaslights and the new police had made the ways clear and the paths safe—while each house had its sign dangling in the palpable obscure of after-dark, their outlines ever and anon rendered more distinct by the smoky glare of the link-boy's light, as he piloted some bibbing citizen to his domicile. We arrive at the Tower of London, sketched in our title-page, and curiously illustrated by the fac-simile of an old M.S., for which we again place Mr. Knight's volumes under contribution. It represents the Tower in the fifteenth century.

"Charles Duke of Orleans, and his younger brother, John Count of Angouleme, who were taken prisoners at the battle of Agincourt, suffered a long captivity in the Tower of London. We mention this circumstance here, because in a copy of the poems of the Duke, now preserved in the Harleian collection in the British Museum, there is a most curious illumination representing the Tower and the adjacent parts at the period of the Duke's captivity. The here given copy will furnish a better idea of the condition of this fortress four centuries and a half ago than any description, even if the most full and correct existed. In a design of this nature, the artist was more desirous of conveying the most complete notion of a building by something like the union of a picture and a plan, than adhering to any rules of perspective, even if he had been familiar with them. His ingenious device for showing the interior as well as the exterior of the Great Tower will not pass unnoticed. He has opened the south side by an arch of immense span; and there he exhibits to us the Duke in a large chamber, assiduously wooing the Muse with the unusual accompaniment of a body of guards and attendants. We are also to suppose the Duke possesses the property of ubiquity, and that, whilst he is writing his poems in the large room, he is looking out of his chamber window in the upper story, and walking within the bulwarks to welcome some faithful adherents who has recently arrived from his beloved France. Here, then, we have correctly enough, represented the Great Tower, with the buildings and bulwarks between that and the Thames; the towers and walls on the west; and those behind the Great Tower on the north. The space within the walls, it will be seen, bears wholly the character of a palatial fortress, with no mean erections crowding upon it, but massive walls, utterly unsuited to the character of the place, rather as evidences of magnificence or strength. They were the parasitical growth of a later period."

The Tower in its varying aspects—as a fortress, a palace, a prison—as the enduring record of by-gone scenes and circumstances of historical importance and poetical association, deserves at our hands more special notice than can be given at the end of a general article; such notice it receives, with illustrations of our own, both literary and pictorial, in our current number for the new year.

And now, for a word or two in conclusion. We have selected liberally from "London," and in so doing, have paid Mr. Knight's volumes the best compliment they could receive

LONDON AT NIGHT.

How that compliment is deserved, the extracts and engravings will themselves bear witness. Wood engraving owes much to the projector of the pictorial works, and with warm commendation of "London," for its philosophic, yet amusing character, we close our somewhat lengthy review.
